ON THE TRACK OF THE CHILD SCOUT ISLAND

PUZZLE. WILBERS BIRTHDAY. LITTLE JESSIE.

Indeed nothing could have been more disappointing, than the way that exploration of the island started. The three offic officers, and squad of soldiers, followed by Tom and the Girl Polly, dressed crossed and recrossed the island, going up and down over the ledges, and slopes, and even without the slightest fear, exploring the big signal tower inside from top to bottom without finding the least sign of any human presence, (though in fact there were hiding in secret places of the island more than an expert could have counted by 100, in weeks Nor was there single tent or even the crudest kind of dwelling to be found. Lieutenant Princeton kept his eyes open for another glimpse of that mysterious (spirit of the pretty girlscout) of the afternoon of the day before before, but could notfind nothing, but what made some of the Glandelinians feel very creepy, is that from unseen and unknown sources there some times came a sort of strange wailing sound, very close, or the sound of various birds, or even of fowl and owls, and once the cry of a wolf seemingly at their very heels but nothing was in sight. Unmindful of the noonday meal, hours had been spent in the quest, but all in vain. By two oclock in the afternoon, the partywas returning finally, over the highest hill on the island. They were coming down over a rock strewn, steep path in perfect order, when something whizzedthrough the air, striking the captian on the very back, just close to the spine.

"Ow-o-o-o-o-o."groaned that Glandelinian, staggering against the cliff. Then he whitened collasped and fell. The colonel ran to his side, but Tom and Polly with pistols drawn turned, darting back to see who could have thrown the big missile. They found no one, not even the trace of other human presence. When they returned lit lieutenant Princetonwas saying;

"I was back a good deal higher up. It is probable I may have accidentally dislodged that stone with my foot and sent it flying through the air..."

However both Tom and Polly shook their heads, but did not speak just then. They had seen the big stone strike, and knew for positive that he had not gone through the air because of the lieutenants fooot. Holding a handkerchief to the jagged cut, the captian was helped down to the cove and out to the boat. He was no badly hurt, that lieutenant Princeton or Princeton soon decided on returning to the Glandelinian positions.

"That wasn't no accident"muttered Polly as the two boths and the girl stood out forward waiting orders. "That stone was absolutely thrown. Shee I wish we could go back and search the island again."

"What's that paper you're twisting in your hands, Polly?"Demanded Tom.

"Oh just a piece of old trash, I picked up near the cove."replied Polly.

However at his questing questioning look she handed it to Tom. and he scanned, it curiously. It looked like a piece torn from a mapthat had been drawn by some geographic artist. And that was all, but it was enough to give the young skipper a start of understanding. It was enough to Toms mind, to help greatly in solving the secret of this strange island. He folded the paper placing it in an inside pocket.

"I'll show this to lieutenant Princeton, when I can see him alone" thought the Glandelinian boyscout, feeling a strange thrill of discovery. "Start home "captian, and please don't lose any time on the way."sounded the lieutenants voice from aft. The Jean Sunbeam"crept out of the cove then followed nearly the route she had taken in the morning, cutting the water as she raced.

"Say that is sure mighty queer."cried the restless girlscout, jumping to her feet and pointing inshore.

"What is?"asked Tom.

"That old armed sloop at anchor off shore. Don't you see it there?"pointing.

"Yes I see it. It shapes like a long was morrmac though.

"Do Know who it belongs to?"

"Never heard. It doesn't fly no flag I see.."

"No more than I do or anybody else."Polly pursued, speaking at a fast clips but not loudly."But I've noticed things more about her more than a dozen times. She's always moored there in all sorts of weather. But I've been up along this East coaste at night, and this much I can tell you. She never puts out except at nights, especially when there's no moon or when the weathere mighty black foggy or stormy. Then just as sure as you come up along the coast, you'll find her away from her corin moorings. It's hard to tell whether's she's a war boat of our side or of the boatscorn, but believe me she's sure rigged up with teeming numbers of dreadful cannons on all decks and I've seen her firing like fury sometimes without many a mark to be seen on decks."

Tom did not answer, but he put two and two together with lightning speed. Here was something else to tell lieutenant Princeton pretty privately since that officer was so determined to know the secret of the island.

"What was so strange about the craft,, when you spoke?" asked Tom.

"Why the heads of six or seven men showed for just a second. Then they ducked "Polly answered."I haven't never seen a soul aboard that ship before."

"Well I guess it's nothing to get excited about Polly"smiled Tom."You know the owners and crew certainly have a right to board her."

Nevertheless Tom was doing some fast thinking.He drove Polly out further about the sloop, though not to much advantage.When they reached the Irish Tiegburg Landing pier, and the lieutenant and the colonel went ashore with their 1 injured captian, Tom tried to draw the lieutenant aside.

"Is it anything that will keep untill to morrow morning?"asked the lieutenant."Because if it will I want to get the captian to the best base hospital and have a doctor look at him.Then I've got a lot of military work to do."

So Tom waited.Yet after the "Joan Sunbeam"had been left in absolute order, and Polly had wandered away, Halstead talked long and earnestly with his chum T Joe before they went off to supper.

"It'll all be worth thi thinking over, and watching"said Joe suppiciously, his eyes however alight with the scent of adventure coming."We'll get at the lieutenant about it in the morning.."

That evening another thick and heavy fog of smoke rolled in over Vivian, Vickey and all asurrounding sections.After all the other soldiers of duty had gone to bed, Tom sat long time in his barracks studying the small scrap of paper the Glandelinian girlscout had found and thinking of the strange black painted war makeup or tattoo sloop that never sailed except in dark weather. Just as he was about to turn in,as taps had sounded,there cam three sharp knocks at the door followed by a strange whistleing sound..As Tom slowly opened it, a childish hand out of the smoky darkness thrust a large yellow black bordered envelope into his hands, and giving forth the strange whispered whistle vanished as if it was a spirit.

"Here come back here little girl who are you,what do you want?"hailed Tom sharply..He then gave chase as far as the gate,, then halted, hearing no sound in the dark to show which way the strange unknown duck in that place had glinded.When he questioned the two sentires they stoutly insisted with great vehemence that nobody had passed them, and that they had been so watchful that if any onehad they'ere have seen and stopped any one..Baffled at last, and feeling sort of creepy, yoong Halstead returned to the barracks.There in the light came the biggest shock of all.He had opened the envelope and drew out a pink sheet of paper also bordered in black, and on that paper, and in yellow had been lie literally printed these words in big capital letters,;

"To the one this is delivered;

"Don't you "DARE under any conditions, repeat the trips of yesterday and to day, for if you Glandelinian kid goats ins intend spying on that Island called Ghost Island we'rd make sure you'll disappear from your own armies just as easily as to recieved this note.We Vivianites are in possession of this island, and it's none of your business what we are doing, whether we're spirits or evil encarnates or what, and what that tower is doing there is only out our own affair.We don't choose to fight you Glandelinian kid scouts unless you force it to us as a matter of sanity is with the regular soldiers, but if you take chances with barging into our work you'll find out something pretty quick. And don't be fool enough to show this to any of your generals, or comrades, if either, and keep that Glandelinian girlscout Polly away from you.And if you are ordered to make the trip again, you'll be smart enough to pretend you're sick or have the motor break down or something.Burn this up and keep ofill Thomas Halstead, or we'll know how to make you.

Lucille Hickson.
The Vivianites."

As Tom Halstead stared at the pink paper, a curious wicked look came into his eyes.He knew that his party was being threatened if he persisted, for he knew too the Vivianite boy and girlscouts were exceeding ly dangerous to trifle with;being as Glandelinian generals had heard the fiercest of all the christian child scouts——and very likely his very life was threatened also. And he also realized that the sender of this warning(the Vivianites only warn once) must be for the sake of the christian cause desperate enough, if driven to it, to make their threat good, for they never say they'll do something and fail.

Of course Tom Halstead was no juvenile five finger like christian girl and boyscouts were.He did not even care about a fight with other scouts of the other side, when there was any decent way out of it.And also he was not aching for the glory that is so reckless to obtain as to be dead to death or permanent injury. So the more he thought over the solemn warning, and the more it came home to him that it was really true, and no bluff, the more he bothered his head about it before he fell asleep that night.Yet this Glandelinian boyscout soldier possessed a good average share of Glandelinian grit, grit equal to that of any brave American.When he woke in the morning, and came out into the sunlight, where all the owl world seemed brave, he saw clearly that he must to his duty, no matter where it led.And if the boy and girls couts of the christians were up to something on that island it was for him to come to find out.

"Mr Princeton is very clear headed, and knows the whole b about the christian lines."Halstead thought. I'll talk it all over with him this morning."

"Oh how wonn make Mildred dear, aren't you going to wake up soon it's most past seven thirty, and I came to wish you may happy returns of the day.."""

"Mildred opened her eyes and slowly put out one hand ina sleepy unco ncern in way.The hand touched Susans soft round arm, and then Mildred became aware of the fact,that her friend still in her night gown, was sitting on the edge of the bed.

"What in the world is the matter, is the enemy up to something?"she inquired drowsily."Or is it morning?"

"Yes of course it is, but it is dark, and oh ,ildred have you forgotten what day it is?"

Mildred suddenly sat up with a start."

"oh it's my on birthday."she said laughing."I surely remember it all now, but I surely was so sleepy yet, having been forced by duty to go to bed so late last night, I couldn't think of anything just at first. It seems only about five minutes since I went to bed."

"It's about five hours."returned Susan."We were in bed or at least I was when the clock struck nine, and now it's just striking eight.Do hurry up and get dressed,I want, to show you your presents, and they're all down stairs, and a great crowd of boy and girlscouts are all waiting to give you a happy return of the day..."

"Presents? Crowd of girlscouts waiting for me?"exclaimed Mildred beginning a hasty search for her bath slippers."you don't really mean I'm going to have birthday presents do you?I never thought this was a possibility within the scampen with so much disaster cutting off our communications."

"Of course I do,doesn't every one have presents on birthdays.And how could this crazy war stop it. It was awfully hard not to tell you about them last night, when papa brought them home from where he would not tell me,they're such nice ones I'll know you'll like them."

After that there was no need to urge Mildred to hurry, she was every bit as eager if not impatient to see the presents as Susan was to show them, and made such rapid progress in her toilet Toilet that in less than a quarter of an hour, the two little girls were racing down the big barracks stairs, Mildred making as good speed as her friend.

"There they are"cried Susan, as they entered the dining room(Boom)Boom)"All on the table table by your plate.May I open them or do you want to open them yourself..!"

Mildred thought however that she would like to do it herself, and Susan stood by, curbing her impatience as best as she could, while the little Vivinite girlscout with fingers that trembled with pleasant exbite ment, untied the parcels..

"Oh "cried Mildred with the greatest rapture, as she unfolded the soft... ti sue paper, from around the largest of the four big packages,"It's uniform, a brand new girlscout uniform, such a beautiful purple coat with long gilt lanige, and a silk yellow purple bordered uniform dresses just like my old one I have on.""

"Thanks from me."said Susan triumphantly."I described your uniform to papa, and he tried to get one just as much like the one you had on. I said that think of a uniform was your favorite, you know, and as your uniform you are wearing was getting old I thought you'd like to have another just like it.There's also a beautifully combined v colored heart shaped military girlscouts hat also, a brand pair of brand new shoes, yellow stockings, and a beautiful red military over poncho."A"g"n shoes, yellow stockings, and a beautiful red military over poncho."A"g"n

"Oh thank you so much"said Mildred hugging her friend, and her new treasure at the same time,"It will be so good to wear this new uniform to mass and especially on Sun days."

"Sure you haven't opened your other presents,——this one is from papa."

"Why what in the world is it"exclaimed Mildred in a rather puzzled tono. "It feels like a large square box but there does not seem to be any place to open it, o——oh you there is,I've got it open—oh Susan I do believe it is a Victrola music box, and a lot of tin shot records."

"Yes of course it is,I knew you'd love it.I'll show you how to wind it, but let me do it the first time,I can go much quicker. There isn't that music pretty! Papa said he picked out the sweetest tuned one in the army store way down near Julio Gillio.There are twenty four short time records, and you can get more anytime you like..."

Mildred clasped her hands in rapture too intense for speech.

"And here's something from Gladys,I know what that is for I saw her making it.It's a bag for you to keep your knitting in, and its awfully pretty too.How lovely the last it came by wagon express——it must be from your mother I guess."

"It's a big handkerchief case, and sixty four nice new handkerchiefs"said Mildred touching the neat precious gift of all, with loving fingers"that I must have made the case herself in the evenings——aren't it good of her! She does get so tired after all her long distanced scouting work, and is soon at hard work for her——to do,ching thank not october days and night soon at hard work for her——to do,ching thank not october days and night nights, such untimely weather for so late in the year.Oh dear J hazel how I do wish I could give her a great big hug..."

Indeed that certainly was a most delightful birthday;if Hazel only had been with her,Mildred told whom, it would have been the very most delightful she ever had.Mrs Farrol and Gladys and the boy and girlscouts were all more than satisfied with the thanks they recieved, and every one was so kin kind that even the thought of the absent sisters, could not make Mildred sad for many minutes at a time. She had also recieved presents from her other two sisters.

"Mildred"said Susan, coming out onto the porch, about an"Hour after her breakfast,"Did you tell that great general Evans, about to day being your birthday."

"Yes indeed "Said Mildred, pausing for a moment in the letter she was writing,to Hazel"He asked me how old I was,and I said I would be ten to day."

"I wonder if he will think of sending you a present,"remarked Susan standing by the porch railing and watching a long column of soldiers passing swiftly by."Gladys thinks perhaps he will, he's so fond of you."

"Oh no"said Mildred"I'm sure he won't,I don't believe he even remembers I told him about it. He's dreadfully busy you know, and he goes away in about two weeks or more.Violet,and her sisters have sent him a letter asking him to come to Wickey Lanainin withinin two weeks.A great concentration of clandelinian armies is going on there and a battle they wrote to him has been fought and it was a fierce one."

"Well he's awfully fond of you anyway."persesisted Susan."he asked you to dinner only yesterday which was Sunday, and in the afternoon he took you for a ride, and yesterday evening sent you over all those lovely flowers.Gladys and many "girl and boyscouts were talking about it, and your aidesdecamp Lizzie said she was sure he must be losing his mind."

"Oh dear I hope he isn't"said Mildred beginning to look distressed"what makes Lizzie think so.Anyhow she shouldn't make remarks which no one cares to hear.I'm going to tell her something."

"Why because his staff generals say there must be something queer the matter with him since Violet,and her sisters went so far away.since they are gone he has never had company you know, and he's been grouchier toward the enemy more than ever before, and only yesterday morning before there was something terrible to some Clandelinians who were brought brought before him when caught trying to raid a refugee camp.Oh here comes the military express wagon------perhaps its another present for you.....""""

"I guess not(get hot)"said Mildred, smiling,though she still looked troubled."There isn't any one else to send me ones, and if every body in the army sent me something I would have no place to put them all, and would have to give them away."

"It's a great big package anyhow."announced Susan with interest,"I'm just going to see who it's for."

"But because you run away from me you won't be also allowed to leave the camp"said Mildred.

But Susan forgetting didn't hear, and she darted off but was back again in less than a minute, ot crying excitedly!

"It's for you mildred------it reallly is.I saw your name Mildred St Clair running on it that is on the paper.Oh do come down stairs quick, and lets see what is in."

Down went pen and paper, and away flew Mildred, to the front corridor, where Lizzie the girlscout aidedecamp, was already untying the cord... from around the mysterious parcel.2.2.2.

"Why its books they're books"cried Susan,"Great big books the kind you use to make mysterious girlscout plans and codes, Mildred."Yes t hey are that kind,I see the raised things on the cover.""

With a little joyful cry the child scout tgetgr sprang forward and"and".the next moment she was down on the floor, hugging the four large bulky volumes in a rapturous embrace.

"The first book is a geographic"she gasped"The book I've been wanting so long(hong kong) and that Hazel was going to get for me when she could find the location of a place that brings out such books in spite of the seige.Oh I'm so happy,I'm so happy."

"Do you suppose then that she sent it?"Susan inquired,to her books had never seemed to be such very interesting articles, and she was more than immensely surprised at Mildreds delight over this present.

"No I'm positively sure she didn't, she wouldn't have sent it here for fear Clandelinian spies or secret service man might get hold if it, and besides she sent the handkerchiefs handkerchiefs and the cases."

"Whom do you suppose did sent it then.?"

"I think, I'm almost sure, that it was General Evans.I told him about how I loved these kind of d code booksewhich you explain only with your fingers and read that way, we girlscouts all have to learn these things so we can do things without interference from the enemy, and he asked me where to get such kind of raised print was sold.Oh how good he is---how awfully awfully good."and to the utter amazement of both Susan and many of the boy and girlscout stills present, the little girl burst burst into tears..

"Oh please don't mind"she sobbed, half crying,and half laughing"I know I suppose that I seem dreadfully silly, but oh I do love all kinds of books books so, and to have those kind I have been wanting so long---it is all just like a dream.."

"I suppose you'd like to go over and thank the great general for his present."said Gladys, coming into Mildreds room.

Mildred who was kneeling beside the bed, turning the pages of her precious new book,,, turned around with a start...

"I should like it very much indeed."she said soberly"I didn't like to ask you to take me, because I thought you were busy, and I was going to make the trip with some of my boy scouts as a bodyguard."

"Well I believe I can take you now, you won't want to stay long I suppose, unless military business detains you."

"Oh no only just to thank him,I'm sure he must have sent me the book himself--he's the only person who knew anything about my wanting it,, you see."

Gladys declared she was positive it was the general who had sentbit and especially so, he and the great general had already shown a desire to be unusually kind, and in a few minutes they were on their way to general Evans headquarters.Mildred had asked Susan to accompany them saying she's give her a written permit so the vivianite scouts would not stop her, but although much interested in the "Terrible General Evans" Susan had not yet sufficiently overcome her awe of him for a closer acquaintance, and declined the invitation, saying she would rather hear all about it when Mildred came back. The two had to pass the Burrough's girl and boy scout camps before reaching Evans headquarters.Had Mildred been a stranger she would have been stopped and questioned but as the sentries knew her she and Gladys were allowed to pass through though some questions were thrown at the maid.General Evans h front door was opened by the solemn faced orderly, who in answer to Gladys's inquiry replied that the general general had gone out to some part of the camp on hearing of a boyscout called Jimmie having been shot, but was expected home very soon, and requested them to wait.

"General Evans assured you might come this morning Miss"he said to Mildred,"and he told me to tell you if you came while he was out,I was to ask you to wait."

Gladys looked a little doubtful doubtful.

"I'm sorry but I can't w wait very well, even if I want to."she said" and I will leave you and come back for you in about an hour or so.,Ill Will that do.?It isn't even nine o'clock yet, and you will be at home in plenty of time for lu lunch."

Mildred professed herself quite satisfied with this arrangement, and after settling herself comfortably on the parlor sofa, Gladys departed, promishing to return before long.It was very cool and pleasant in the generals big parlor, and Mildred found the contrast to the hot weather outdoors outdoors very refreshing. h she leaned back in her corner of the big comfortable sofa, and gave herself up to pleasant reflections.How very one was to how, how delightful Hazel would be when she heard about it all. what a beautiful birthday she was having. She was glad now that Hazel had persuaded her to stay another week at this location as the Farrols wanted her instead of going home in time for her birthday, which had been their original plan.and it was only two weeks untill the 21st of november, and General Evans had fully decided to leave for Wickey Lanainin on the first as he had recieved news a great battle had been fought there and Violet,and her sisters needed his assistance in their line very badly. Violet. and her sisters had sent back glowing accounts of the results of that terrific battle will which be seen in later forwarding chapters.Oh how delightful everything was going to be if the christians kept winning victories like that,and how very very happy she was.Mildred rambled on many other little girl and boyscouts were quite as happy as she. These pleasant reflections were suddenly checked by the sound of approaching footsteps and voices.General Evans had returned, and was speaking to some one, whom he had evidently found waiting for him.

"No my dear lady no, it's no use to say another word on the subject." was the first words of sentence which reached Mildreds ears, and there was no doubts that general Evans was really very angry this time, but not to the one who he was speaking to.The little girlscout started nervously, and drew further back into her corner with a little irrepressible shiver, at the sound of the loud harsh voice.Then another voice spoke---a womans voice this time, and in English.

"But you won't be letting the doctor after giving up my boy to day when he now lay so badly wounded he can't leave his bed, and me that weresittin up all night, that it's all I can do to do to hold me head up at all."

"But what can be done now"said general Evans."The doctor says your son he sees mortally wounded, and nay can no save them now."

"Sus the dirty Clandelinian he shoot my leetle Jimmy in his little Tommy and--

"And the assassin will pay for it the moment your little son dies" thundered the general."You forgot lady that I have told you before, that the man who shot your boy dies the same moment your son dies if he the man who shot your boy dies the same moment your son dies if he does notpull through from se wound.I have ordered ze soldiers to have heem well guarded in ze gurdhouse, and they know my orders. The doctor he will do that he can for zoe poor kad but if little Jeome dio thatis the end of it for the man who keeled heem.We Abbiannians we feex Clandelinians who shhoe little coils and boys.We don't tak; the shiftless shillying ways of ze enemy no sir."

"And what's to become of us"Wailed the poor woman beginning to cry. "Oh M - Christian general think of it, me a window woman wid fiv e little childer who done those Clandelinians no harm as we're only refugees, and have no place to lay our heads till we come to this camp, and now Jimmie dying. Oh Mr general dear!"

"I tell yo my dear lady it is only in the power of god to save hoom now.You no complain that what ze doll hem za miracle een ze only hope. but if ze sonny by die, you will have ze satisfaction of hearing five or six shots on that very morning or hour zat son dies.I will send ze army specialists. If he can no do anything to save ze boy, say zen it ees up to God alone.Take her to her camp boys, and try to relieve h if possible"to the soldiers in Abbiecannan."Take care of her. nd see to it that the guardhouse is well watched.There's a big responsibility upon any one who lets that child murderer get away.They'll take his place. I'll warn."

Then she heard the closing of the front door, and general Evans steps were rapidly approaching the parlor.

"Wejlea."exclaimed the general, catching sight of his little visitor as he entered the room,"so you've come to see the great general again, have you?That's right.Well how goes the war to-day?"

Mildred had risen, and came slowly forward;she was very quiet, and all the bright look of happiness had gone suddenly out of her face.

"I came to thank you"she said"For the code books you know;I am sure you sent them."

The great general laughed, and he took Mildreds little hand in his. "Well suppose I did, what of it--do you like them?"

"Oh ever so very much, better than anything else you could possibly have given me."

"Well now that's good, but what in the world is the matter.You look as if there was something that you didn't like.Has any one been making you cry.Only let me find out who it is and I'll--"

"No,oh no sir"interrupted Mildred, with crimsoning cheeks"Its nothing at all--that is nobody has done anything to me, only I m so sorry for that poor woman."

"Why What poor woman."?

"The woman you were talking to outside.Please don't be offended about it, but I couldn't help feeling wh or hearing what you said--and--and she seems to be in such dreadful trouble."

The general was silent for a moment, andMildred did not notice the expression on his face. Then he said slowly, and in a voice that was almost gentle;

"So that's the trouble is it. ell little Girlie listen carefully to me and don't make yourself unhappy about what you don't understand. A Glandelinian soldier and some of his comrades were caught in the act of raiding or robbing a refugee camp, and that woman seeing them raised the alarm.In the confusion her youngest shot was shot and mortally wounded by one of them, who was captured.That Glandelinian isn't worth one tear from you nor any one else.These Glandelinians are miserable devilish creatures, without sense enough to save their souls if they could. They war more on children than even on the armies opposing them.He is a prisoner in the guard house near the Burrough girlscout camp.I have done what I could for the woman but I'm afraid the boy won't live. but if he dies, well the soldiers know my instructions."

Mildred said nothing, in fact she knew Evans misunderstood her.Her sympathy did not go out to the worthless scoundrel but to the woman and he thought she was sorry for the Glandelinian.Her eyes nevertheless were full of tears, and she kept her lips drawn tight to keep them from quivering.The general saw the tears, and he tapped his foot impatiently on the carpet.

"Not satisfied yet eh?Well what would you like me or have me to do?"

"She said her little boy was badly injured."said Mildred softly."And there were five little children.When was the little boy shot."?

"I don't know I'm sure.Anyway it'll be just too bad for the prisoner if the little boy dies.You know you girlscouts have the same law if any of your comrades are shot and the sniper is captured.You shoot them too at the same time your comrade dies.Now sit down, and tell me about all those wonderful birthday presents."

Mildred sat down, and b began an account of the mornings pleasures, but the glad sound had gone out of her voice, and more than once she had to pause in her story in order to steady that troublesome catch in her voice.The general watched her with a troubled look.He felt sorry for the poor woman too but he was bitter against the Glandelinians like wormwood and gall.When Mildred had finished describing the birthday presents there was rather a long silence.Mildred found it necessary to blink rather hard to keep back the rebellious tears, which every moment threatened to overflow.Suddenly the general put out his hand, and laid it on the little curly head beside him.

"I'm glad you like the code books."he said, and there was actually a note of embarassment in his voice."I'm always bashful in the presence of good and holy children like there is in Abbiecannia and am therefore sometimes very embrassed to make presents to young ladies and girlscouts, because I don't always know what would be most acceptable.I got the books because you seemed to think you might like to have them--but tell the fact is, I want to give you something else besides. for another birthday present."

"something, else besides, "repeated Mildred"in a tone of bewilderment."Oh no General Evans,I shouldn't like to have you give me anything more it would not be proper.The books are beautiful, and I shall just love studying it,but----"

"Never mind about all the butts, "the goats do that,I've made up my mind to ive you something else besides, and I would like to have you tell me what it shall be.It'll be for your own good too."

Mildred hesitated for a few moments, then her cheeks flushed, and her face beamed brighter as a radiant hope came upon her.

"Do you really--really mean you would like to have me tell you what I'd rather have than anything else?"she ask asked..

"I sneerally mean what I say."

Mildred clasped her hands.

"Then"she said slowly,"What I would like better than anything else in the world,yes better than anything else you could ever buy for me--that you would let me see that poor woman, and her children, and especially poor little Jennie."

Mildred paused, but suddenly came the answer;

"Well you've got your wish easily enough"he said patting Mildreds chestnut head."I've given my promise, and you've caught me this time sure.Jennie Flannigan shall for the first time in her life have a girlscout come and visit her and her children."

"Oh"said Mildred, and therewas no need of another word, her radiant face was quite enough to convince General Evans of her gratitude.

"Can we go now, and tell Mrs when she is to receive visitor?" said Mildred a few minutes later,"she must be so dreadfully worried and unhappy you know."

"Perhaps she may be hanging about somewhere, fearing to go home from her grief."said General Evans."I'll go and have a look."

He left the room but very soon return returned with the information that Mrs Flannigan had gone to the refugee camp, one of the soldiers had seen her walkingdown the road, crying as she went, accompanied by some of the boysdouts of the neroughs who had tried to console her.

Q"Oh couldn't you s send s me one to tell her we're coming."she said eagerly,"She's so unhappy,and suppose the orderlies come and take awayher wounded boy to the hospital before we can see him."

The general glanced at the clock.

"I'll tell you hat we'll do."he said."You shall go andsee her in person yourself.IT's all your doing anyway, and she might as well know it.I'll order the horses, and we'll ride down to the refugee camp.It's close ac where you and your little friend live anyhow."""QAZ

Fifteen minutes later,, Mildred, her face one more wreathed in smiles,,, was seated on a fine black horse, and both were soon galloping in the direction of the refugee camp and tward the home of Mrs Jennie Flannigan Flanigan. It faced a broad company street, and it was before a large but low standing brick ba acke that general Evans and Mildred at last brought their horses to a stop, and throwing the reins to the groom, who had dismounted from his horse first, sprang to the ground Mildred doing likewise from her horse.It was a rather novel proceeding on the part of the eccentric general Mr Evans, to be calling on one of the refugees for the first time in his life, having had no opportunity to do so before, and yet for the purpose of informing her, that she had a little girlscout visitor who cried because her son was shot by a "Dirty skunk(), and perhaps the very novelty of it, caused the general to quite enjoy the sensation.2.2.2.

After being permitted to pass by the guards, he led Mildred up a broad brick covered path, bordered with close limes and clothing, and knocked at the door of the barracks, which was opend after a short delay by Merrie Flannigan herself.A very tall tidy and pretty, woman the woman was, and perhaps there was some reason for general Evans opinion of her character being "Abbiecannian"quite, being a foreign, , but her eyes were red from weeping, and there was no doubt as to the fact of her being in real fear of her sons life.At sight of her visitors the woman started back, with an exclamation of respectful surprise.

"Well Mrs Flannigan"began general Evans who never wasted time in unnecessary words,"This is Miss Mildred Manning, and she desired to come and see your little wounded son."

The woman clasped her hands and burst into a rather incoherent, torrent of gratitude(she couldn't speak much Abbiecannian yet) and blessing in the midst of which general Evans cut her short.

"Well, Mildred...

"Why the Saints in Heaven bless you for a dear sweet lady of the Christian Army, and may you never know the touch of y sorrow yourself, and its prayers for you will all be this night. In another month I'll be able to repay you child scouts for what you done for us with a bunch of money that's a-comin to me.You've Vivianhight coute saved me and my home from those snipeens in gray, and now poor little Jigmy is so badly hurt,I could never get him out of bed however hard I tried."

"How many Glandelinians fired the shot at him?"interrupted the general."

"One."

"One."

"Wa- ...d wouldn't you be [illegible] inside, just to [illegible] a look at [illegible] planning?"

[illegible] suffocating, your little [illegible] where [illegible] helping your soldiers [illegible]

"[illegible]"

"[illegible] mine."said General Evans, but this young lady would first like to say a word to our wounded boy...she's very good [illegible] out, so be careful she doesn't [illegible]."

This information elicited from the [illegible] of eyes from Miss Flanigan, while these they were expressions of [illegible] and [illegible] mildred [illegible] by these exclamations, and she accompanied the Irish woman into the house, and up the broad stairs, into [illegible] bedroom, which was cool and refreshing.

"Now, Miss Flanigan, [illegible] Flanigan as they neared the room"there's a little [illegible] scout lady going to [illegible] for a nice [illegible] abbreviation of Alexander she is, good brave little fighter, and never bit of the enemy in the afraid. But she's come with good news to us this day, for it's General Evans himself that's [illegible] her, and you [illegible] believe the [illegible] care [illegible] from [illegible] and the demand [illegible] childish whisper—"

"Give me a little water.The fever makes me thirsty."

"I [illegible] Miss"commanded the mother,"you [illegible] for drinks every minute [illegible] days, much cold water in good for little boys."

"[illegible] if [illegible] down—oh, Mummy, do give me a drink."

"Poor little boy"said Mildred pityingly"I don't believe it can hurt him, the water isn't so cold in now, and it must be dreadful to feel so thirsty."

The [illegible] left Mildred standing in the middle of the room, while she went down to get some water, but Mildred hearing Jimmie's sobs, for the wounded child had burst into [illegible] made her way to the bed beside, and laid soft cool little hand on the boys burning forehead, and then [illegible] the dreadful bloody bandage round the boy's left shoulder.

"Why, Jimmie boy, [illegible] how he got, and that dreadful bandage..."

Mildred stood drawing back [illegible], and feeling [illegible] frightened, though she could not have told why."Does that wound there pain badly.It really is [illegible]"

"[illegible] awful"said Jimmy,and he held one hand and throat on that side as [illegible] more I cannot even move."

"I'm so sorry "said Mildred stroking [illegible] one of the little hot hands which lay outside the sheet,"I guess you'll feel better soon.Here comes your mother with a nice drink for you."

Mildred held to sit up but he gave a cry of pain.She handed him the glass, but when he had drained its contents at a gulp, he again cried with pain moaned with him.

"Miss Mildred he's very badly wounded", Mrs Flanigan said anxiously."Have you had a doctor to see him?"

"Oh yes, Mrs Flanigan, the General is, and very kind to us, Williams sent one.He's a good man the general is, and very kind to us, [illegible] I'd butthor be [illegible] you down again now, for Miss General Evans would be waiting for you."

"Yes I guess I'd better go.Good bye Jimmie.I hope you'll be ever so much better to morrow."

"I never did see nothin so suddent in all my life"said Mrs Flanigan as she left Mildred from the [illegible] "He was [illegible] could be [illegible] murdin, and it was only last night that the Sixty' scoundrels raided the camp and shot my Jimmy."

"Was old is he?"Mildred inquired with interest.

"Well, he [illegible] and [illegible] he [illegible] for his age.He never had [illegible] chance since he was born,I don't and [illegible] the [illegible] could be sure to [illegible] little boys and girls at all."

Mrs Evans paid the visit, and then after [illegible] declared she hoped she [illegible] would have good reason in her career"they [illegible] off.She was very much [illegible] about Lord Jimmie, and Mildred told him all about the [illegible] wounded boy, whose head felt so hot, and that the fever was so bad from the effects of his wound that he kept [illegible] for drinks every minute.He was very kind and rode all the way [illegible] own home [illegible] on instead of stopping at his own headquarters to have [illegible] to ride back with Gladys,

"Good bye and thanks you a hundred billion times"said Mildred, as she [illegible] Mr Travels door."I really believe this was the loveliest birthday I ever had.I wish I could give you something General,you've made me so [illegible]"

"Give me a good kiss then,"said the general suddenly bending his head down to level with Mildreds,"That is about as good as anything else I [illegible]."

Next moment Mildreds arms were around his neck.

"Oh you dear kind General Evans"she cried kissing him heartily I can never tell how happy you have made me, and now much I think you

But it was not the first time in his life that general Evans had felt the touch of an childs arms, or of childs lips.

Then he handed her the big brass key, and had he not left the strange bigbrass key to Mildred, there wouldn't have been any sort of [illegible] to soon be related here.but he, told her of a mysterious pan [illegible] which he wished her to solve, and the queerest thing in it was that it unlocked only one strange big lock, and that though there were eighteen big locks with which the key really fitted the key however would turn only in that one big lock...

bout the the wide central hall wondering where it was best to begin the search.

"One thing's certain"she said to herself out in a whisper."I'll have to look where it is likely strange locks would be on doors of rooms and closets or on bureau drawers or desks,---anything that can be locked and unlocked--for that may be the only way I'll find a use for this key.go here goes."

It however was not in the big old closet door in the hall for she found it was not locked, and the key did not even fit that lock, nor did it fit the one in the cellar door at the other end of the hall, which too she found was open and not locked. Nor did it fit the door to a great living room living room on one side of the hall. nor to the door which had once been a dining room on the other.Mildred however decided to investigate the living room first and stood in the middl of the floor gazing with blank uncertainlty about her, and trying to plan where to begin.The room was in the greatest disorder.Mildred approached a nr strange workbench thinking a little sorrowfully sorrowfully as she remembered Evans was soon to go away.The bench was a big home made affair, like a long low table and on it still lay a number of tools but rusty now.while she stood gazing at it, thinking more of Evans that her present quest, she suddenly suddenl caught sight of a drawer in one side of the bench.If it really ever had a lock she did not then think of it untill now But as she bent to examine it now, it exhibited very ovident signs of a large large keyhole in the, form of a diamond shaped piece of brass but what was more startling it had pasted beside the lock a tiny scrape of paper on which was a figure eight.

"Oh I've found it now."Cried Mildred flourishing the big key about her head.

"Have found what?"asked a childish voice.and whirling about startled out of her wits, Mildred beheld a boy through a broken standing near one of the open window lights, and looking inquisitively at her.

"I can't tell you exactly,"she said if I am allowed to be it's a secret and I'll doing it for general Evans. Look here boys I have something over yonder that strange, behind you, and if you don't look off the window sill this minute, a shot or two might be fired straight at your heads.I think I can fix the catch on other paned this way."

This was a terrible warning, and Mildred knew it.As they were slow in obeying this warning because of their childishness, she ran to them and almost shoved them off, looking at the key ring, but she was desperate and something impressed her to be done.She soon had closed them to relinquish their hold on the sill and dirp down then too load shots rang out, and bullets whistled close to Mildreds head.The poor little child screamed, took this with her eyes expressed seriousness.The boys from the veranda, falling out and crying and running the spot from their rifles being inchg used at the moment.Mildred was relieved to know she had saved them just in time, but was left with the doors, feeling, that in pressing on being to locate the culprits, they were not going very wise, even though child people to the shots and the rifle shots, heeded.Once they were out of sight, she forgot them and the rifle shots, and went armed joyfully to her quest.The big key fitted perfectly to the lock of the drawer in the carpenters bench but did not turn in its socket.She tried again and again, and finally on the point of giving it accidentally pulled forward on the key and the drawer came open.It was therefore not locked.She tried to look in and observed that the key did not come either as if this drawer had once contained nails and tools, there was nothing of that sort in it now.On the contrary, it was quite empty save for some papers which folded and addressed on on side in small perfect handwriting in most delightful General, but written in broken english and partly in German.She laid down the key and opened it wonderingly but first going to the windows to see that no one was watching her, and when being able to make out both the English and German right where she was;

"My General Purgatorio Landlan; Federal."

Mildred read it over seven times before she could make out such poor English and before she got the real meaning of it though she said;

"Why in the name of Leaping Lizards didn't he write it in his own language If that is all that old English language he knows.."

Then she sat down on the near nearest chair to think it over.That letter was no like general Federals but to much could did it get here...ut what could I be the behind so carefully hidden away from all christian generals b h behind one of those eighteen keyholes,and where was the eighteenth keyhole,and why was those which she had tried to fit the key not locked even though the key did go in and yet could not turn.?

And too where was all the rest... she started up to continue the search for the second.but this search was not destined to be a success ful at the very first for the former one had evidently taken a moral had not intended to make it too easy for any curious boy to find but it did set her old brain into the activity of possession of it. She had decided before beginning that it would be best to conduct the which in symmatic order systematically observing the possibilities of one room or location before going to another, and so she began on the living room, oh and concluded that she would finish with that first, and move on to the one across the hall only then there seemed to be nothing more to b be discovered where she was.

To this end she entered and bounded about her task.The day for some reason was becoming extremely hot, and there were dark piled clouds of smoke like huge thunderclouds rising slowly up in the west, but Mildred took no time to notice this.With the air of a general she started and dust covered room she examined with the greatest care, but though there were a good number of keyholes in various drawers not one held the key so timed related to it many keys though it did fit some. After she had gone over them all once with no result, she sat down once more on the carpenters bench, and read the strange old English letter all over again.She noticed particularly the line where he had said the general Purgatorian had good mind in mind that liked to know things and was able to reason things out.

"But I'm afraid the general would not think so if he was here." she mournfully said aloud."I myself can't reason out one thing about where such a second keyhole can be."

And again she sat nibbling at the strange letter in her hand as if for inspiration.As she glanced at the last writing, she could almost imagine seeing the old English gentleman himself writing it, stroking his long black beard with one hand as he sat industriously penning it at his old secretary desk in his headquarters some place far away.While out on paying work and seen him sit at writing many times of afternoons down nearly to the end of his nose, where they always seemed to hang, and the very features of his face were such as to have a sort of child.

Then her eyes unconsciously traveled over to what was some old writing desk, and then suddenly an idea Brand new inspiration.That desk look now shown indeed one it seemed to me to be very closely resembling that one used by general Federals some months past--almost so much so was the old carpenter bench.Did she really deserve it all the attention it really deserved.She decided she had and began on the room, the room to it with renewed hope.It was like everything else, very, rickety and out of repair, and one of the drawers had broken clean off and the place where it had been applied by a piece of broken diamond shaped brass together.The brass knobs on all the drawers were missing and there was not a trace of varnish on either of them.Above the desk was a sort of cabinet or bookcase with glass doors with curiously shaped panes, the glass in several of which was broken.Mildred managed after some difficulty, to pull out the drawers, and threw open the glass doors, but gave it for some writing ink pens and some old pipes and smoking tobacco, the drawers were empty In one there were countless safty pins, and some childs old rag doll. Mildred pulled out all the drawers in such way she had diffe difficulty in replacing them.She was about to slam the glass doors to with a bang in sheer disgust at the useless need of the hur when her eye suddenly caught the gleam of a bit of brass on the side between two shelves well up beyond her reach.

Seizing an old stepladder and placing it so she could climb up, she stood on the top and got a closer view. Sure enough, there was a diamond shaped brass keyhole like the one on the bench bench, and close beside it a paper pasted on which was a tiny figure"1.This time Mildred did not shout, but she gave a happy little chuckle to think she had succeeded again.Before she could turn to put the key however, a terrific clasp of the loudest earsplitting thunder, shook the house so that she all but fell off the wooden stepladder on which she was perched. And almost at the same moment, a great black cloud blotted out the sun, enveloping the room in a kind of dim twilight. Though it was not close to the house it nevertheless proved to be the worst distant cannon and shell storm that Mildred Hamilton had yet ever experienced or heard.Before the third est and most modic roar and shock thunder of cannon came, she had managed to rush round closing indows and doors, realizing that much sisters, whom though I hate them like any kid hates castor oil, I have to admire just the same because of their bravery. Then I also covered that what this book contains, if it once got into the possession of the christians would be most helpful to them in their discovered that one extant christian dog girl spy is called Gertrude Angeline who was spying within my lines, and it was during her stay that she did a wonderful thing, which though caused me disaster was great for the christian side. You know for being a spy she might as well be an inventive genius and she's always thinking and planning how to make it easier for christian generals to success in everything and though she's a great thorn in my flesh of a very different variety she's always leading one different disaster-ment or the other. Well she got interested in some great plan I was scheming, she watched me secretly while I was spending hours and hours of time trying to think how to crush a certain christian army before another could come to its aid, and a tedious and tiresome process indeed. And

Also then the question occured to her,--why couldn't she pretend to be a clandelinian girlscout, serve for a time in my own ranks, where she could solve my plan easily without stealing it all from me, and save herself time and labor. Well she straightway put her own brains to work on the problem, got some of her accomplishes interested in it, and before long had sunk me into the mire of disaster so far I thought I was engulfed in total defeat for the whole war. Beyond a doubt she too must have sat in this old chair at that same old desk, and scratched away at drawing after drawing of her own strange plan, planning, making changes and thinking of new ways to add to my discomfiture. This strange drawing must have been one of them. The M.M and other initials in the corners practically improves. Perhaps she gave it to one of those Vivian Girls as to help them through their own plans, and warned her to keep it well hidden from prying eyes of clandelinian agents and spies and the like, till she had finished her own spying work against me. So she must have placed it in this secret drawer. And no doubt its existance was forgotten in later months when she gave the book to general Vivian. So general, you have another interesting relic of old Reid, and I hope you like me to have filled with it the time you will spend a lot of time reading up about that dirty skunk Angelina Arombus, and her crazy but wonderful invention to frustrate all my intentions. None of the girls or boyscouts within our clandelinian ranks are worth a shilche they can't do nothing to irritate even the lowest of child scouts called Home Guards and are afraid of them as a mouse is of a cat. Some day you must visit Evangeline St Claire, where I came to the aid of general Feugral on time and saved his shattered army from total destruction even though it was impossible to stop the advance of the christian dogs. And if you do you will be sadder than ever that you have in your possession an original drawing of one of Gertrudes plans which made the giant disaster to my army at Phelantonburg as it was. And I know you are wild to find the next keyhole. But the only help I can give you, to keep it secret as no flying christian girls can discover it is to say that you have not yet exhausted the possibilities of this strange and immediate vicinity and that the next is connected with a favorite pastime we two generals used to go often have together.

General John Jacken,
Manley. AQUEEB

It would be scarcely possible to express Mildreds state of mind after reading this really very important letter. A very important find. She began to feel as if she were living Gertrudes own life of spying where curious articles that didn't appear to be of the least interest or value, were suddenly at some good discovery, turned into articles of unusual and great worth. Certainly the Angeline no doubt was as wonderful as a great magician as this queer reader reckoned her of a glorified hunt for a generals plans, but this result were more astonishing than finding a million plans. If this got into the hands of the christian generals, and especially Emperor Vivian, who is always called General Vivian, clandelin in and her chums would be sunk. It was about the destruction of Ashbeam something that she knew was, but now the four keyhole lured her one on, and needless of the fact that it was getting towrd noon and dinner time, she plunged into the hunt. After an aimless journey around and around the living room (room) and hall however, which yielded nothing at all in the way of a clew however, she concluded she had better sit down a moment or so and think about what General Manley himself had written. To write "pastime we had together." We had said, well they had been a number. One was planning together, another was talking about how to bring about the capture of the vivian girls and keep them prisoners, and end their spying experiences for good and all, another was planning the movements of the armies in battle, and last but not least reading together. General Federal used to do the reading, while General Manley tinkered away at his military geography, and made comments every once in a while. They had enjoyed this best of all.

"See it must be something about the reading--or books or the bookcase," decided Mildred. "I'll go and look at the bookcase first of all."

She walked over to where it stood, but a very good piece of furniture it was in the room this time, but this she knew and never made antique" because it was recently as it appeared a brand new one and it was no interest to could have had books of large size. She examined it now with minute attention convinced that somewhere about it the fourth keyhole was to be found, and she was not mistaken. Far down on one side but on the interior, in the very core of the thing, she presently discovered the strange but this time a black diamond shaped keyhole accompanied by a three-fill instead of IV.

And at this moment a meek little voice at her elbow announced very pleadingly;

"Please Mildred, Granny's wants to know when' you are coming over to dinner. We've been looking for you everywhere. And say Mildred you must be having a grand time here. We know you must have a wonderful old secret of some kind. If you'll only let us into it, we'll give you some brand new uniforms which are too large for us but will fit you perfectly. to a letter T."

And startled Mildred, looked up into the faces of two Ranger scouts, Jean Saunders and Mildred Maxwell, who as in their custom had stolen in so quietly that she had not even heard them. Mildred knew that a suggestion of parting with their beloved new uniforms could only mean that they were terribly earnest about the thing, and her heart suddenly melted at the sight of their beautiful and pleading faces.

"Tell you what" she laughed. "I can't just now. It's General Evans navies. But when I have made the discovery and deliver what I find to the General I'll tell you every speck of it after its all over. It's a perfectly wonderful' secret, von something that your leader Gertrude Angeline and even the Princesses would like to know very much."

And with this promise the two girlscout leader had to be content.

Mildred had also realized that she had promised Susan that she would be on hand to help her shell several quarts of peas for supper, so she went about to close all the windows and doors, put the new precious brass key in her sweater uniform pocket and followed the two girlscouts to Mr Rivels house, feeling that at least she had accomplished something quite important that day. As she had supposed she found many girl and boy scouts in the place to celebrate her birthday with her. They greeted her at dinner as one of them, he too was consoling herself by thinking over her adventure of the late morning and planning where she would find in the fifth or whatever keyhole it was she had found in the book case. Much to her relief she discovered that all of the boy and girl scouts invited to go out on a lark that afternoon and return toward evening. Very kindly Angeline Jeanlo Jennings invited her to come along, with a lot of clandelinites too but much to every ones astonishment, Mildred politely refused, saying she had some work that must be finished for the cause that day, and which couldn't wait. Very slowly she saw them off and then hurried pell mell on horseback through the woods toward the old house which seemed bursting with mysterous secrets for her.

From that moment Mildred decided to never stop until she had run to earth her last secret. She had found out the contents of the little secret drawer in the book case, which was only General Manleys small Dairy book, and in the other two it was the same. He had already passed the tenth keyhole and was coming to the eleventh eleventh. This was in the drawer of a large kitchen table, which opened as all such drawers do, when she had turned the big brass key in the lock. And somehow Mildred was not surprised to find in it only an old musty story book and she wondered what he did with this. Neither was she at all disappointed disappointed, for by this time she had come to recognize, that these two wicked clandelinian generals Manley and Federal were wizards when it came to fixing up an interesting story of information from the most commonplace of objects. So laid it beside the other articles she had found contented to wait untilll her discovery of the lucy keyhole for all explanations as she was perfectly a they would finally come with that. All around the kitchen she searched in her frantic hunt for the twelvth keyhole, the one she hoped would be very important. So too felt that it would be quite impossible to back home that day without having unearthed it. But it was absolutely not to the kitchen. No nook or granny, dresser or cupboard escaped her scrutinion, even the floor and walls having been searched with the most unusual care. There was no place left but the bed room. So to this she went. It seemed no different from when the owner had once occupied it, except that the great wooden bedstead was bare of every thing not even the mattress. This bed had always fascinated Mildred, since she first saw it especially the great towering head headboard with the heads of a core of beautiful angels carved in wood above the top. She looked up long and earnestly at them. There was just a suggestion of pretty wings carved behind them and underneath a long straight polished piece of wood without any ornamentation on it. And then her eye lit on this she gave a little gasp and cried;

"Oh I knew. I knew it. Oh I knew it. The foolish Clandelinian General would be sure to put it therere there." Right in the middle of this big piece of wood was the 12th diamond shaped keyhole, green in color this time with the figure I" and a and 12 looking it. Quick as a flash she had climbed up and unlocked the little compartment behind it. The polished piece of wood opened outward, revealing a shallow space behind, and in this space was the long locked for last secret. Hardly daring to breathe enough with the excitement she pushed the door out wide to get in the fresh air and examine, where she could devote her concentre to greater advantage. But as she [illegible] carefully from behind a book [illegible]

"The General Burgatorin" the time [illegible] twelvth keynol keyhole you will have realized [illegible] for you it. Now I suppose you are certainly wondering what I could have meant by hiding away those old and quite familiar articles in such a careful hiding place. But you probably have [illegible] realize that they meant something more than just what they appeared to be at a sudden glance. They certainly do, and now I am going to explain all about them...we came in with our little cockleshell and nearly ... we spent over their heads, and I, for one, had begun to adjust ... of more than mere, we were very little in our thoughts to the stand back out of which we were reading, [illegible] old the somewhat [illegible]ffaires, so why I asked should we? I picked up this particular one and ... comfy head, one day six months ago [illegible] vivian town ...lno version ... kept it to because I wanted to see if there were any ...ful tale ...ling it in [illegible] on the weeks after the battle of ...ewaine. St. Aubrey] saw in a bulletin, that a reward was offered ... all his followers by general vivian for the recovery of that diary. ... I got the old copy together and looked it over, and began to feel ... that night gone by my hand I would probably the very book be doubtes ...o much.so I fixed it all up as you see, and took it to general ... pletes [illegible] chief-tian, where he told me it was indeed one ... the letters lost by violet vivian, and that if I cared to part with it,he would sent it to clandelinia to be published. But for some good ...asons I did not want to part with it, because it had associated with ...omething of great importance to our cause.So I brought it back, ...e letting him make a copy of it, and decided to leave it to your own examination, because during the progress of your resistance against the ...icks it may seem a great deal to you.Keep it carefully sir.Now we come to the case which you found concealed behind keyhole number ten.you may not think it an extraordinary case, and indeed it isn't as far as ... case go.I have used it myself for a year, not so much because I needed a case as because it belonged to a very wonderful christian man ...person, and liked to think that I had in my hand that he had once carried.You have no doubt been studying the situation at vivian ...ickey, and have learned something about syndrom general mansion.Well it is his cane and one of our [illegible] clandelinian boyscouts swiped it from him and brought it to me...to general Manley when you can, and get your staff too and have a council before you search the other keyholes."

To say that Mildred hurried back to Regans house would be putting it mildly.She urged her horse on at a fast, that apparently its hoofs did not hardly touche the ground, and she burst in upon Madge and Regan, breathless, dishevelled and almost if not quite unconscious.She told Madge she was going to see general Evans right away,as something very important had occurred and that she must come along. Then they started out. But the great general did not seem to be very much surprised.On the contrary he was smiling a gratified smile, as he produced an envelope from his safe. ...he held handing it to Mildred, had been expecting this, though I ...confess, I did not think the little girlscout would reach so far in the search quite so soon.She is brighter than even I could have imagined, and I will tell you Miss Gladys what I have here for her...is a gift in trust for her.It is a more better clue to find the other keyhole.And how quick all be finished...You are a very bright little girlscout.Indeed my dear Mildred, and I congratulate you upon ...the find, and it makes me receive your command, all the more...she will ...ish shelbe make a great girlscout officer some day I believe, in the near future."

All of which speech Mildred heard, but took in very little of the significance of it just at that time.She had vaguely examined the outside of the envelope finding it to be an important note from the ... far distant vivian Girls at Vickey hamshire to the same effect as ... the General had been saying, but now she was rather stunned by it all.She felt she ought to say something appropriate yet for the life of her she could think of no words in which to express what she felt.But a little discourt Indeed my dear Mildred, and I congratulate you upon ...the find, and it makes me receive your command, all the more...she will ...ish shelbe make a great girlscout officer some day I believe, in the near future."

The thought too ... that they looked ... her father curiously as she walked ... but she did not feel like stopping for any more conversation. A terrible thing had happened. Her hot key for precious key, had been ... her only means of unlocking ... many wonderful secrets, about the secretly hidden away plans of the enemy, ... one, ... gone, and now she would ... not be able to discover the rest of the foul planned surprises. And in one of the letters Harley had said the last was the most important ... how would she ever recover from those dreadful disappointment ... how could she ... but even in the midst of her distress, she was drawn as if by a magnet to the old mystery house, and before she realized it she found herself almost at the very doorstep again. Well I might as well go in ... she thought. "I'll take one more look at that thirteen keyhole in that small bookcase, and see if the key might be lying around somewhere where I hadn't thought to look." and she even prayed that she might find it. Accordingly she went straight to the tumbled down bookcase, and began anew her search for the key... she ... all the books, and left them neatly on the floor in order ... one might see ... it had slipped back on the shelves behind. ... put the ... the shelves were bare of everything but dust, so she put the ... back all thick, and stood ... carefully looking ... thirteenth keyhole, so ... had ... from the central ... bookcase of the bookcase...

"...and when are you coming back there again I would like to know?"

"Oh I can't know just yet,"said Mildred smiling,"Not before next summer I'm sure with you to the army under the Vivian Girls soon. You can be me though by coming there now you know."

"Look here"said general Evans with a sudden decision"this won't do at all."You've got to come back if I'm here yet--you've got to come back and make me a visit."

Mildred indeed was very much flattered.

"Would you really like to have me so soon"she asked.

"I don't ask any people unless I really want them.Now would you like to come and live with me altogether with your sisters eh, and be the special companions of violet,and her nicknames eh!"

Indeed general Evans asked this question, very startling question indeed in just the same tone as he was wont to use in asking for a second helping of pudding. Mildred thought she must have misunderstood the meaning.

"To live with you sir!"she repeated in blank,"I and my sisters to be your own private little family!"

"That is not exactly, but I mean because you have parents, and I cannot take you from them, but I want to be on friendly companions and the special side of the Vivian Girls, which will mean lots of you and them special high rides like Percivale Armitage, and like Nicholas, and come there."

Mildred the two returned to "Jack."

"You are very kind"she faltered,"very kind indeed,"But you see I must go as a whole, not one to the of such a choice. I'm not worthy of such a think you."

"Bother about not being worthy.Can't you see you're better commission without all that?"

"I don't think I could"said Mildred"and you've such good little girls and so brave I'm sure I might be a little afraid in their company.I might to a slight disorder and possibly ruin their discipline."

"As for a soldier in your own regiment, as Lucille Dickson told me you record for [illegible]."

"Yes you see I must be [illegible]."

"Don't you see [illegible]d Evans."And such a combination would keep you sisters always with and instead of the others you know being in another regiment.Can't the corporal [illegible] try to get better commissions?"

"I don't think they could."Later called."And I hope all hope of should all be together with very soon, and we [illegible] since I've been [illegible] the shoulder."

There was [illegible] Mildred's color, but [illegible] in the time ago.Indeed the child herself could not have told why it [illegible] she was missing her mission [illegible] afternoon [illegible] done had she [illegible] any time since coming [illegible] Vivian Girls, and now thought that if she could only [illegible] while [illegible] have confidence to [illegible] the [illegible] shoulder, and [illegible] Lizzie [illegible] around her, she would be very [illegible] severe than I thought at first"

"I'm afraid your wound must be very severe [illegible] instead of coming said Evans."I ought to have kept you here [illegible] you to [illegible] dressing the wound."

However he said no more on the subject of Mildred's return to the Vivianite camp, but in the course of that night [illegible] condition from the wound had disturbed him, for he was more [illegible] before. The [illegible] very ill afternoon than Mildred had ever seen him [illegible] before.

[illegible] herself was not silent [illegible] together, for Mildred [illegible] the cool in a talkative mood and [illegible] with Polly, [illegible] anything fresh air [illegible] through the [illegible] camp [illegible] to the encampment edge. They were [illegible] through the [illegible] Mrs, then an officer of the Borough Child Scouts, in [illegible] who was attending [illegible] to [illegible] officers, asked them [illegible] to go off, and came hastily forward [illegible] to general Evans to stop.

"I beg your pardon your excellency"he said apologetically, as the general brought his column to a halt"but I called at your headquarters on rather important military business.I don't know whether you heard of it or not, but there has been a massacre of refugees near one of the encampments in your own territory.Many of the [illegible] in the fight that ensued were captured and all faced the firing squad."

"No I didn't know that there was any massacre it's too bad, and as to the rascals facing the firing squad,I didn't know it either; not that it makes any special difference to me that I can see--it certainly don't my opinion of course not, but I thought you might wish to avoid going near the place.The enemy has been somewhat successful in his attack in that neighborhood."

"Did you think I would be afraid of a mere regiment of [illegible] soldiers?"

"No, no sir, but I thought that possibly"and the general looked [illegible] "it's a little [illegible] companion.

"Well I see [illegible] you need not worry. I have no intention of going [illegible] I see [illegible] of refugees which refugee camp had been attacked."

"At the settlement where you have [illegible] friends in the small white gray house on [illegible] sir."

[illegible] "the child did this morning, and it was to me a moment' [illegible] I was moved [illegible] I heard a volley of shots fired some [illegible] [illegible] the [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]

"...I [illegible]," the [illegible], "[illegible] Mildred [illegible] at your house."

"...[illegible] ...me that! I did [illegible] it, [illegible] discovered that the [illegible] of our camp were in [illegible] ...from Glandelinians, we'll moved within the center of the [illegible] girlscout [illegible] at once, while General Evans insisted on taking her home with him at once. And he did not want my little girl to be exposed to the enemy's fire either. I was sorry to have Mildred taken away from my house, but under the circumstances so serious and critical, I felt that I could not properly object."

"No indeed," said Hazel earnestly. "It would be terrible if Susan was shot too. This great general Evans has been very kind to Mildred--she has often spoken of him in her letters."

"To the enemy he is terrible," said Mr Farrol smiling. "And he certainly has taken a wonderful fancy to Mildred. I never saw a man more utterly crushed and distressed than he was when he came to my house yesterday afternoon to tell me about Mildred. You know it was while out riding on horseback with him, that they met the doctor who first discovered she was wounded. Susan told me, she came back from an old rickety house there with a brass key, [illegible] trying to find out a mystery, complaining. or telling her she was wounded. Susan suggested going to a doctor with her and while on the way met General Evans who advised her to take a horseback ride with him. Then it was discovered she was wounded."

"...Mildred never complains," said Hazel sadly. "Oh Mr Farrol I hope Susan will escape the Glandelinians. They might [illegible] her too for she was with the [illegible] and [illegible] exposed [illegible] the enemy [illegible] of [illegible]

[illegible] every time [illegible] think more [illegible] very much [illegible]

[illegible] by [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] reached the [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] General Evans took Mildred into [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]

the blue eyes that were so like Mildreds to his face."It surely wasn't you fault, for from my experience with them I believe the Glandelinians can fool 'im' ourselves.you were not used to the nature of the Glandelinians, no girl could be, and we are the boys."

A softened expression crept over the hard stern face of the general.

"Maybe not"said general Knox huskily"Maybe I haven't God help me I won't."

And then he turned with a stride like one in pain, and without another word, walked quickly away. The workeeper opened a door on the opposite side of the hall, and Hazel followed her into a large handsomely furnished room.The blinds were closed, to keep the smoky atmosphere out if possible but even in the dim light she could make out various objects,the bureau and table covered with a woman in the garb of a professional nurse, was bending still over Mildred, who on the bed writhing in pain could that be Mildred,that little child with the fearful face, with pain drawned face and crimson cheeks and swollen left hand. Poor bright brave little Mildred, whose quick ear had never before failed to catch the sound of her elders step, whose face had never failed to brighten with a glad, welcoming smile.Despite of all her desperate efforts of self control, and her prayers to God and His blessed mother for help in her distress,Hazels knew more choking no than she could scarcely stand.The housekeeper then protecting arm around her, and the nurse bowed to her place.

"Hush,darlings." Turned the elder sister, with trembling lips evidently "Mildred is very severe pain, but you needn't be frightened,it's only the result of the removal of the adiets, and the results of the fever."

"Why, I like "Her?"

"Poor child", and the nurse went over to the little figure sitting in pain, and touched the burning forehead and hand. It is like pleasant

"Some one has come to see you dear."

The child's head moved restlessly on the pillow, a look of pain swept across her face, the lips uttered, a faint moan, and that was all...

"Speak to her dear If."the nurse whispered, moving aside to make room for the new comer.Next moment Hazel was on her knees beside the bed and the little burning swollen hand in hers.

"Mildred---Mildred, darling don't you know me?It is Hazel."

If the sound of the voice she loved so well had power to rouse Mildred,Mildred turned her eyes heard her as no other sound could have done.

Hazel.

"Hazel"she murmured feebly,faintly"Hazel dear, I'm so glad you've come,I hope I shall be all right now."

FAN IMPOSES, AND GOD DISPOSES.

GLANDELINIAN FOOLS PLAYING UNKNOWN ENEMIES.

SUSAN LAINE LOSES HER TEMPER.

CHERYL EVANS TELLS A SECRET.

The Glandelinians two of four in the party who had shot Mildred behind her back through an open windowcame however last horses and as a foriegner had been captured who had been a witness to the shooting they seized him, and in a short time the five were out and away from the christian lines for about sixty miles.Their escape was good, and the, had evoided the searching parties, the Gemini, and even the Vivianites who were searching the very territory for them.

Unknown to them however at a certain distance off, was a large party or not party rather but a full regiment of a reinforcing troop of Barrough girl and boyscout rangers of the county Minch Degree ap. rish encamped.One of the Glandelinians believing to be in the neighborhood of christian armies that may be advancing to reinforce pansion suggested a detour around the town of Mullikin, as the inhabitants being christian might seize them, as they in their escapade had had no time to change uniforms or put on civilie disguise.The others could be confident that escape was good, and no sooner he have never been rejected his this advice, and declared they would pretend they were christian spies, and had captured the foriegner on the charge of aiding a christian invasion train.They declared they could all present credentials at any christian out post one, could see the and why as it was now dark and rain was falling, they did not see how they could ever be discovered. They couldn't be captured or detained under any condition.That was impossible now. They did not of course anticipate any approach or any encampment of christians being any where near,as there had been none anywhere within eighty miles of Vivian Vicky.Their Christian passes and credentials they declared, positively would be of service and they knew them were genuine and strong amongst christians of any kind.

On that dark rainy night after having dismounted from their horses,as they were tired of riding, they recieved a sort of chill, for the, noticed on their right strangely colored and yet dark small objects moving like four legged animals to the right.They first thought they were Chivevinian wild dogs or wolves, which strange to say(maybe because God allowed it to be because people are so good there in this story) are not any more dangerous than kittens, but as they advanced in the fast moving darkness, they certainly recieved a ice cold back chill, for they saw they were in overwhelming troop of boy and girlscout Rangers of the Barrough, on horseback.To escape was impossible, to fire on them was committing suicide as they don't care any more about Glandelinians than any one cares about lions.

They forcibly halted the five, and surrounding them relieved them of their horses.The foriegner being English and not understanding a word in Abbleonnian could not understand that the child soldiers said. But at their shouts, others came fromdifferent directions, and the enemy suddenly realized they were reallly and entirely surrounded.The boys and girls were the strange large beautifully decorated heart shaped hats way back on their heads similar to those of Spartans Angelines girlscouts and the boys were large purple peak fronted caps, so the Glandelinians knew what they really were up against. And if these knew two of them had shot Mildred why-----

It guessed best for the Glandelinians who knew their guilt to ward off all suspicion if possible.They encircled the five men, and hustled them on foot, down a hill were many large dark objects in the gloom indicated the camp and they being tents.They were hurried into a big tent, where ten boyscouts and girl friends squatted about a table with a lamp on it, playing some sort of a chess game. They looked up with fierce ipuks and scorls, and the Glandelinians could see at once that they were suspicious of them being spies, shantaut they know about the shooting of Mildred or not.The Glandelinians asked for the commanding officer but recieved no reply, as Reserve.Boy and girl scouts don't talk to Glandelinians unless to demand questions or so forth. Then one of the boyscouts who were a large peaked camp of red color and whose face looked like a little merry Injuned who was here and whether they had passed parts, where they came from and so forth. The Glandelinians were forced to admit that they had none, although the American at once produced an American passports, Abbleonnian letters of approval, and permits for their inspection.These they examined looked more respectfully upon us, but the Glandelinian permits contemptuously threw aside.

They looked at the Glandelinians fixedly, relieved them of their weapons, and searched them.One of the glandelinians gave a gasp as they drew forth from his pocket a brass key, the one Mildred lost) and examined it closely and seeing letters on it.J.E.Put in in his pocket and scowled.They then whispered together, looked at the Glandelinians again, and finally one by one left the tent leaving three well armed ones to remain on guard.As the Glandelinians could hear coming in and could hear no information from the prisoners, they decided that they were really prisoners, and another thing, if they left the American alive he would blab about the shooting of Mildred. They arose and with drawn knives which they had, secretly hid about them started for the foreigner, but before the nearest man could reach him one of the boyscouts who was watchful as an eagle struck him in the face with his pistol butt and knocked him down with six teeth beaten out of his mouth.Before the other Glandelinians could get the meaning of this,,the boyscout fired a alarm by firing his rifle twice, which brought six strong girl and boyscouts rushing into the tent two carrying ropes.What they then said to the Glandelinians the American could not understand but they were angry.The Glandelinians called Pukkin and John were used upon by three of the very girls and they tried to break through.Their struggles though not successful, infuriated them, and they all went to the ground.As Cheekelin lay in the one girlscout take a kettle of boiling [illegible] the eyes to put on his face unless he depleted.He shut his eyes and turned his head sideways and stopped fighting [illegible], and therefore did not get the water.They tied the wrist of every Glandelinian behind him, and then seated on the ground with feet bound together in front so they could jump the ropes.Then they [illegible] let [illegible] in doing this would sprain and [illegible] When the three Glandelinians were also seated upon and bound in like manner being badly beaten in the process for resisting the child soldiers.

After the Glandelinians had their hands tied behind their backs, roughly, and carefully and thoroughly searched [illegible] in search for more [illegible] weapons, [illegible] which looked suspicious to them from their pockets but found nothing.They asked one of the boyscouts who was not so much hurt to [illegible] done, and were told that they heard one of the fellows say that they were to be shot , although he was uncertain whether it would be in the morning or next day, as they were suspected to be [illegible], because a key with a metal Jack Evans initials was found on one of them.

Strangely enough instead of just then being released by the prospect of the ropes the fighter their minds upon that the child scouts would not [illegible] and quicker without doing [illegible] process which proved [illegible] to be decidedly unpleasant.There therefore was but one thing to do,take what [illegible] possible, without giving their little captors the satisfaction of seeing them weaken.They talked over [illegible] what would ever become of them.

As nearly as they could decide the actual fact would never be determined. The girl scouts could not listen to anything they had [illegible] their hands became numb because of the tightness of the [illegible] and the pain was the most little slave fire, but at such attempt they were struck in the face and knocked back to the ground. To the American they had not done anything, but he was closely watched just the same.

[illegible] Glandelinians were placed in the big tent they never, did know, what was [illegible] them.They were ordered outside.As they left the tent, they could see a couple of boyscouts with rifles standing guard [illegible] fire.The Glandelinians therefore could [illegible] by to each other, [illegible] they could see, the [illegible] firing squad which executed them.They were led a short distance to the left apparently being watched over selected spot to be shot.They were directed however to the small military tent, which they had not seen before. There they were thrown to the ground. Each back to back against a wide tent pole [illegible] were pressed about their bodies and arms and they were securely tied to the pole their wrists still bound in front of them.Then the crowd left them, [illegible] and armed soldiers [illegible] They felt sure they were [illegible] others, for the night and this brought up [illegible] unpleasant prospect, for were they let too many hours in that position with [illegible] the circulation in their hands absolutely stopped, by morning they might be forming [illegible]. And as they were in the hands of their fierce [illegible] girl and boyscouts who are usually inhuman to inhuman to Glandelinians, this might mean the loss of their hands or death, even though the hands were later released.The pain became excruciating. As they had been without food since they fled from the christian lines after the shooting of Mildred, they were weak and hoped the might [illegible] go into a faint, but it was probably well that they did not, for boy and girlscouts were continually entering and leaving the tents. One of the boyscouts really saved the American from the inconvience of being [illegible] brother.He was an older boy, who could speak a certain amount of English.He explained to the boyscout the real situation, that he was a friend, and served the christian army, but that the Glandelinians who had been removed from the tent, had stolen off with him because he witnessed a deed which the Glandelinians did not wish the christians to know of in case they were captured, and the reason too why they [illegible] in with knives in the tent.He then caught enough of the conversation to realize that the boyscout was telling the rest about him [illegible] emphasizing the fact that the foreigner had been made prisoner by the four Glandelinians. The hands of the Glandelinians had been finally released however.They gave the American a better coat, some milk, and some beans in a pan and bread and butter.They even brought him [illegible] cigarettes, which they had first taken from his pockets, put them into his mouth and lighted them for him.

Early next morning a young pretty girlscout officer whose name was Catherine [illegible] arrived, and had the Glandelinians brought before her.She looked over their papers and questioned them severely, especially about the key. The officer went through their kittbags only, confiscating field glasses, finding letters belonging to Mildred Jennings, compasses, and boy and girlscout instruments.Then the Glandelinians were coarsely told they must go back to the christian lines under [illegible].They pleaded they were [illegible], but she roughly told them that they lied, that [illegible] in the Glandelinians anywhere, that there was something very suspicious about them to in their escapade to [illegible] American girl [illegible] to come along with them by kidnapping, and that she [illegible] all, [illegible] in spite of the most dangerous [illegible] but [illegible] the [illegible] lee lines.

Then she went for the American, [illegible] him in [illegible] and had four more brutes [illegible] girlscouts of [illegible] Also she would see by his very [illegible] that he [illegible] was [illegible], and [illegible] of the Glandelinians, [illegible] and from [illegible] found in his pockets and which had been [illegible] Min [illegible] appeared to be [illegible] choice. All that put him in good, and which was the cause [illegible] not treated as prisoner but rather as [illegible] and [illegible] taken the Glandelinians out of the tent, to keep them away from him. Seeing the American passport and other papers which the American produced, she [illegible] for an interpeter.He asked [illegible] questions, really was satisfied with his answers, and ordered the American taken [illegible] to be given papers by which [illegible] to the christian lines.He asked to be sent under guard [illegible] this was [illegible] and in any route but for his own good, because of dreadful pill [illegible] was quickly refused.

For what the crime was, and for which he had been the Glandelinians do, the American felt positively sure that it would be a mortal sin, for him not to report the [illegible] the girlscout Catherine [illegible] through the interpeter for through her help he had been able to prove his identy.

He was brought before her again, and the interpeter asked;

"What ees eet that e se seegh to tell se Mees Kay.?"

"Do you know a good little girlscout by the name of Mildred Manning? who is a Vivianite?"

The boy gave a start;

"Wha, dy yes know, Her.Dhese ees my seester!"

"Your sister?"

"Indeedo dhese ees.Dhes ees van foin leedle girlscout and everbodie heem like her ver much.That ees she matter.Dhese ees your friend."I "very much and I'm sorry you are are brother, for I have bad news for you. Two of these Glandelinian prisoners you have shot her through a window in the back...in..the shoulder blade. or near it.I don't know whether they killed her or not, they grabbed me and carried me away too quick before I could do a thing."

The boy turned pale as white, and swayed and would have fallen had not two others suddenly come to his assistance.He finally recovered himself, and with tears in his eyes turned to the leader and there was a short long sentence of words from him and suddenly she rose to her feet looking white herself.

"The Glandelinians knew what I saw and that is why they captured me.They were going to stab me in the tent so I would not be able to tell anything"continued the American.

The poor boy who was Joe Manning was too grief stricken to be able to do anything more and he was led away,while another interpeter who had been called and told proceedings said to the American;

"Ze girlscout leader, she say, fix Glandelinian prisoners plenty. Say wee feee se general Evanoes, to whom se key belongs and,ha,ha,He weel feex se mayde any all do eet?"

"Only two of them, but the others were with them at the time?."

"Weel may are what se call se complicate in se deed for say were weese sem.Ha,ha feex sem plenty good. e We ought to shoot sem ourselves but we weel leave zem to se great general.Heem wi weel turn zem over to se Veevennoites and sen---ha ha, say weel weesh e say nevare been born."

The prisoners were brought before the girlscout.

The interpeter asked the American;

"Point to se vipeers who shoot se good leedle girlscout Mildreen Manning;"

The American did so, and how they scowled as they realized he had told it all.

Catherine [illegible] rose in a fury against them.

"you vipers, you cowardly black Mennakes in the grass"she screamed; You captured this merican, so he would not be able to tell what you did.We now know it all.You're assassins, and you'll face the wrath of the Vivianites for it.And if she dies, you'll die the same minutes. Take the vipers away.I don't want them in my presence again. See to it their hands are tied again and place extra guards over them."

Catherine Lee decided therefore to go immediately to the christian [illegible] with the prisoners, and to take the shortest and best practicable route, and to get there as quickly as possible. The whole troop soon learned who the prisoners were, and there was gloom among them all, for who amongst these scouts were not acquainted with Wilfred [illegible]. It was as if a curtain of gloomi gloomy forbodings had come over them, and many were tempted to steall the Glandolinians from their tent, and lynch them then and there.

Tomas Halstead of course as we wish the reader to know was not by much a man as his father. At least that is what he did his best to keep away from. Yet to monkey with any girl or boy scouts, no matter if whether they're from the tiniest jungers to the Home guards is like eating coals of fire and drinking gasoline down afterwards. He did not even dare to think of a fight with any of them when there is any decent way out of it, and too he was not aching for the glory that is to be sudden untimely and undone death. And there was no more kind of child scouts that any of the glandolinians dreaded, than the Wivlanites and the Standard regiments because they were the worst to them of all the Prescott rangers.

And the Standard in fact were the Wivlanites. So the more he thought of the morning and the more it came to his mind the ill was a real fact, and not a joke played on him by somebody else, the more he bothered his head about it before it fell asleep like that [illegible]. Yet even though a wicked Glandolinian [illegible] good [illegible] of grit that was equal to that of the bravest of mortals. Though in the morning [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]

For a few moments the revenue officer was silent.Then he looked round, to say to his b"ther the lieutenant;

"George, this warning mess, message makes me think the Island gang of childsdouts, and the leader called Camille Jokson have watching spies and agents even within our ranks.Who can tell amongst our own girlscouts that there isn't Vivianites and others among amongst them.But to detect them is always utterly impossible.Now you catch your Julio Callio vegon train for General Purgatorians headquarters all right but be careful that you are not waylaid by any disguised little vivianites.If you are you'll not be able to escape it all. Why I s see wh, not go by boat. Halstead can you not take the Gunboat through to Julio Callio."

"Yes sir I know the river shore on both sides well."

"Then George, on to go down through the office, inform the telegraph operator that you'll be gone a few days on a trip north and that you are on a furlough.Of course he'll be able but it'll show your child dcoute off of your trail.Tell him you are going to start at once in your s boat,get all other s here to the pier know the same thing, and in form all your boy nd lieuons [illegible] if [illegible] do it carefully.

Then in the unknown little temples are watching, they'll think we're [illegible] out of the [illegible] will be obeying the strange message.Halstead and Jo friend can [illegible] back, we will [illegible] along in these waters after dark..."""" ex

So fired steps of that plan were accordingly followed out.Then they reached the pier they found the boy soldier Joe D Darnell aboard the "Joan Of Arcbeam....."

"Ok, ready for a cruise"Joe." was called out."We're going along the coast."

"For how long?"queried Dharonia.

"Can't tell old Cock come back."Halstead.There were many reasons Glandelinian be and disguise on the pier.Tom hoped that one or two of the natives might be listening on behalf of the unknown enemy, but strange to him and unknown to him, the generals plan had been overheard and would be allowed to frustrate it if possible.

It may be said that Devil himself the old pilot, scowled at the [illegible] child meaning of rather"Look out, we'll have news."

Quickly enough the "Joan Sunbeam" was off.As they sped along from in [illegible] Tom and Joe [illegible] happened, and [illegible] and plotted for both of them.

"Gee, I couldn't be h[illegible]"old Joe, his eyes shining shining at the prospect of real [illegible]

Callio was made [illegible] without mishap or trouble, and after the[illegible] had come ashore,the [illegible] and fresh water tanks were filled. Food supplies and plenty more of munition were taken aboard.Then they sailed,"The Sunbeam"crew, and the revenue officer.It was late in the afternoon, when they sped out of Julio Callios river harbor.With the [illegible] of the night came on dark and misty, the sky red and [illegible] with distant fires,though there was no smoke fog. And it looked as if[illegible] conflagration was brewing.They were still a few miles south of the island.The electric port and the starboard lights were burning, and Tom climbed aloft with masthead lantern.Tom suddenly switched on the searchlight to pick up Julio Callio.

"Don't do that"one quietly from General Princeton.

Tom flashed [illegible] him inquiringly.

"Put out your sidelights and haul down that masthead light also."added the General.

"Not much"snorted Tom emphatically;"then added more quietly"I'm sorry General but I cannot obey your od orders on that.It's against the law to run in these navigable waters without proper lights at night.And we might be run down by a bigger boat."

"So"smiled the general."Daveon hold, the lantren closer please."

By the light he wrote rapidly on a big pad that he drew from a pocket. "Give the wheel to [illegible]aw Dandonia captian, and we,d this,"

Indeed by the light of the lantren Tom read these words;

"Captian Thomas Halstead is hereby [illegible]uthorized and ordered to run whatever whatever craft he operates without lights as much as he may be directed by the undersigned on this night."

It was dated and signed by general Princeton with his official title. That's a perfectly legal order from the War [illegible]epartment of Glandelin which can issue such an order in all Glandelinian waters. "The general assured the young Glandelinian soldier."Now out with the lights we'll [illegible] stand with you Halstead,and We'll both use our sharp eyes in the place of lights."

"It feels sort of [illegible]eanny to be running along in the dark like this but then those on shore can't see us either."complained [illegible]om good humoredly. "It makes me feel like a smuggler or thief in the night, on a pirate."

"It's absolutely absolutely necessary though if we want to do our work right in the dark."g replied general. Princeton."On a night like this and with a sunboart the color of the "Joan Sunbeam" we won't be visible at much distance without lights, and too if we had the lights on, they might draw fire on us from both sides." And too we can get close to the mysterious island without betraying our presence, provided the moon and stars don't come out behind the great clouds of smoke.....

"If the chugging of our engine din't betray us."om observed, as he noticed qu r queer strange colored lig lights on the island.

"Can't that be silenced."

"Why if we run along at six. smiles,I don't believe the engine would make much n oise enough to be heard even a quarter of a mile away." Tom answered.

"Let's slow the engine down then, and let me listen."

"Tom obeyed.The revenue officer was delighted.

"If you are right Halstead.The noise of the engine wouldn't be heard over the noises of the water at any real distance distance.All right.Now put on more speed speed until we get near the island.Then slow down at least at a five mile gait."

"And where to?"inquired the youthful gunboat skipper.

"To due north of that strange inland of yours.Come to a stop a little more than half a mile from the island.That being done you,Youll lie to while I take the tender and you ashore. you'll stay about where you stop until I return."

"You're going ashore on that dangerous island?"asked Tom with a start.

"Just that."

"Alone?"

"Yes Halstead, and Halstead, should any pirating stumper by chance [illegible]e aboard you hide I'm gone, you'll have your pistols to use."

Halstead gave a slight shiver.He began to have a notion of the eerie environment of the lights work.It shoot child's scouts was a dangerous short [illegible] of business. They usually get you first.

"I'll make haste to get ashore and return to you by half an hour before daylight."continued the revenue agent general."All right,take me on.But if I shall to come back then get away before daylight gets the[illegible] to [illegible] Callio, and wait word from me."

"But I hope you o won't have bad luck that to some others who have come ashore on that island, and vanished for good and all."Latter [illegible]on gloomily.But the general merely smiled in a way that showed his fine white teeth. being at such short speed it took them a long while to reach the point ordered nearly of the "Joan Sunbeam." Then at last they drove to, the general lowered himself into the tender and were away.The two soldier boys watchedtillll the little boat was lost to sight in the darkness. Then Tom and joe(go and blow) looked at each other, but where were they to blame because little silver rain streaks on face, of each. As the minutes dragged slowly by the murkiness of the blackness of the night, and the glare of fires increased.The sky in the distance was covered with clouds of smoke having the shape and color of immense cyclone clouds, and the under part of these clouds [illegible]e so aglare as to appear molten.and at times flashes as if from lightning [illegible] the clouds [illegible] exploding shells. Tom frequently held his watch close to his face to read the time.

"It seems like hours passing."he muttered to Joe, who was seated on the deckhouse.. just barely creeping, the engine all but reluctant"the Joan Sunbeam- ran a little distance, then returned, keeping always a close to the spot where General Princeton had left them.

"I wonder what onearth he's doing over there"mused Halstead, peering at the barely discernible island as the strange colored lights on its [illegible] skyline had disappeared suddenly.

"And I wonder what's happening to General over there,even the lights went out."added Joe thereto.I don't like the notion that there is [illegible] disaster over there.It's an awful place for any one to go on such a night."

The minutes finally went into hours, but the Glandelinian General did not come back.Nor had anyone come to the ships bucky, engineers, [illegible] pile back against the rail, seeking to [illegible]atch and recover the hour of midnight, when there came a faint far away, shot or sound like one that made the young Glandelinian skipper fairly jump up in surprise.

"Joe did ye hear that?"he demanded sharply.

"Eh, what."queried Dawsonia, yawning himself and leaving up. "It sounded like a rifle shot over on the island."

"Have you strowning a bitt?"asked Joe suspiciously.

"Not sir.Not a bit of it.I'm sure I heard a rifle shot."

"We don't hear any others."answered Dawsonia."There can't be a real fight going on then?"

"If General Princeton was the victim of some dangerous child scouts, there might be no need of [illegible]ccess shot."said Tom uneasily.

They [illegible]ndered ten minutes at least for another shot, and then gave it up.But nevertheless the [illegible] suspense was tearing on the young Glandelinian soldiers.. They would have been much better satisfied, to be over there on the island, knowing just what was happening...2.2.2 Joes sleepiness having vanished, that Glandelinian soldier boy, stood beside Tom after Both were now keeping their eyes open, and their ears trained for anything that might develope. It was a little after two o'clock in the morning, and they were moving at a snails pace east, when Joe suddenly clutched at the rail, leaning far out to peer toard the island.

"What do you see?" demanded Tom.

"Something floating on the [illegible] the water." rejoined Dawsonia.

Tom took a swift look, then gradually brought the bow of the sunboat [illegible] about so as to head close to the object.Both boy soldiers were feeling a [illegible] creepy.

"Well goodness gracious"Universe Dawsonia at last."It's only a robot!"

"Why it looks like [illegible] to me."returned Tom circling closer. "And it's bottom up too."

They ran in close enough now to enable Joe to learn fat over and catch the hook against the over turned boat.

"It's ... tender."exclaimed Halstead."Joe there's some mystery, here. We have got to know right, quick what it all means"

Kicking the lever control with one foot, to stop the engine altogether, Tom lent a hand to his chum.Between them they got the small light boat fairly alongside, and presently managed to right it.The oars were missing, but the row locks were fast inplace.. The two young Clandelinians stared at each other, each with an increasing feeling of awe.

"Of course"protested Joe hoarsely"this doesn't prove that general Princeton has been killed.It doesn't show that even anything more has happened to him.The boat through some accident might have become adrift"But-oh dear.

"It looks like something is wrong."retorted Tom stoutly."It looks as though matters couldn't be worse.Say-------quit here...."""Quick!!!!

Halstead ran nimbly aft.In a secret place under neath the standing room was an extra pair of short oars.These he secured and returned.

"Bring the tender alongside."he directed."I'm going ashore."

"Gee too!"inquired Jeremiah eagerly.

"Well that doesn't seem hardly likely does itlike can't exactly abandon Clandelinian cruising gunboat to float along until its captured or wrecked by those little curs."retorted Halstead as he lowered himself over the side."Now see here Joe if I'm not back after a quarter of three you lit up a blow speedget out of sight before daylight comes in and get a squadron of ships teeming with men over to this island and have them attack it. You know General Princeton didn't want the boat visible from the island.So don't forget."

"But you--if I have to leave you behind?"objected Joe.

"In that case you'll have to leave it to me to hide myself and the boat, and get over to the mainland to morrow night.But very likely" he added"I'll meet General Princeton, and then I'll have his orders.Now I've got to shove off and hustle."

"Good bye good luck and take care of yourself."called Joe in a low but wistful voice, for these two chums were very fond of each other.

Tom bent to the oars, pulling away with strong strokes, and as long once as he could take.As he glanced behind him over his shoulders he saw the island gradually growing bigger and nearer.At last he paused to listen and look about.When he had made up his mind where to land he rowed in very close.The bottom of the boat rasped over a sunken rock but this danger was passed in safety.Tom beached the boat quickly and leaped ashore.

"I'll cruise about a bit.he thought."Then if I find it all safe and quiet about here, I'll haul the tender up and hide her in the bushes."

It was so dark here that the youthful Clandelinian soldier had need of his keenest sight as he tried to make his way in over the large river island.At this point there lay a flat stretch inland for quite a distance.Tom prowled slowly past the big pine trees, his heart beating faster than he liked.It seemed too as if though the racket that making that organ was making was enough to betray him.How still and gloomy it was, and if there were supposed to be child scouts on the island there was not even a sign of any of their guards. At some little natural sound of the night,Tom felt his flesh creep.He wondered if his hair were now standing up straight. Then he went stealthily past a big mostly shaped pine tree.Just at this instant Tom gave a violent start.

He felt rather than saw a half a dozen small childish shadows leap out at him.Crack.Biff.Crack. Swat Thud. Socko. "Flat to the ground went Tom face downward. down ard. It had all been done in a breath.Now it seemed that nearly half a score fair I child dish knees held him down, while others seemed to have a firm grasp of his shoulder blade.The Clandelinian soldier was absolutely pinned, helpless for though he knew they were only mere "kids"the had him, one of them seemed to be even stronger than he was. He could not stir, and would not cry out as it would not do a world of good.Then he felt his right arm being roughly seized and forcibly bent behind his back by more than a pair of hands. It was held in place by those grinding knees upon it, him.The left arm followed.Then one of those little captors was soon lashing his wrists together with the speed and skill of an old sailor.

Tank.Tom came to his feet most unceremoniously, dragged by those half dozen strong pairs of children so quickly that it literally made his teeth strike against each other. In another moment he was being hurried forward before them and being prodded by bayonets.Then forward and down on his face he flopped again.

"Get up."A vicious childish voice commanded very shrilly."Get up and stand still."

"He obeyed.

"And don't dare run or you'll get a score of bullets into you.Understand boy."came the girls voice again.

Tom didn't even think of trying to run, it would plainly be suicide. And all this had been done in terrifying silence.The boy had not even an actual look at one of his captors.There were however two other motives in this game, a big coarse handkerchief, a few times folded was suddenly drawn over his eyes and knot fast.

"Follow us.March"the commanded.

He did so for what seemed about ten minutes and he wondered if he wasn't making a circle of the island.

"Halt"came the command.

And he obeyed at once. Through the folds of the cloth over hiseyes Halstead saw the flicker of a match uncertainly.Then the strong fumes of a pine knott torch assailed the boys nostrils...

"Now I guess you are our own prat prey,Clandelinian"commenced the captor in a low voice, but the sound was like that of the cry cry of a distant bird."And you can right now begin to forget your part life and start a new life with us---all except what we want to know, and we see you're a Clandelinian, and probably a spy."

It had all indeed taken place at such terrific speed that the young Clandelinian skipper was still all ina whirl. For the first few moments he could realize only that he had fallen into the "clutches"of these dangerous Vivianite, if not other kind of child scouts, who if they found any evidence against him of being a spy would not show him the least mercy.Then the wonder came to him as to whether the general had fallen it into the same sort of a trap.

"What brought you on our signal island to night?"demanded the low but shrill girlish voice.

That brought the young Clandelinian soldier more to his senses.

"What brought me here to night?"he repeated."Why my feet did."

"Once upon a time a scouts we scouts did a lot of foolish work to Clandelinian vipers like you,"retorted the unknown girlscout still more savagely.."It was b because he tried to give me funny answers."

"I'm not giving you any funny answers."

"Well it sounded like it. I suppose you may or may not know whom have made you prisoner prisoners?"

"The vivianites."

"No we're the Standard girl and boyscouts.The vivianites are not in this location at all.Now are you doing here to night?"

"What am I doing on this island?"Tom repeated."I become to me you boy and girlscouts are in a far better situation to know about that than I am.and I don't see anything at all strange and funny in this situation all at all.And if there is any fun to it,then you child scouts who ever you are are hogging all of it.put enjoy yourself.!------"

A stinging slash of the whip on Tom face was the answer.

"Now see here Clandelinian boy soldier I'm not going to stand for any nonsense."came the warning sharp and quick."You have been prowling around this island on the launch or gunboat to night, and you have been here twice or no before. If you're not a spy what I in the world are you doing it for."

"Why I've been forced to cruise around here,"Tom answered,"Because I'm hired to run that big gunboat for the owner.He sure took quite a fancy to this island not knowing there is any one on it?"

"Indeed, and why?"came the question, sharp edged. as a knife.

"That is something I cannot tell you"protested. Tom. "One of the lieutenants hired me to not as skipper on his ornormous new gunboat.He takes a good notion to cruise about an island that for some good reason attracts his fancy,and do you think he would go ahead and tell me his reasons which is none none of my business.The only thing I'm hired for now is because he leads."

"Stop it" came the ugly order. "I don't want to hear any line line of oration or speach from any of you Clandelinian vipers for any steering steering off the course.and besides we don't give a hang what you want to know whats on this island, there's nothing for your inquisitive little complexes to find out anyhow.but we know many of you Clandelinians are always up to some trick or other,and since a bunch of your cronies but the vivianite girlscout Mildred Manning, we're laying for the whole bunch of you to trap you right here. You can answer a every question that I am asking,and believe me you're going to do it and how for if you don't ,well you'll go the way that some other crazy Clandelinian fools have maybe some."

That threat though a trees one, somewhat vague though it was made Tom's blood flush once more.There could be no mistaking, the desperate fury of this unknown Standard girlscout girl officer whatever she was.

There was silence for a moment right after which some slightly sharply trained ears made him feel sure that some very low whispering was going on not far away.Then there must be some other Standard girl or boyscout leaders present, directing this early examination. There was a sop beside the Clandelinian boy soldier again.

"Quick". yelled the youthful skipper in spite of himself himself for some thing pointed and sharp, like a big pin or a hatpin had been jamb jabbed into his left arm.

"It is not necessary for you to go ahead and take such a fuss about a little thing like that."Joined in unknown girlscout."Why don't even a taste of what is coming your way if you don't loosen up and you come to give me real sensible answers to the questions we apply to you. now------"

That last word was followed by another and deeper jab in the left self this time, and though this time on hearing a to repress all but a low groan he couldn't help jumping just he cried.

"One was that Clandelinian general that landed here to night?"persisted the girlscout.

"I don't know!"

"Maybe you do and maybe you don't Clandelinians tell lies till they're black in the face.If you don't know who he was, what is he doing here.?"

The question gave the soldier boy such an inward scare that for the instant he forgoet to attempt any answer.Anyway that question told him was what he wanted more than anything else in the world to know, that these standard child scouts outside island and at least seen heard of captain the Clandelinian cruiser officer.If only they would give him more time so but had befallen the Governments servant.

"I don't know what he was doing here."

"Well what's his name?"insisted the questioner.
"I don't know."
"What's his name?"repeated the girlscout more severely.
"I'll---I'll---"stammered the young glandelinian skipper."It pollar---re not t t ellAre I have the name on the tip of my tongue on instant ego.."
"What in the world is he then!"X came the stiff demand.
"I don't---I know what he is.I know he's a general,and that is all."
lied the glandelinian skipper.
"How did he happen to be cruising in our local then?"
"Why he's some relative of the mother,I believe."Tom replied with such an air of candor that it seemed to produce some effect upon the questioner.
"But what was he doing on the gunboat and he had to come here on this island---in the dead of the night."
That says the glandelinian officer somewhat clearer.If Princeton is gone there can be in the world,if his province has not been deserted and if in the dead of the night, then it was wholly likely that many man like the General had learned much about the island and the strange regiment of students scouts who in numbers ten to one outnumber the way the gunboat, if we had evidence of it, had been captured etc.
But if General Princeton had only escaped, then he might have carried away with him information enough to close up the islands entirely.Yet that hope dimly to be pinning much for the revenge against me."
"Here we have little girlscout of the Quindelan regiments of Stand ards"pronounced Tom,"you and your followers have lost the ship and over me only enough. I have not the least doubt in the world,as soon as you and your girlscout followers get to discover you have also lost me also and to me, don't you suppose I'd much rather have been here? We are trying to with one question another mother, about the business of missing officers from the regiments some reason or other are not likely to tell me about their plans finding, and the like.You've got nearly a fearfully fast place, and you made foolish enough I think I wouldn't get myself out of it if I could."
All this the glandelinian soldier uttered as convincingly as he could trying with all the heart to impress upon unknown to board girlscout, that he the was a prisoner of war rather than a spy.
fierceness against glandelinians.Here was another prisoner,Tom hoped that his argument must be once more. Big rifle with one the idea who was in position to the investigation.Finally,the childish voice stopped back to his side.
"Now see here boy soldier."from the child scout I understand well enough more than anything else, that you've got plenty of pride, all you glandelinians seem to have no matter how wicked or bad a thing you did that you are always I have to be proud of, but that won't gain you anything.Now tell all of your fool things in the future himself, and that isn't what I want or will be satisfied to accept as goodness concerns and nothing in all to the sky.If you don't get through it is bad."
"Well,"pronounced Tom,he tried to make his voice sound more cheerful in the brave effort to deceive the girlscout,"your into the belief that he can a way out of the trouble now.
"Will you give be my word honest to goodness answers then?"
"Goodness sake,from you think I am not only too anxious?"sneered Tom."I'm in a hurry to get out of here,now!" you please leave me something to think, and I can use my own knowledges instead of plying me with questions about something I won't know!"lied the young skipper.
"Now you are playing the fool with me again."came the shrill tones."
"Telling all those lies will get you boy deeper into trouble, instead of getting out of it."
"Now see here girlscout."pleaded Tom with all the dignity in his voice that he could put there."you are making up a lot of strange impossible to be answered questions,let you don't want me to make up the answers.I know you don."
"I told you the kind of answers I want."came the coldest prayful reply."I know that you and your followers, one which was another boy and a girl with you"were on this island yesterday.You came here to night with a man, and another young upstart in the boat,he remained in the boat and you came ashore.now there's something suspicious in that."
Tough as the unknown was, there was patience mingled with the note of warning."
"Good night"muttered the boy, a one shudder running through him."now please be kind enough to tell me a sensible question, and make it on one that a boy who is merely working for some one else will be likely to know how to answer.""""AA
"Well why has your big gunboat been cruising about our mysterious, island and decks by night and day?If you don't answer to that you are then a spy and---"It isn't my gunboat Miss---began the glandelinian boys soldier protestingly!
"Stop lying to me"raged his girlscout captor.
"I it isn't my gunboat"persisted Halstead tenaciously"nd I didn't give the orders.My orders came from the lieutenant, and I only obeyed them.
s it is my duty."
"Why is the lieutenant cruising about here night and then day and again on us, then?"
"He isn't going any such thing to night."
"He isn't?Well where is he then?"
"I took him to general Purgatorians headquarters this morning!"
"Was he going any further?"
"No."

"You lie.He was going further.I overheard his conversation with you."
"Gotta Catherine, I think."
"Don't you know for sure?"
"He said he was going to Gotta Catherine.That's all I do know about his movements to day."
"This is not to say, this is to night.When is the lieutenant coming back, and what is he doing at Julio Calio and Norma Catherine.Between our islands I suppose."?
"Honestly don't know."Tom made reply.
All of those answers halstead felt that he had kept all in the bounds of what it could do no harm to tell, whether he told lies or not, not for General Princeton or his brother themselves had taken pains to circulate this information at the moment,but she knew that the soldier boy was pretty telling like so well to the truth, and therefore there was a note of triumph in her voice as she now shot in suddenly what;;;
"If your lieutenant he was, why did you come on this island, and at night. If you came at day it wouldn't look so suspicious."
"He left me at the order of the brother of his."
"The Glandelinian General , asked you about---the one who landed here to night."?"?!!..!
"Yes I imagine so."answered Halstead"That is if he really did succeed in landing on this island."
"Then you did not come ashore with him?"insisted the unknown girlscout.
"He"answered Tom promptly and honestly this time."
"When did you land?"
"Just when you jumped on me and carried me to the ground."
"You are mistaken.I didn't jump on you or carry you to the ground.
It was seven of us boy and girlscout who did startled I jumped on you, believe me I'd been rougher with you."
From the way she cross examined, the captor might, had she been grown up man or woman have made a good legal lawyer. For her next question came fiercely and with the effect of a good trap.
"If you did bring a Glandelinian soldier, know why the general came on this island so night."
"He said he had heard a good deal about this island being full of the ghosts of dead murdered christian children, and child scouts who had been killed in fights, and he wanted to make the trip by night."Tom rejoined."This was also wholly the truth in one way, especially about the lieutenant,for Glandelinians are superstitious, though it gave the girlscout no information worth anything.
"How come on, come on, why did he want to see the island,that reason did the general really give.Ghosts on this island.Why the" idea of such a crazy idea.What do we look like.Tramp.? I suppose if you heard the cry of a robin you'd run ashame you'll say you saw a ghost.
Come out with the truth for right here boy is where you can save yourself by telling the truth."
"And right here,protested Tom"is where you begin again to suppose that military officers who give me their orders, also tell me their reasons, you forget it seems to me that I'm only a buck Handler, employed only a few weeks by officers I'm very likely never to see again after this trip or so."
"Now you're trying to fool me again,but you can't put off the trail like that."warned the unknown girl in an ugly shrill voice."I understand what I want to know, and I know too that you know a great deal more than you'll willing to part with, for one of my records saw you show that piece of map to the General,and his brother,and also saw you produce that package that one of the Princeton leaders sent you in order to keep you away from this island.he sent the complaint of your ruse to her, and she sent that warning message.I've been patient with you, because its only that you're a Glandelinian boy soldier if not a scout, as you don't uniform like a Glandelinian boyscout.but from this minute you've got to begin telling me all you know.Do you understand or would you rather take the chance of a show of torture and tortured as badly as I know how it is to be done."
"And you call yourselves christian do ne, and sore. Glandelinians."
"We've never had the idea of calling ourselves christian dogs. and don't you even to torture the children when you have on in our power. If you want to get out of it tell me all you know."
"I've told you all I know"
"All right George,Do your work."
Suddenly the boy felt a big rough hand grip him by the right arm a little way below the shoulder, and that big hand began to press like a vise.At first mingled merely a tingle, but as the pressure and pain increased wordily, he began to groan in the breath sharply between his teeth.Still the human vise pressed in against the muscle of his arm still it seemed as if human endurance could go no further.
"O---o-o-o-o-oh my-----" screamed the boy when the pain got past the last notch of endurance there plenty of tears in his eyes too.But the man who ever he was did not ease his pressure but still increased.
"Now see now tell her what she wants to know"he commanded with grim encouragement."After a while you'll feel more like talking I guess.This is what we call grilling.You Glandelinians do lots to the vivian Girls far worse than this when they're your prisoners to make them tell things.
See if you can be as stubborn as they are.Anytime, you do start to give information let me know."

"Shoh, haven't I been telling you all I know?"Purrmud Tom."But ---------search on indeed indeed warm bent on driving me out of---ugh ------my head with pain. Ow."

There indeed for even this Clandelirian boy soldier hardly have been a stronger test of the young [illegible] captain's wit and nerve.We have escaped further deserved infliction of that fearful pain the boy soldier could sound have [illegible] presence---except what he really knew about the expedition, and the honor he held [illegible] that he could be [illegible] information on even the child accepts on [illegible] had so often heard of could be finally [illegible] presence of [illegible] escaped, the hand holding [illegible] [illegible] "Backwards" [illegible].

...on I could take you to the river bench if you wanted to go."
"I don't want to, there's no body to play with, and it's no fun all by myself, and we might get fired on by those Glandelinians."
"I'm over on that condition, I'm not so anxious to go myself, I only suggested it, because I thought it might cheer you."
"Amos me, when Mildred was shot.It can't be true."said Susan. There was a short pause.Susan drew herself back and forth in the hammock but took great care not to scrape her shoes against the piazza floor, for she indeed was a girl more careful of everything she did than ever it would have been right to be.She was very careful.Ladys went steadily on with her work. Then Susan asked a question.
"Ladys,a how many days is it in which Mildred was shot and wounded?"
"It'll be three days on Monday, and to-days Friday."
"Then in nb out three days. Isn't it.I heard pretty doctor Henry ...ll pay that on I was complicated with her, or suspected to be in her work, even though I'm not, the Glandelinians would like to get me too."
"Yes that is true,and we hoped that you have escaped this time.You ...ught to be very thankful that they didn't get you."
"I'd like to see those vipers try and get me"said Susan very defiantly and her eyes flashing."I'd like to see them try and even capture me, and I'd make myself scarlet fever to them."
"Susan Dine Susan."Ladys actually put down the stocking she was darning, in her horror and disapproval.
"I do defy them,"Susan went on rather pleased than otherwise by the sight of Ladys shocked face."I thinkit would be very interesting to kill the boy and girlscouts here to learn that I had fought it out with a squadron of Landelinian soldiers and shot many of them, and then have every one looking upon me with seriously, instead of worrying about me.....
"You don't know what you are talking about"said Ladys scornfully and she picked up her stocking again. Now when Ladys spoke in that tone she merely supposed all that was most treasonable and disagreeable in Susan nature..he was really very unhappy bout Mildred,who she knew was seriously wound and dangerously wounded, more unhappy than any one, least of all Ladys suspected. It was this very unhappiness which had made her so much more difficult to manage during the last few days, but no one not even her father, quite realized this fact, and to Ladys her conduct had appeared alittle short of spiteful because Mildred had been wounded, for Susan was unfortunately for herself one of these proud sensitive children, he always find it almost an impossibility to express their deepest feelings..
"I do defy them."she began again, after a moments pause, and she gave the hammock another vicious push as she so spoke."I do wish I had it out with them, when everybody would soon believe I'm not a coward, just because I ran away from General Evans, and I should be very important to all boy and girlscouts after that.I want to be a girlscout officer."
"And how about the pain of being wounded?"
"I don't believe I should mind it if I did it for the Christian cause"she said,"both if every body among the girlscouts and others petted petted, and was worried about me.I should love to wake up and see people especially child scouts standing about my bed, looking at me, mournfully solemn and talking in whispers of how great a heroine I have been.I know the way it happened when boy and girlscouts were wounded. Even papa would bend over me, and ask me if I felt a little better, and tell me I'm to counted any more, and I would be pleased if he would have told me I hot down many Glandelinians, especially some of their officers, and even then I would be pleased to ask him."
"Miss Susan, you are without exception becoming, the most heartless child I've ever seen in my life"exclaimed Ladys her county stock of patience quite exhausted by this last speech of her charges.I don't know what makes you hate the Glandelinians so.I see myself of course I must confess, but not that far. you ought to have seen Daisy Vivian when her sister Catherine had been wounded by several enemy shots.It was pitiful to see her, such a pretty little princess, who an interest in anything her and distressed, who couldn't ...e an interest in anything and every night and morning she used to say a little prayer of her own accord with her own sisters, asking, god to make not that little sister well again, and have passed safe for the recovery, and love becomes too." Perhaps Ladys had stopped to think about it, she might have realized the fact that Susan too had not taken very much interest in things ...ut sitting in the part three days, but she was so last Ladys was not giving a thinking very much about her little charges feeling.."
"I hate to hear about the Vivian Girls being wounded all the time."he remarked Susan giving the hammock a f ...n push."I don't care what they were doing the Glandelinians have ...e no right to even touch them. They're nasty stuck up pigs, every one of them, anyway, papa said so.They can't fight a fair square battle if they do it treacherous acts.I don't care what people and scientists think or say,I know. The whole conception of Christmas was the acts of Glandelinian vandals.e ...e Vivian Girls."
"Did your papa ever see the Vivian Girls."
"I told you that you often had before, and then I assure you I'm sure that they are the prettiest children in the world, he ...ll the children think they are the prettiest children in the world, he ...ught and said, he'd be happy if they were my nieces, so there."

Ladys looked surprised and ...ased at this remark, but before she could reply, Susan make an, more remark, to which Ladys was pained to ...ar, as she saw all girlscouts, looking unusually grave and solemn came up the steps and into the piazza.
"Thompson just came back from headquarters.The soldiers ...ere ordered to get back to their quarters.The soldiers ...ere ordered to get back to their quarters.The soldiers ...ere ordered to get back to their qu o f horrible dirty and ticked bu woman had taken the Vivian girls to the Clandelinian encampme with the purpose to steal as clover,e kept them in the clandelinian encampments all night trying to see all them but could not because they wouldn't or could not pay the price she demanded for themAt last when finally a clandelinian offered to buy them, she had gone on what seemed to be a wild Discovery, and had taken the Vivian girls out into the company street, and old them to go home all by themselves, took all their good clothes from them, and made them put on rags, and the little girls had apparently got lost, untill at last a popped up somewhere as if from the ground, had brought them back to the christian lines in rags, and so dirty that hardly their own best friends scarcely recognized them.The beggar woman never heard was none other than redoubt friend of theirs Sallor Keating.All this was a perfect farce,all in all this pretense of trying to sell them. and then chasing them from the camp in a "terrible drunk" he and they had secured much valuable information from many clandelinian generals, and caused them disaster in the battle that soon came. Susan did not think she would enjoy being a spy; but it would just be fun to slip near a clandelinian encampment an hear wh she could do, and, if she had the chance to give the enemy a good fright.Of course she would come back before dark was home, and too she could ask permission to go, though one wouldn't say she was going near the enemy.and even if she was wounded by the enemy--well what did it matter.It would be doing a good act for the christian cause.Nothing seemed to matter very much just now when her heart was aching so.If people thou as matter very much just now when her heart was aching so.If people thou thought she was heartless against the clandelinians, why she might as well go and be hanged and have some fun at their own expense.She heard because of the lonesomness of the clandelinians and their cruel and unholy cause, it was not sinful to shoot down clandelinian soldiers, but a sin not to do so when the opportunity presented itself. The barrack stopped swaying, and woman jumped out/

Her heart was beating very fast, but she had made up her mind.
All clandelinian soldiers no matter who they were, should be fought as lesson not to give an children behind their backs, whether they wear uniform or not.The Clandelinians soon would find that they couldn't hoot down little girlscouts and not expect their friend to retaliate.and besides Susan too was a crack shot at a rifle or pistol having learned that two years ago.she went into the hall, and took down her shade hat from the peg. Then she came out again, aking a cartridge belt, and automatic fifty four cartridge revolver with her, put on the belt, and placed the gun in its holster, and then closed the screen door softly behind her.The next moment she was walking briskly down the path in the direction of the Nobody except child scouts saw her, and knowing her they did not pay any attention except to say hello and other salutations of greeting which she answered.

Poor Jessie of course was indulging in a good hearty cry up in the nursery, and all the servants in the barracks were all in the back room. When she reached the main road, a party of officers in purple were riding forward, and fearing they would question or stop her, Susan paused for a moment, uncertain in which direction to turn.
"I won't go to the river shore"she decided, "A large party of clandelinian officers would come at me in too many numbers for me to fight. I guess I'll go up into those woods yonder, it's nice and cool there, and I know the way perfectly.If clandelinians come at me there, I'll play a hidden game with them. And they won't forget it in a hurry."

For ten minutes she walked on steadily, without stopping, and then she began to feel rather warm, and very tired.The sun itself did not really radiate any heat at all, but it was nevertheless like an August afternoon in Hottest Africa. She paused for a moment feeling half inclined to turn back and leave the clandelinians unmolested. then she caught a glimpse of a party of clandelinian cavalry had passed a little farther. Several squadrons of clandelinian cavalry had passed her on the road, who had stopped and questioned her, and who had allowed her to go on as she gave satisfactory answers, but there was no one coming upon them whom she knew... and too it was much cooler and pleasanter in the woods.she walked along a shady pathfor some little distance, and then sat down on a long moss covered tree trunk to rest. She hoped however that gladys would not too soon discover her absence, and begin to worry about her, and too she did not want to stay away very long, only just long enough to see a party or so of clandelinians if possible, and prove that she was not afraid of them no matter how fierce they were.
he would try and give the clandelinians a good fright.Then she would return and walk quietly into the house(mouse), and then—well it didn't matter much, she would be scolded of course for going off without saying anything, perhaps punished, but she would certainly tell Ruth how gladys had called her heartless, and how she had proved she was heartless by giving the clandelinians a scare And then all at once before she at all realizedthat what she was doing,, Susan found herself crying—cry as crying as if her heart would break.

A slight rustling in the bush n near by, caused her to turn her head swiftly.It was very still in the woods, she was sure there was not single human being anywhere about. he listened intently for moment but all was quiet again..

"I guess I'll go home before christian soldiers come"she said to herself, rising rather hurriedly from her seat, and feeling a little nervous and uncomfortable, for she felt she would not be able to explain to them why she had went out here . She had not taken more than steps, however she had heard it again, that same rustling sound only this time it sounded much nearer. The little girls heart began to beat very fast indeed, .

"There's some christian soldiers there I'm afraid"she cried p speaking out 'loud in her sudden terror."Oh I know they are there."

"Next mom n moment she had uttered piercing shriek of rage instead of fear, for there not thirty f yards away from her starting tward h r on a dead run, and coming out from amongst the bushes she caught sight of a perfect swarmof clandelinians.If there was one thing in this in the world above others of which susan stood in mortal hatred was clandelinian soldiers.
She behind a tree, and drawing her pistol shot them down till of lying prostrate.Then making advantage of the confusion she ran off in the tent. On on she ran till she came to a bank and seeing more comingagain fired in not she had torn sheet pillows, rolling over in her direction the coils, untill at last breathless, and half fainting from fatig e and she of pursuers was, at ck of their advance upon her, stood stopped behind tree exhausted, and stood climbing a tree have myself from falling.The clandelinians were astonished hen she heave stopped beating great bounds, she looked around to and find out if possible where she was. Indeed

, she looked just as now looked but she sat down on fallen tree, and and herself she was clever girl and did know find her of the woods.The had en however how far she had run, and she heard her father say that those woods extended for miles.Though afraidof she clandelinians she did not like the idea of going back the she had come, because if she unexpectedly came upon some clandelinians and they saw her first they'd have not know what they could do her at their pleasure.But if she took another path now could she possibly tell where it le.. And after all then she came to think of it she was not at all sure of being able from clandelinians if she just in indirection and shot many clandelinians and before she had emptied them. She was not frightened however, for there was no danger of that. he could also see through the branches that the afternoon sun was still high in the heavens, and she did not think she had run any great distance. he decided that she would walk on a little way in which she felt sure was the right direction, for she knew she had come into the woods from the west, and westwards pheasants.Indeed in her encounter with the clandelinians he had very little idea of how many she had shot down killed or wounded. he was cautious at every round hoping for the chance to shoot another clandelinian, and fully expecting to see more of those"College Student Black' hats appear from somewhere among the trees, but she was disappointed disappointed.

"They're afraid of me now"she said with a giggle she walked on briskly despite her fatigue, conscious of one great overwhelming desire the desire to get some more clandelinians, and then to leave the woods before it grew dark.If she didn't succeed in getting out of the woods before dark, then she' would select a safe haven somewhere under the trees and sleep there. she was going forward, she saw more clandelinians approaching after all.They had stealthily followed her but had tried to keep themselves hidden. An officer was in the lea lead and he looked like a colonel. but she certainly the clandelinians thought she the thought was too disgra ceful did. And allowing them to surprise her.the thought was too dispra to even be thought of for one single moment. Then she then would be a fool, and susan now scarcely knew which she dreaded the most to be a fool, or be looked upon as a coward..q.q.q..qq..qq she walked for some distance, and was just beginning to comfort herself with the thought that the Glandelinians were afraid to come close to her when a sudden turn in the path brought her to the edge of a little brook. She was quite sure she had not seen any brook or stream before, when the sudden thought burst upon her, that she could lead the enemy upon the wrong path and lose them, and in that case would also get herself behind a goodly sized stone and open fire upon them again.It was really a terrible plan to follow, and for the first moment the poor child was paralyzed by the thought of itBut were not the Glande linians soldiers human beings,but then came the thought of how the young have sacrificed themselves for heroics heard children which are not fit for fighting, and of how if Mildred was dead, she would feel lost, hopelessly lost, and forlorn.Night was also coming on, and the hopes she derived to relieve Mildred of them would not fall away.But then she must save the lives of their ammunition. She continued to think, and think of Mildred, and how this thought was too awful to be borne in silence, and in a wild out burst as if of terror and despair Susan sank the enemy closer now, flung herself on the ground at the foot of the tree, lifted up her voice and while she wailed she shot wildly at the Glandelinians, who then drew so rapidly that the survivors rippled, scattered and went out of sight.Soon a withering fire of shots was being poured against the tree but without effect, and few even hit the mark.The Glandelinian had preserved on the ground, how long she knew not, shivering and sobbing, and crying, and sobbing, Susan never knew, but at last, into all was soon silent, and when she lifted her head, it was to make the discovery, that the Glandelinians were gone, that the sun had entirely disappeared, so that it was almost dark.She cautiously approached one of the fallen, and seeing no other Glandelinians around, for no doubt they had scented a brave given it up, she withdrew the pistols of the fallen, took the cartridge belt, and ate her meal and drank some.

It was then she decided to remain in the wonder ful grove, but then she knew she would soon miss her Outside of her peculiar adventure with the Glandelinians, Susan, in fact had always been a very brave child, fearing danger not a bit in her, but she did fear punishments, and that made her run from every mistook her for a snooping Glandelinian girlscout.

To think of deserting her friends in the face of the enemy sent chills of horror running up and down her back,just now she longed on for the sight of Mildreds face once more, for the sound of her friends voice.Susan sat up and leaned her back against a tree.There was no use in walking any further, she felt too tired to walk, even if she had the hope of getting home at the end of her journey.Then came a terrible recollection.She remembered the reports of what the Vivian Girls had gone through with the ones who had fallen into the Glandelinians captured or kidnapped and held into slavery, and that if the Glandelinians really want to capture you they can easily do so.Many a brave girl, many dauntless scouting ticks to their credit,with a little mob of people, she sprang to her feet, and plunged once more along the dark path. It was now no good walking now as it had been before for it was dark, and she had not gone far when she fell down, scraping the skin off her knee against a sharp stone. This time she made no effort to rise.The pain pain in her knee was bad enough, but that was nothing to the pain in her heart. She was quite sure now that if the Glandelinians could find her, they would be half displeased at her capture for as it stood, she would be hopelessly lost, and if other children were lost like that, would have to face this situation, they would have died of fright.She used to think that little girls never died, but boy and girlscouts said Mildred was going to die from her wounds, and if Mildred died, why should not she? What good was living if she was to lose her friends. When people died they in Abbiegville especially all went to Haven, and all other good people did,Mildred and all Abbiegvilians were very good, more good than it seemed for people to even be able to be, they would all go straight to Heaven of course, but then, Susan was not good,he had been a coward time and Tyans Mistok her for a Glandelinian girlscout, and it seemed he had not so much as even looked at her since that day, and she had done many other bad things besides.Of course her sins were only venial

Sins small but that seemed bad enough to her, and Gladys had said that Our Pleased Lord was saddened when people didn't do good as He wishe wished.If Our Pleased Lord was sad, and offended, and not pleased with her, and she died, would she be a long, long time in Purgatory, or would she really lose her soul for eternity.In those dreadful end moments in the solitary woods little Susan was thinking perhaps the very first serious thoughts in her life, which was really bi bring her forward to sorrow for sin. She began to cry again, and sobbed until her head ached. She was so desolate, so awfully helpless and sad.If she could only feel sure that God and His Blessed Mother would take of Mildred, and make her wound Mi well, she could not be quite so desolate, but she herself had been so very wicked, she was afraid He might not take any interest in her, and answer her prayers.After Mildreds recovery.Suddenly there came a new thought, which brought with it a faint ray of comfort.
God always forgave people if they were really sorry for their sins, and when they wanted to be better.

Besides it must be getting near her bed time now anyway, and she knew that she ought to say her prayers, though to her it was very strange indeed to say them out there in the woods, instead of beside her own little bed. She now could not kneel down, because her knee hurt her so much, but she folded her hands, and raised her eyes to the darken ing sky in which the first stars were beginning to show themselves.

"Oh Dear Blessed Mother"she cried softly"Do you think you could ask Him to forgive me my just sins, and ask Him to take care of Mildred, and let her get better again.I'm sure I've been very very very naughty I know, and perhaps you are mad at me, but if you could only turn well again, then I'll be a better girl, indeed I will,and oh dear Blessed Mother, ask Our Lord please not to let Mildred to die, she is so good and sweet, and I love her and all the girl and boy scouts so,and let them take me as prisoner econ,plains or I'm heartless against the Glandelinians, but if Mildred dies I can't when I was ill and had all the evil so many to be good, so I don't want Mildred to die. Oh Dear Blessed Mother please ask Our Dear pleased Lord to save her-----and------"

"Hark Hark" that was the sound of approaching footsteps and the sound of a child, and the sound as if some one or more in distress and fright. Susan sprang to her feet her heart beating so fast she could scarcely breathe.Was it a little child a little girl or boy in peril,danger and nearer came the footsteps and the sound of sobs,and in another moment Susan was considerably startled by the sound of a childs voice calling imploringly from some where in the darkness;

"Oh little girl wonder will you please stop, and help me.Please don't go away.I'm a little girl and I'm lost. I'm a slave and ran away from the Glandelinians.Oh please, please do ask me to come home to Abbiegville away from those bad soldiers in red coats and yellow pants,I'm so dreadfully, dreadfully frightened."

Susan had given an exclamation of astonishment, and she now to the sound, and the terrified child flung herself in grimace , and was clinging to Susan stared back for an almost overnight minutes.

"Oh little girl scout, little girlscout"the frightened child wailed, "Give her a child slave, and I ran away, and I got lost in the woods, and the Glandelinians are after me.I was afraid they would come and kill me, but I asked God please to take care of me and to send some one, and I guess he heard me for you came right after that.Oh little girlscout, little girlscout, please take me to your home. I'm so scared,I'm so scared."

Susan realized the situation, and therefore went on, her way watching watching in every direction for the appearance of the enemy, but no Glandelinians appeared, and she brought the child safely into camp.

Daylight was just beginning to come in.While the last of the dim light and haze hung over the river by night Forest James Timore could not quite make out where he was, and he too was sinking lower and lower.The coming however made things much plainer as he hung desperately to a stout limb of a tree. James almost buried so that his chest was behind a fringe of bad weeds and bushes, had to construct his bear from the glimpse of river shore that he could catch.After a while he knew where he was, on the Christian side of the river shore.

"This situation couldn't be much worse"he groaned.

James struggled many times, as well as he could do with his arms and legs to free himself from the muck he had got caught into.He had stepped into the muckbo suckbible in the dark and had slowly sank to his hipes.The place in this location was high like a rather rocky ledge rising above the river.It was such a dangerous spot for river navigation that no river craft skipper ever ventured within the third of a mile of that section off the shore. That very fact made the chance of rescue practically zero. He struggled desperately, but that only made him sink faster much in the quicksand, and he was obliged to give up the effort as hopeless. The only thing what had kept him from sinking more was his continual hold on the limbs of the tree, changing hands whenever his strength failed.At first the sun shone strongly in his eyes, and he was forced to close them until the sun went up more overhead.This the began to pass,the hours slipping by him.The weather seemed more unusually warm too, and a strong hot Southeast wind was blowing, and thirst was the first bodily torment to assail himagis mouth became fearfully parched, and his efforts to free himself only hastened and increased the awful craving for water.Had there been a little water he above the fog he could have scooped water with his hand but there was none.It was torment even to catch such glimpses as her could of the river beyond...

The boyscouts tongue began to swell.It seemed to be three times as large as it ought to be, in his mouth, and it seemed to swell more and more all the time.James began to feel the grass od overwhelming dread. and he felt forced to shut his eyes to keep out the terrifizing sight of the even more of the enormous river.Then he opened his eyes to stare up and down the river in any in an agony of hope that some one, would land ashore.

"Even if I don't sink all the way down I cannot even hope to live long.
If this torment keeps up and increases."He hid himself with a su shudder.

At this moment a little speck of sail appeared in sight on the river. Slowly it came nearer. From time to time the big boat lay to, her main sheet eased off, while a number of boy and girlscouts, bent over the gunwales or walked about the decks. The craft was an "investigation" boat sending down the river at full speed, those daring child scouts had undertaken under the leadership of their leader in charge. They had with them two soldiers from general Pershing headquarters, arrived the day before. A great ambition had fired their leader to day.

He had decided to take his followers there he hoped they would be able to make a prodigious catch of "Clandelinian solidity of member them one or the other. He too would give them the finest meal possible, and he would turn them all into fine admirers of his seamanship. By the aid of this trip which was to be such a wide success, he would forever prove to all others that he was a young "Jonah" to the core.

Yet point after point along the coast of the river the camp skipper eased off his sheet, and waited while following their luck.

But at the sight of such a boat, and its crew, Clandelinians on shore seemed to disappear. Hardly seemed enough every clandelinian soldier within that locality had been sent from the territory the day before because so many boy and girlscouts were around.

"I thought you knew where the Clandelinians really are."inquired one of the girlscouts somewhat disgustedly.

"I usually do,"their leader, Hank Weber protested.

"Does it really always happen that Clandelinians on shore run away back to their main lines, when you have us with you?"queried another of the girlscouts.

Hank, flushed, stammering a bit/

"Honestlynow have you taken any Clandelinians prisoners this season?" inquired the question.

Hank hesitated to answering this direct question.He did not want to admit that he had not been able to capture any prisoners so far this season because of this enough considerations to which he belonged did not take prisoners.He declared lying and Abbicannians also do not lie to each other.so he nodded his head slightly.

"You just wait.Of course we got to cruise about a bit, before we strike a just the place to capture them, and then we'll haul them in fast.They'll be like fish to us."

"Hurry up with the cruising then——do"begged the first young man with a sigh, while the child scouts looked at him."I want to see your scouts catch at least something like Clandelinian soldiers, before I really eat my supper to night."

Hank hauled in the main sheet, set his course and sailed on.Two or three times more he tried his luck for t his passengers sake, and each time the two young mild soldiers grew more disgusted as Clandelinians would not show themselves if there were any about.

"Know any more secret places?"demanded one of the passengers, while during the breakfast hour they were finishing up the last bites of pinkies pancakes which had been cooked for them on the boat.

"I'll you what"said Hank with a new burst of hope."This is still early in the season, and for what our reputation is the Clandelinians keep away from us boy and girlscouts as a mouse does from a cat.We don't want to break a promise with you fellows but if we don'tsucceed in capturing any of the enemy it isn't our fault.We are just like fisher men fishing in too deep water in the cold season.The only way we may surprise Clandelinians is to be able to come upon them without they knowing of our approach.We are too not near enough to the real fortified sections of the camp, and if you really want excitement we'll try it though its dangerous and you may object.Over there closer to land, near Great Thumbelinia."

Hank indicated over there"by a generous sweep of the arm.His two soldier passengers he hardly took the trouble to look, but Hank filled with the hope of this new chance, and feeling a rising breeze tugging at his sail hauled in rather close, brought the crafts starboard gunwale almost into the water, and sent the boat dashing over the waters.Just then there was the boom of a distant gun on the fortifications and an erupt ion of water rose in the air, the following wave almost capsizing the boat.

"We don't want to go overboard to get our Clandelinians."objected one of the young soldiers,getting further up on the port gunwale to ballast the craft better, regardless whether he was exposing himself or not.

"I never drowned any customer of mine yet, and remember there are my followers with me who have to share the same peril,"proclaimed Hank manfully.

"We did not say you did.But don't let the enemy begin to day."

"Just keep cool and don't get excited."declared Hank."If you're getting scared say so and I'll run to the christian side of the shore and let you off.We did not invite you on.You asked to come, and when you're with us you got to go through it with us."

The soldier did not pay any head to this.Hank was heading for the high rocky part of the shore(where James was in peril from quicksand, it was right ahead in his course, a mile away.On other occassions he had taken reckless chances near that angerously exposed spot to see hat the enemy was doing, and had made good success in his work.

"I'm going to run to the southward, and come out around the other end of the rocky stretch."Hank explained as they neared the place...2.2.2..22.

"Call that rock section a ledge."demanded one of the young soldiers scornfully.

"It certainly is."admitted Hank."Rather a famous ledge of rocks also.There have been some dandy wrecks of clandelinian ships there in days gone by."

"Indeed the place surely looks like it."Admitted the other young young soldier."But we're not hungry yet for wrecks."

Passing to the south of that strange narrow neck of land, just now ow, and keeping his eyes on the course, Hank heard but did not answer untill this question was suddenlt py put to him.

"Say are there not a lot of hidden rocks under water near that stretch of land.?"

"Yes indeed there are."

"sunken rocks.?"

"Aye thing."

"Dangerous place isn't it?"

"Yes indeed if the skipper of a craft doesnnt know his way.It underneath us of rocks and ledges a green skipper could run onto."Hank admitted.

"See here boy. We don't want any of that.Steer off I tell youNo wrecking for ours."

"Now there is no need about worrying about anything when I'm handling the boat."Boasted Hank."I knowevery hidden rock off this part of the river shore."

No sooner had he said it, than another eruption in the ater lifted the forward part of the boat well out of water, and hurled it forward so that the boats keel grun grated on a sunken ledge with a rude shock.

"Know every rock, but didn't think a clandelinian shell would sent me onto one."Finished Hank with ittotic presence of mind.

"I should say you don't,"roared one of the passengers angrily."I thought you said clandelinians don't fire on children in uniform." The other man who could not swim, grew pale with fright.

"I didn't say they won't fire on kids in uniformsbtured Hank."But now don't you worry"added Hank reassuringly as he waved forward."I've been in worse scrapes than this———hunareds of them."

How much that comforted the two young soldiers can only be guessed. Hank snatched up an oar and tried to shove the boat off the rock, but his best efforts would not budge her.

"Come and help me shove, some ov of you boys and girls."he begged. They tried but to no avail.One of the soldiers who could swim and who happened also to know a little bit about river navigation looked keenly at the visible top of the ledge just under the waters edge surface, then carefully surveyed the boats position.

"It's best to put that oar down my boy."he advised promptly."If you do succeed in pushing us off the rock will probably stave a hole in the boats bottom planks. e'd only float into deep water and sink. The enemy might let loose another shell near us which will produce another wave, and that ought to float us off without danger.I to think that the clandelinians would fire at you kids with guns.It's seems sudden ing."

"Someti something in the speakers eyes persuaded Hank to obey.Besides there was god sense behind the idea of waiting for a explosion made wave prodiving none of the shells hit the boat.So Hank picked his way back besides the tiller and sat down, for the present a wholly dejected young skipper.At the moment when Hank had rounded the eastern end of the ledge James Timore had happened to have his eyes opened.He saw the distant sails, got a glimpse of the craft and recognized boths now did James severed as he was in his head believed the sink to be a trick of his imagination or a mere opitical illusion.Nothing was more natural than that Hank Weber should be there.He was the only child scout boat skipper on all parts of the river territory he would be sometimes so reckless as to run so close to the rocky ledge.

"Hank, hank,"yelled James moistening his mouth all he could with his tongue in order to make his voice travel farther."Oh Hank!. H———————————k."

But even at that distance the sound was scattered by the wind, drowned by the noise of the water lapping over the rocks. Then came the crash of the explosion, and the boatwent up on the ledge.James could not see the ship now, but for an instant he heard the distinct noise of excited voices.James surely felt positive that something,something terrible had happened.

"Hank, Oh—Hank.Hank." shouted James in desperate appeal as often as he could make his parched tongue moisten his mouth just a little.I believed Hank was sailing gloomily at the stern of the yacht believed he did actually have something.He listened again intently.That sound came once more——it was like the sound of his own name.

"Hear—hear Hank, hear, and considered"he asked.

"Hear—hear"asked one of the boys.

"Hear—hear"he exclaimed one of the girls.

"Hank! O H———k."she faintly on the breeze.....It was so faint and weak it could not be heard picked out from one another, and rendered if it had been anything more than a trick of the imagination, for even the believed they did hear something.

"It sounded like some one calling your name"declared one of no more in Jimmy's mind had been that all the excited talk of the [illegible] adventure, and the quick nap had been just the finishing touch in the delirium, yet nevertheless the doctor was right, and with no care to express any opinions at all he would be able to find out more ... during that morning every [illegible] was quieter, and [illegible] off most of the time...

"The main thing now dear little girl," the army doctor told his sister "That we can give you the good news that your brothers strength is rapidly pulling itself together again. He's going to be all right in a few days."

"But that dreadful, most frightful talk of [illegible] and threats of a dreadful death," stuttered shuddered the sister...

"Well he was out of his head you know," smiled the doctor, "It's impossible for any one to blame him for his talk at any time that he didn't know what he was doing."

On the next day, our little hero, mending fast, came downstairs again. The noon went and [illegible] pottering about the barracks yard and some times into the company street. He could have no freedom to the officers headquarters, but learned that Colonel Prescott had not yet returned.

Neither had Donaldson Evans--if that christian officer were still in the land of the living.

"Pist!-i-i-s-s-s-i-i," came a signal, as Jimmy sat under a tree behind the barracks. Then as Jimmy looked quickly about, Joe Jenson, a twinkle in his eye, came around a clump of brushwood."

"Where in the world have you been all this time?" demanded Jimmy in [illegible] in amazement, rising and hurrying delightedly [illegible] his chum.

"Well now see here friend scout," whispered Joe, his eyes twinkling twinkling. "First Colonel Evans went to the Section of the enemys camp --and then mysteriously vanished. Then you followed him. After that you failed to come back [illegible]. so according to the orders and advices of you both, I ran the Mary Ann back to the pier, left her in good order--then made a mysterious disappearance myself. myself."

"Why?" asked Jimmy.

"Well you had both so mysteriously disappeared, and therefore it looked to me as if it would be a very grand idea for me also to do the vanishing act, untill one or both of you turned up again. It looked to me as if there were very clever and powerful Gemini spies and agents back of your double disappearances."

"You're afraid you'd vanish in earnest if you stayed around here!" laughed James.

But Joe Jensens eyes flashed, and he [illegible] looked reproachfully at his chum.

"Afraid! Me." Dancer retorted. "I'd sooner die than be afraid enough to sneak away and leave my friends and comrades in peril. But you and Evans gave me orders and advice to do only one thing, and [illegible] obeyed. Well, the orders were that at a certain time, to bring the boat back. I did that but it struck me there were powerful and shrewd Gemini agents, shadowing, [illegible], and that everything I did would be watched. Now I had always been trained that when Gemini, soldiers or child scouts, is playing tricks with you, it was the best idea to keep them guessing, so if any of the Gemini spies tried to watch or shadow me, they just could not do it, for I'd been out of sight. But I know that General Prescott is not to be back yet, as soon as you show up once more and can be talked to, I come back on the scene don't I? But don't say I was afraid. I reasoned it out as one of the most clever things to do."

"Don't take it too much at heart Jose. I was only testing you and--if some unknown Gemini spies have been watching us, they certainly must have had plenty of [illegible] to where you were, and what you were up to. But the main ones we have to look out for is not Gemini soldiery. They know war we're too clever for them. It is the enemy child scouts. It is said they are enough to [illegible] one."

"But, [illegible] the world happened to you?" asked Joe.

"Hank has not told you?"

"I haven't seen him nor has he seen me. I heard, he's been looking for me, and is still trying to locate me."

James then started telling his chum what had happened on that awful night. "But I'd almost give my right hand to know where Evans is now. The wound up, [illegible]."

"But General Prescott won't blame us for his disappearance," hinted Joe.

"He can't. He put us under Colonel Evans orders. But I'm positively afraid something worse had happened to Colonel Evans, than what occured to me."

"I can get Hank and a lot of boy and girlscouts and disguise as Gemini children boy and Girlscouts, and explore all along the coast, and the river islands" proposed Joe.

"It won't do much good I'm afraid." Jimmy replied. "You remember that [illegible] thing. I'm afraid that would up the business of Colonel Evans, and if he had succeeded in making his escape, there would have been a fight and a free blade of steel...s-s-s..."

"But he left his revolver, and rifle aboard the "Mary Ann" Joe objected...

"The weapons are in the locker now..." (((get your gun)

"He had two revolvers and three rifles." broke in Timone. "I saw the other in his hip pocket as he went over the side into the tender..."

Nevertheless both of the boy scouts were sorely troubled over the possible or probable fate of Colonel Donaldson Evans. Aside from his being the generals relative, and a servant of the general Calvinistan government, they had liked Colonel Evans for his own sake.

"But I wonder what can we do about it." signed Joe. "But if we do try to do something, we will have to wait first untill you get strong and well again Jim, and, too we have to wait untill General Prescott comes back."

"I'm positively sure that I am all right now." protested Timone. "It was nothing but a little adventure in the sickhole. I saved myself from [illegible] through by holding on long onto that branch of a tree that stret ched above the bog....."

And, he proved his strength by going down into the higher sections of the camp with Joe, for now young Jensen saw no further need of concealing himself. There they went down" to the pier. They hung around near there in order to be on hand should the general put in an appearance.

Just while they were looking over the motor boat, Jane Melfort came rifling up with the news!!!!!

"General Prescott, your friend is back. I know you were waiting for him boys."

"General Prescott back really!" asked Jimmy, [illegible] eagerly.

"Yes I told you" she said rather impatiently. "I just caught sight of him on his headquarters piazza."

Jim and Joe hurried over to the generals headquarters. The general saw them coming coming and hailed them most pleasantly. Then as the two boy scouts drew nearer, he rose holding out his hand to each.

"Have you heard from Colonel Evans!" Whispered Jim.

"He be vanished then!" asked the general gravely.

"Yes sir, I wish to tell you about it."

"Come up to my room boys." requested the general.

There, behind the closed door, with several guard [illegible] on the outside, they told him all that had happened on that eventful night. To their surprise though the general continued to look grave, he said at length. "I don't believe it necessary to worry about Colonel Evans untill I know more. He has been in many tight places before, and has always known how to take good care of himself, and get his enemies in the [illegible] ahead. I'll bet anything he'll turn up all right soon." certainly do. And now let's go down on the porch. I'm not going to ask you to take the boat out untill [illegible] after dinner, Jimmie."

As they reached the porch, General Prescott was greeted by another christian officer, a Major named Ricksen.

"Don't need rest--go away my boys." said the general as they started to withdraw. "Sit down with us for a while. Major Ricksen loves to talk "spy work". In fact he has just been on a long distanced scout like spy four himself. He's one of the "Gemini"."

"Are you going to bring a lot of your own scouts with you down here into this territory sir" Jim asked.

"I'd like to" returned Major Ricksen. "But I don't know that I shall be able to now. The trip is extremely dangerous, and I never knew scout leaders to be so extremely careful about [illegible] their men before. Harper won't permit any of his Gemini "settlement" members to leave camp under any conditions. My scouts are tied up fast at Leighburg Landing, just for want of boy and girlscouts who can guide them through. But the boyscout leaders Timothy Groveton or Penrod won't won't allow me any of their child scouts free. Be officers have to pay for their use, and we just now ain't got the money. Men and agents enough, can get and imitation spyes too. But men of the Gemini or boy and girlscouts, who really know how to guide a man wherever he wants to go, seem very scarce this season. Their leaders won't give one of their number under any condition, because of the situation being so pressing. Per Penrod said that "Angelina Aronberg lies wounded in the Base Hospital, and some others too, and he don't want to increase his losses."

"You need not look so longingly at my motor boat boyscout crew Ricksen." laughed the general. "Remember Penrod, or Groveton won't have any Shanghai tricks played with my two boy scouts."

"And something ought to be done to provide Gemini leaders with good military detectives." complained Major Ricksen...

"And something can be done." retorted General Prescott. "See here Ricksen, I was thinking that over too while I was away at General Pershings headquarters. How do you realize that all of this country around the besieging christian armies, and around the [illegible] of Belgrade junction is just overrun with strong ambitious young [illegible] and boy scouts like these two boys, who are Independent scouts and under no scouts leader whatever just now, and that every one of them [illegible] equal in spying [illegible] as the Vivian Girls? Don't you

...wherland that their withstand without the besieging christian lines, ...d even within the enemy's lines secretly disguised there's many of the ...finest boy and girl spies to be found!"

"But do they know how to guard any one thro... through dangerous te...ritory, and how to take care of wounded friends when seriously hurt, and bring them all through to safty."

"If they don't then they're not boy and girlscouts then."followed up the general."Boy and girls sure must know much, and have to learn before they become scouts.First entries are made probationers.In fact many of us generals and other officers are really to blame, and deserve no sympathy for disasters to our armies if we don't take steps to train all the children that can be made into boy and girlscouts,and many more are needed around here right now.They are called the head of the army, and as you know are so much dreaded by the enemy that no Glandelinian will dare for any reason to approach a camp of chils scouts.""""AAA2

"But who is going to take the first steps?"Questioned Maj or Hickson. Plainly he was one who would like to have others...do...all of his thinking for him...

"The Vivian Girl Princesses have taken the first steps long ago." answered general Prescott with a laugh."Who do you suppose?General Con tenthian Aronburg can boast of having a million in his army, and those kind called the Standard bearers are the most dreaded by the enemy". Then to Jimmy he said it;

"Go to the reception room and back for two small parcels that I left there.you will find your names on them.Take the parcels up to my room and then come back and let me see what you guessed what to do.The Vivian Girl Princesses Jennie, and Catherine sent them to you."

"What on earth can it be?"demanded Joe in an excited whisper as the boys hurried away.

"If we can only wait a few minutes we'll soon only know."suggested Simone. The packages that they received at the reception room were rather bulky.Each boy claimed his own, and then with the key to the generals private room(the room) Jimmy led the way.No sooner were they inside the room and the door closed than each youngster hurriedly cut the string of his parcel...e.e.e

"Grand new uniforms."Flared Joe(blo.) in delight."Oh Jimmy are they not the finest ever."

Jimmy was gazing delightedly at a double breasted brass buttoned lavender colored coat of fine strong lavender silk.The trousers of silk yellow, with lavender strips, and an orange red vest were with it, and a violet colored camp. Joes uniform was a duplicate, except that around the wriste of jimmys sleeves were three brands of gold braid, while joes sleeves bore but two.

"This is to show our difference in rank,Jimmy between scout and capti captian."Smiled Joe.

"I wish Violet, and her sisters had not quite done that for they're more worthy than we are."Muttered young Timione soberly.....is it.

"Why if it is their will to do it, it is all right."Protested Dancer. "Of course you're captin Tinione. I'm the last one to mind that..But looke at these dandy caps."

The caps were alike lavender in color, and the large visored ones the same shape as the soldiers wear.and across the front of each, appeared in embroidered gold thread letters .P.B.

"Now what does those letters stand for?"Jimmy wondered..

"General Prescott will tell us."

In haste the boys removed their old uniforms, trying the new ones on. Each had a perfect fit. even to the caps. They poised posed them selves before a mittttt mirror proud as boys could be. What a trans formation the two uniforms made.They looked a trim pair of young newcomers into the ranks. from top to toe...

"We're hurry down and see General Prescott to send a telegram of thanktttt thanks to violet, and her sisters..."proposed joung top as they had easily packed their discarded uniform into the shopp ing papers, but the general failed at their thanks proposition.

"No thanks necessary boys."he said."you are wearing the uniforms on which they wished you to recieve a new commission.They want their officers to look as neat as possible!"

"But what does those letters on the caps mean?"Tom inquired.

"Why the P.B.stand for, "Patrol Leader."

"Oh. I never thought of that"declared Tom.

"You know violet,and her sisters had long ago organized that regiment for every army possible"Continued General Prescott."Those regiments like all other largest composes composes of young boy and girls who want to be scouts.Violet,and her sisters like many officers who will ...to their training training, and will find places for new members. "You mop can't you suggest some boys and girls to reinforce our ... girl regiments with.There are many vacancies."

chair, trying to read a paper, or military letter or a book, glance over the letters written to him by the Princesses, sometimes reading one aloud in peculiar impatience, but most of the time sitting with his elbows resting on the table before him, and his face buried in his hands. And every once in a while he would rise, and cautiously open the door to listen outside of the closed door of Mildreds room, but his ears never caught any other sounds, save an occasional low spoken question or answer from those within; and the injured child moaning in pain and fever. On the other side of that closed door(the last time women, and a young Girlscout sat and watched, they were Hazel, the regular housekeeper, Housekeeper, and Mrs Jane the trained military nurse.
For three days now that same unbroken stillness had prevaded the great old mansion like farmhouse. It was more than three days since Mildred had been shot down behind her back in the mystery house, and every day the pain at the elder sisters heart, had been growing worse and sharper. Five times that day Doctor Henry's carriage stopped before the door, and five times the doctors kind grave face had bent over the little pain racked flushed face on the pillow. On his last visit he had said a few words in a low voice to the nurse, [redacted] words which poor Hazel---whose ears had been greatly sharpened by anxiety---had not failed to catch.

"I think sometime this evening or to night will decide the question he had said, recovers or one way or the other. That wound is a dangerous one, and it's probably killing the child."

Hazel had said nothing then, but when the doctor left the room she had then took the nerve to follow him softly to the head of the stairs.
"Doctor---please---doctor" she said, and her voice was brave and steady in spite of the misery in her dark brown eyes---"Please tell me the truth—is---there---any---any---any---hope."

The kind doctor, unable to meet that look of suffering, took the hand of the little girlscout in his, and though his answer was quite unsteady he said;

"Trust in God, and His Blessed Mother, and there will always be hope. The situation brought on by the wound is serious but God is good and we hope will bring her through."

It was three o'clock in the afternoon, and still there was no change or movement of the little motionless form. For more than five hours and a half Hazel had not moved from her seat by the bedside, trying to comfort her suffering sister, but now she gave a slight start, roused by a touch on her shoulder.

"My dear" whispered a girlscout who had been admitted in, "I wish you would go down stairs and eat a little dinner with General Jack Evans.
It's been ready for more than two hours, but he has not so much as [redacted] one toward the dining room, though he usually punctual and particular about his meals."

Hazel made a sudden impatient movement.

"I feel sick! I couldn't eat anything. They will feel the same. Believe for general Evans sake I ask you to do it. It is not good for him, when he has such strenous times to go without his regular meals, and he won't eat unless you come down to eat with him.
He sent me to tell you."

Still Hazel shook her head, desperately; the girlscout then glanced appealingly at the nurse.

"I believe you had better go, Miss Manning" the nurse said with cheer ful decision. I don't expect for any change in the condition brought by her wound yet, and I could send for you any moment if I wanted you. As long as she don't go into a stupor there is no critical sign yet, and too youll soon break down yourself, if you don't force your self to take some rest. And then what will your little sister be doing, when she begins to get better, and asks for you?"

"When she begins to get better and asks for you!" How those hopeful words thrilled poor Hazels aching heart. Indeed they were the first hopeful words she had heard for three or four days—Doctor Henry and the housekeeper had been very kind, but neither of them had spoken of the time when Mildred would be getting better. The nurse was a bright sensible woman and stranger though she was, Hazel had come to rely upon her more than upon any of the others. How she rose almost[illegible] involuntarily.

"Will you really and surely call me if there is the slightest change, and the fever is gone down, and the pain relieved" she whispered.

The nurse nodded, and with one more loving glance at the little pain racked figure on the bed, Hazel left the room followed by the girlscout. Hazel looked out of a window and noticed a number of Vivian re Vivian girlscouts outside with some blind folded prisoners standing near a wall.

"Are they going to be shot as spies?" asked Hazel.

"Yes" said the girlscout almost with a sneer. "The girlunites are just waiting to see what happens to Mildred. They're the ones who shot your sister. If she dies, they die the same time. But she added "Mr Farrole scachmin has just been here. They are in great trouble there. The little Arnel foreigner girl is lost."

"Lost" Hazel repeated pausing on the threshold of her own room. "Little Susan lost. How very dreadful---are you sure it is true."

"Yes. It seems she disappeared some time this afternoon, and no one has been able to find her, since, though they've been looking everywhere. It is not likely she's taken away by Glandelinians, for they say when it comes to Glandelinians trying something on, they're a little wildcat, and as dangerous as a viper. But nevertheless the house in in a terrible fright, and they sent here to see if by any possibly possibility we kno we knew where the child was. The worse of it is the father Mr Farrol is away—he went over to the north side, scouting for the boys, and they don't expect him back again until some time this evening."

Susan lost---the little girl friend, whom Hazel loved, and even many of the child across the pond, despite her cowardly desertion of Mildred, when afraid of Evans. It was very dreadful, and yet poor Hazel found herself pondering exceedingly, as she combed her hair and smoothed her hair, and put on her hat (it's the rule that girlscouts have to wear their military hats when living anywhere, boys too) why it was that she did not feel more distressed over this sad news. If she only knew that a little tiger woman was making of herself in the woods just now. Perhaps she was growing somewhat cold and heartless; she had fancied lately that it must be, she was getting so. For it was days and days since she had shed a real simple tear, and yet Mildred was going to die. Even when she had heard that the girlscouts were going to shoot the prisoners when Mildred died, she felt sorry she wasn't one of the firing squad.

She went straight to the dining room, but found it empty save for one of the orderlies, and the orderlies, he stood rigid and silent behind his master's chair, the picture of patient submission to fate.

"Where's the general in chief?" Hazel inquired.

"In his own room, Miss. I've spoken to him four or five times, and I'm afraid to do it again, for I'm afraid his temper won't stand it. Perhaps you would not mind to try to remind him as you [illegible] Miss, as how his evening meal had been on the table this whole two hours and a half, we've reheated it several times."

Hazel made no answer, but walked across the hall to the general room.
There she stopped, and paused. General Evans was certainly unusually kind but she suddenly remembered the fact that she had never exchanged more than a few words with him each day since her arrival at his head quarters. They had met at meals it is true, but the great General had never spoken very much when he ate, except for an occasional remark about Mildred, and the ordinary civility of good morning and goodnight, and otherwise they had met together at the table at unbroken silence. The door of the opposite room stood partly open, and Hazel could see the general sitting by the table, his head [illegible] buried in his hands. He looked very miserable and very lonely, and for the first time it flashed into her mind, that there could possibly be other and many other people in the world [illegible] as [illegible] as [illegible] the [illegible]. Somehow [illegible] told her that Mildred was the image of one of the Vivian Girl Princesses. Could it be that he had learned to love the child scout dearly, and that it was not alone remorse for having been the unwilling cause of her being injured by Glandelinian ammunition in that old mystery house, that was grieving him so deeply? It was a sudden thought, and brought with it the very first sensation of pity that she had felt for any one but herself in days.
Next moment general Jack Evans felt a light touch on his arm, and [illegible] his head with a start, sat staring for a moment at the young girl beside him, almost as Hazel thought, as if he did not recognize her.

"What do you want" he asked in a strange low voice——"that's happened now"

"Nothing has happened sir, I only came to tell you that supper is ready."

"Is she"

"Is she the same, and her pain is intense."

"Is she feeling unconscious"

"No. Miss Jane——the nurse—— does she doesn't expect any change for some time yet..."

With a sigh, and a black look, outside toward the Glandelinian prisoners in the hands of the Vivinites, the general rose slowly to his feet, glanced blackly out the window, muttered something, to himself, then walked a few steps toward the door!!! Then came back, and laid his hand heavily on the young girls shoulder.

"...look very pale as if you're in a fever."he said in his harsh ...kept say---you ought to take plenty of rest, and exercise."
"Oh I am perfectly well,"said Hazel with a faint attempt to smile"
"...should be all right, much better, if Mildred would only recover, and ...could not have so much pain...."
"Did Doctor Henry tell you that he had sent a fast courier for the chief ...surgeon in Clandelinians almost mortal wounds.?"
...id Hazel, looking rather startled.
"Well he hasn't told him to. Doctor Antonio will be here at any time between then they ought to be able to do something."
With a sudden impulse Hazel held out both her hands to the great general, she had never met her friend of the revel.
...rose kind and kind, and ...you."she said gratefully,"How can I ever think you?"
She had scarcely uttered the words, when she wished ...had not for the general had turned upon her, an almost
...look in his eyes.
"I tell you before you were never to speak to me in that way."
...mean, you think because I'm a hardened general, that I must have a heart ...the soldier I was but still I have, for Clandelinians, have not for our side,that I do in through the Will of God, and Him alone ...must thank, not me."I will never be I won't be thanked, now do you understand me?"
"Yes, sir---sir---."stuttered Hazel."I'm very sorry if---------"
"There they will do,there's nothing to be sorry about.Now come in to dinner....."

Dinner passed off in the same unbroken silence as usual.Neither Hazel nor her strange host to very much, hardly did not eat at all, and Hazel was at times thankful, when General Evans ...at last pushed back his chair and rose from the table. ...that leaving the dining-room, whom one of the officers gave ...them interesting little

"Excellent ale---...re me---mber had you heard about Mr Farrels little girl ...mmoned to have their hair ...but they got in the woods she killed...one hundred and fifty Clandelinian and wounded ...hundred"
"...ruel of the general victories---"and what's more I don't want to hear ...father. I don't care if she kills them all.Think ...the Olands Livian soldiers ...me, ...e and the general talked ...ing merrily out of the room, but Hazel ...ing behind ...ing ...
"...something ...this ...and of heathen ...all dom that?"
"...when she did ...all right, ...ed out to let the woods, some of ...were ...when she ...ed ...she just ...e ...t ...know. The queer ...Miss ...ed ...she just ...e ...t ...know. The queer little ...about ...in, she ...seven ...ing hours, safe and ...ed, by herself, being ...with the little girl alive who ...from the enemy lines.
...Clandelinians were after the child, and ...ed off the persuers.
...I never knew the kid could ...ed ...another queer thing about ...during ...s ...her own father ...found ...coming home with the ...alive,and he never knew she had ...from the camp.Him and some ...officers off ...ing ...and they should ...so
...about ...in, ...child alive who was afraid
...their ...with ...ndelinians, and crying fit to break
...heart,and ...would have shot them, had ...not recognised her

...the surprise of ...life.The Clandelinian general believes the ...Clandelinian soldiers in the wood, was attacked by a little ...origenorn
...girl, who had lost her ...goon,and was afraid to ...her anywhere ...for ...she'd jump upon them like a wild cat."
Hazel was conscious of a ...like exultation.The ...while had been ...sent to Mildred, it would be terrible if any sorrow would come to them too, in case the Clandelinians ...revenged the attack upon them, but ...back in ...ildreds room, the poor elder sister had
...and thoughts for ...thing in the world, except that suffering
...and ...ering on the bed.It seemed however that the child lay quieter than before...she did not move and writhe so much now."as she had been...doing ...day, and she seemed to be breathing more heavily. When she ...whispered whispered her feelings to ...ise ...she still spoke encouragingly.
"We can't tell anything yet,"she said"...t I think her pain had ...de ...ased somewhat.I am sure the fever too is going ...Maybe they won't need the extra surgeon after all,and the pure ...refugee ...reforms."
It was after five o'clock before Doctor Henry ...ppeared.This time he was ...companied by a soldier who was dressed like a general, with gray hair, and ...kind clever face, whom Hazel knew ...s ...be the chief surgeon ...whom general ...had spoken, and who might be able to do ...something for ...Mildred.
"Now my dear Hazel,"said Doctor Henry kindly,"we shall have to ask you to ...the room.The surgeon and I are going to
...and the ...ks ...to ...ke an examination of the wound, and Miss Jane will help ...."

...obediently....
"I wish to kiss her just before I go."she whispered.
The doctor nodded,and Hazel pressed her lips long and lovingly and ...tenderly to the little burning forehead.Then she turned and with a heart that was almost breaking, she left the room, closely followed by the housekeeper....

As soon as they reached the outer hall outside the hall, the young girlscout suddenly tottered and sank, against the wall, for she felt vet
...ak, and faint.Indeed it seemed to her for a sure as if her little ...fate was to be decided in the very next minute.with an exclamation of pitying tenderness, the young housekeeper gathered the ...ing figure in her arms.

"My poor dear, my poor little dear."she murmured as poor Hazel
...on great tearless sob, laid her aching head down on the good woman
...breast,"If you could only try to cry now---it would do you so much ...good."
"I cannot cry it's impossible.I feel like my heart is a tomb."said the girlscout in a hoarse whisper."I've tried to cry, indeed I have but I can't.she's the youngest,dear,I have in the world, if and if she ...es,I'm afraid I won't care what happens to me afterwards.I didn't think Clandelinians ...re so cowardly and ...cruel as to ... shoot little girls through open windows behind their backs."
The sleep of the young ...housekeeper came ...ehended most perceptibly.
"My dear"she said very ...and ...ly,....."they ...asked Our Blessed Mother to beg Our ...lessed Father Lord to...help you to bear this sad trouble, and ...make your little sister recover from her wounds."
"I did always since she was wounded and said ...ers ...s ...d for ...covery, but then how can I deserve to have my prayers answered, when many others who are ...and girlscouts ...as ...ch ...s she suffers
...often too.That makes it appear ...as if I don't ...to have my prayers answered by more than theirs.Because of this dreadful ...s, and more ...because of the cowardly brutality of the enemy, most of the awful Abbrenn diameter ...so many countless ...mbers of good people of Abbrenn and Clandelin, have terrible sorrows and ...ferings in this country, and I am not very sure I'm no more better than they, and ...so the can
...the sufferings of Our Blessed Mother when she ...the beheld her ...Son hanging on the Cross, and both didn't deserve ...that either.I know that God always hears, ...when people ...pray to Him for ...things, but often He may not answer for our good?.or may ...delay ...because to ...us."
"...more ...faith will bring good ...sults."said the House keeper softly ...oking the girls forehead as she spoke."We don't ...always understand ...ings however, and if it is for our good He ...always answers. And now I'm ...going to ask you to do something.?"
"I'm willing to do anything I can, for your ...sake."said Hazel, raising ...head with sudden eagerness,"You and the ...rest have been so good to
...."I shall be glad to do something for you."
"...l it isn't exactly for me,not at all."said the housekeeper"That is ...in one way it is, and in one way it isn't.I want you to ...doom ...ative, and try to comfort ...general Evans."
"To comfort ...general Evans?"exclaimed Hazel looking rather frightened"Oh
...this I don't think I could do that---h ...might ...not care to have ...near him."
"Only try and ...see whether he will like to have you or not. "said the house keeper reassuringly."He's served ...general Evans ...since he ...came became the guardian of the Princesses, and I think I know him for better, than most folks do, than even violet,and her sisters do.He's ...gruff and short in his manners sometimes, but bless you it's because of his dreadful anger against the Clandelinians, and its not meant for any of us. He's got one of the kindest hearts in all the world, and he just about worships violet,and her sisters.He likes ...Mildred as well."
"you told me once that ...ildred looked very much like one of ...the Vivian ...girl Princesses---is that why he is so ...fond of her?"
"Yes ...its partly that, and partly other things---she resembles the Vivian girl ...is heart is...set on the most---that ...is little a ...female/"

General Evans was sitting by the ...brary table, just as he had been sitting nearly all days,with his face between his hands.He felt also that the next hour might decide the fate of the little girlscout ...heroine he had ...learned to love so well.There was a slight sound behind him, and for the second time that afternoon, the great general raised his head, to meet the gaze of a pair of ...tender dark brown eyes, filled with a nameless grief and misery.This time he did not stare at the intruder, but rose ...cred to his feet.
"Is there anything I can do for you?"he asked in a tone that Hazel scarcely recognised. it was so low and gentle.
"I"said Hazel in a ...rather ...unsteady voice"it is ...n't that---I didn't

...for anything--but ---but I feel very lonely, and unhappy---and---and ...thought you might be lonely and unhappy too---you seem so fond of her."
..."fond of her." The great general repeated slowly, and there was a strange
...ver in his voice, and a strange gleam in his eyes"I think or know I
...m fonder of her than I have ever been of any other human being but ...seven or eight."

Hazel came a step nearer, she was not afraid of general Evans any longer ...not now anyhow.

"Wardythose human badges, violet,and her sisters, and Angelinia Aron
...burg?"she asked softly.

The great general gave a violent" start.."

"What do you know about violet, and her sisters and Angelinia Aronburg?"
...demanded very sharply.

"Not much, only what I have seen and heard of them, and that my little sister is like the beautiful one Jamie.The Housekeeper told ...that, and I thought perhaps if was why you cared so much for ...them."

"The house keeper told you this, did she?What else did she tell you..?"
...There was no evading the steady gaze of those keen grey eyes, but Hazel ...met the gaze, without flinching;; she had nothing to fear.

"That is all " she said quietly...x2.2.2.

"She didn't tell you that I am a heartless"brute"against the enemy, I ...became known to the Vivian Girls and thousand millions of other childre
...children things I didn't particularly fancy.She didn't tell you I almost ...have refused to forgive the Glandelinians, and at times give their soldiers
...no quarter in battle."?

"No"said Hazel"she never told me that."

"Well if she had it would have been nothing but the simple truth.
...There are many things that won't bear talking about, and that a man can ...never forgive Glandelinia too.I suffered too at their hands then I was a ...child.I was ...slave."

...ll of her sudden impulse, so like a child-she, Hazel held out
...both her hands to the great General.

"I'm so very sorry"she said,"I feel I could say something to comfort
...you."

...paused in a most characteristic way, waving his hand d...
...you tell me something about yourself if child--- if she couldn't
...from the shoulder wound,-you can you will be alone in the world
...only two other sisters."

...nodded,he did not trust himself to speak.

"...must have some relations surely."?

"I have a father and mother up north in Clyde--- city.Child
...I and my sisters have been in the army ever since the war ...broke out, and ever since our father died in battle."

"Mildred told me your father though he sided with our country, ...came was a bot born Glandelinian. How about your mothers people---have ...nothing to do with them."

"...the female relatives are in the army as soldiers, and the women
...Red Cross Nurses, or child scouts, according to age.some of them ...in the Regiments of child scouts personally organized by the Vivian ...Girls."

"Do you know very much about, violet, and her sisters."asked the ...general.

"I don't know very much, about them."said Hazel with a slightly ...heightened color."I know their Mother the Empress well, I should say only ...child to her own father,if believed the bad enemy for near relation was
...and it was said she was a poor scrub woman in a foreign country,
...mayor widow, when crowding princes, took pity on her, brought ...her to this country, to get her into better circumstances, and then fell ...in love with her and married her."

"Grandmother and Grand father of the Vivian Girls both dead,I ...suppose."

"Their Grandmother died when their mother was a little girl.I never ...heard anything about their grand father;he may be dead too."

"...was killed by some Glandelinian assassin I suppose."

"Oh no, no that never happened.Their mother is very fond of him,
...but because of some strange mystery of this dreadful war, we have never ...heard much about their family, and if any one asks them anything they ...won't tell of a thing, but ask those who question them"to mind their own ...business."

There was a short pause,, the general drummed rather nervously with his big fingers on the table, he was the first to speak..

"...nervously with his big fingers" on the table, he was the first to speak..
"...their mothers name before she married?"he asked abruptly.

Hazel hesitated.

"I suppose you will think it very strange, she said, "but they really ...don't know.My own father who knew the secret died on the battlefield of ...Riverine, when I was only eleven months in the service as principal
...violet,and her sisters had never heard her station her maiden name

"...don't know their own mothers maiden name? rak that sure is a ...peculiarity of theirs.She didn't often mention her family to her ...children them."

"...very often spoke of her father, and brother, she loved them ...dearly."

A wave of some strong emotion swept over general Jack Evans face ...and for a moment the hand resting on the table trembled, sensibly, but ...Hazel was too preoccupied with her own sad thoughts to notice it.
...Then he spoke, and his voice shook in spite of all his efforts to self...
...control...

"...loved them you say--- loved them dearly to the last?"

Did Hazel started. Something in the manner and face of the ...general, suddenly struck her as strangely odd. She gave one quick
...search into his white set face, and next moment had started impulsively
...to her feet.

"What me do something for".you, you look as if you're ill.Oh I ...am so sorry if I have said anything to hurt you.I did not know you had ...lost a daughter.Oh I am fearfully sorry, and let me do something to help
...you."

"You have not hurt me and I'm not ill,either, so you need not ...worry.Sould that..sit down again and tell me some more about the mother ...of the Vivian Girl Princess"------I've got an idea that I used to know ...her long, long time ago."

"You knew the mother of Violet and her sisters?"

"I knew a little girl when I was a little boy who answers pretty ...well to her description;;she was a child slave under the Glandelinian
...slave plantation master by the name of Ernest De Chatre, and she held ...position as nurse maid to his children..."

"Yes, yes, that was the Glandelinian slave masters name,I know or knew
...the man"cried Hazel Wonder."Oh how strange it seems that you ...should have known them, who did you never tell me before."?"

"Because"said General Evans slowly"for I became the guardian of the ...Vivian Girls,I made a vow.I vowed to myself that as long as this man
...lived on,I would never forgive the Glandelinian people, for what many ...of them did to the Vivian Girls, and what the slave masters did to me ...when I was a child--never to have anything to do with Glandelinia or ...her country.I had wished that the whole Glandelinian nation sank down into ...the bottom of the earth, never to rise again."

"You---you---you made that to vow." gasped Hazel growing very ...pale."You must have known what the Glandelinians did to them, and that ...you must have known something about their mother too when she ...was a slave there---oh general Evans, tell me what does it ...mean?"

"It means that the Glandelinians are worse than wipers,, they are hard ...hearted selfish and cruel snakes.Their wicked pride makes them do all ...those wicked things.My high commission, and other things, and the memory of ...that vow might have kept me from revealing the truth even now if it ...were not for this child child.I have known who violet and her sis ers
...were, and their brothers, and who their mother was too, from the first day
...I saw them.The likeness were unmistakable unmistakable, and then there ...were the names.Were it not for the poor childs affliction, a girl Mildred ...might have passed for the living image of one of the Vivian Girls, and ...less of the mother of the Vivian Girls at their age.."

"My sister rose h resembling their mother."repeated Hazel in growing ...bewilderment"you mean to say their mothers name last name was Evans?You ...knew her long ago,---was she---was she any relation, of yours?"

"She was my motheritt sister"said general Evans solemnly."The enemy
...thieves stole her from my mothers door.I almost broke her heart and
...she died, from grief, and it broke my heart at the same time.In ...resisting them they killed my father and carried me off too.Then all that
...and what the Vivian Girls suffered at the hands of the brutes, can you ...blame me if I can ever forgive the foecwhat they did to my mother and ...sister, and my relations the Vivian Girls.I am their own uncle and since
...they've gone to Wicky Hansinis---l---l---am very lonely, I'm going
...when it Mildred recovers if she ever does."

There was a sound outside the door, and doctor Henry entered the rooms ...without noticing the agitation on the two faces or else mistaking the ...cause, he walked up straight to Hazel, and took her hand ,inhis.

"Miss Manning"he said very gently"I want you to prepare yourself for a ...great surprise---a great joy.Doctor Jones and I both think we have been ...rewarded for nothing.It is true your little sister will suffer bad for ...some time yet, but she's in no danger.. and provided
...there are no complications arise in the wounds, which I believe never will
...there is every reason to believe that she will entirely recover and ...will be out of bed in two weeks.Give her this though to make her sleep

...ation as the [illegible] I'll keep her like [illegible] other in."

...ral Pyne sank back in his big chair, with a murmured "Thank god, and then covered his face with his hands.The moment the girlscout leader Lucille Jackson heard the news she flattened the paper in the prisoners face [illegible] telling them, that ners saved their worthless lives, and had them marched away. Next moment the general had lifted his face again with a violent start, for a pair of warm young arms were around his neck, soft tear wet face was pressed to his.

"Uncle!"whispered the young sweet voice,"Dear general,I think I under stand it all, and I want to tell you something that empress vivian said before I left her palace."If you should ever see general Evans--it isn't ever likely that you will--but if you ever should, have my darling daughters love him for my sake, and teach all little boy and girlscouts to love him too, for he is my long lost brother sent back to us by Heaven.They do love you indeed they do, though they don't know you are their uncle---and if you would only reveal to them who you really are I don't think they would be lonely any more."

One of the greatest delights of being a captian of the boy and girlscouts came to Jimmy the next day....with Dick Saunders and Jack his brother with him, breaking in a number of new recruits, Captian James remained at the head of the column on horseback until the nearest portion of the christian lines had been left behind..Then he called pick saunders to him.

"Increase up the speed of the column a little Joe" Timoine called to his littttttt lieutenant."Bring us up to the Cuddendads."

Ab ...ander was at the head of the column too, learning the details of boy scout work.Presently when all were on the go, Basom Hurn, rode forward to see the lay of the land.soon after he had done so, and reported the enemy in motion near Candonlinia fortification, and looking very fine and manly in his uniform, chief leader timothy Groveton, called him to the left of the column. Here was approaching a column of beautifully uniformed girlscouts.

"Miss' Angelinia Richee, had has something to say to you."said Groveton. When Joe saw who she was, he blushed to the roots of his hair. He would would hive beaten a retreat had that been possible, for the girlscout standard order of spies was the very girlscout he had defended against half a hundred Landelinians recently some months before.

"Master Hurn,I have wanted ever ...since you went to my rescue three months before to thank you as warmly as I knew how.But we girls are so busy trying to learn the enemy a lesson or two, that I have missed seeing you of late."

"If it is just the same Miss Richee,I'd rather not be thanked."

...mmered Hurn, reddening still more.

"Hurn is brave as h... a tenacious bulldog in the face of all kind of danger,but he seems to have a positive terror of a little womans ...attitude."Laughed,' Timothy Groveton.Others [illegible] joined in.

"No--no--o it isn't exactly that, really it isn't"urged Joe(go and blow) "but a boyscout who is raised in the tanks as I have enough like I am, feels peculiarly giddy and foolish at being called a hero for driving back a handful of Landelinians single handed."

"Brave Bravo called one of the boyscouts.Now Miss Richee, really you must admit that you'd". Joe ...ans didn't really do anything."

The laugh was therefore against the grateful girlscout leader, and she joined in the merriment, though her eyes spoke volumes.Joe as quickly as he could, politely, escaped with his party down the road.pick was at the head of his own squadron.All were in red, purple scouting uniforms, but of thin uniforms as the weather was so sultry....

"Combine game of scouting on the enemy is getting into my bood blood" he confessed Dick his eyes glowing as with the lightest touch on the reins, he ...urged his horse forward as slowly as he pleased."

"Is it'll always will be in my blood"Tom answered in a matter of fact way."I've heard of many persons sitching...in camp at nothing to do all the live long day, and especially the soldiers" when not in action, but I never will as long as there's plenty of scouting for me."

"I will Ab. and Joe who managed the direction along the roads.The had run well along, the shore of the river, and were some miles out from the christian lines when the enemys lines moving toward the christian positions was spotted by one of them. com with one eye on everything and one on the eye on every movement of the Landelinian armies while awaiting the word from one of his assistants.He supposed that one of the christian generals would want to get their defensive lines into position before six oclock that evening. As the minutes went by, how ...noon began to like the looks of the enemys lines much the less. ...mpressive d... the scene was far from that of an approaching ...le, but enemy attacks ...s were at the christian lines with the suddenness of a violent storm, especially upon the besieging christian center ...and around Vivian Pickey.Then through the field glass, Tom made out battle warning signals from the distant military signal stations.Thus was the warning of the signal corps to the christian generals whose line of positions made be in the danger zone.At sight of that Tom started to the rear, to encounter Avreline Pichee herself coming forward to greet him in a friendly manner.

"Tom"announced the girlscout."The girlscouts following me, have decided that since we have plenty of provisions and ammunition with us, they'd rather have supper out here in the open country, and return to the camp in the early evening."

"Take this glass, and see if you can make out the flag at the top of that signal station Miss Pichee."urged Tom.

Avreline Pichee did so.

"What the"----she ...gaped turning slightly pale.

"Just what you thought, the "military battle danger flag Miss Richee.

In view of that,don't you think we'd better head back at once sir to the section of the christian line threatened.They may need our help."

"What do you say To m."That signal is alarming.The attack I believe will be very severe if it comes by the looks of that flag."

"If there's an attack storm coming Midd miss Richee, we can't tell yet just when it will break upon the christian positions,, but it's likely to be sudden and almost without warning, and it may be big, or squatbly. If you want my judgement, Miss pichee, it would be for us to go back at once, and take no chance chances letting any of the christian generals be taken off their guard.We are known as the "[illegible] head you know."

"Oh so then"replied the girlscout I don "I'll explain to the rest of the scouts."

Dick was in the lead, Tom standing by his horse at ease, when ...ck came ...ding forward.

"D... know captain."she began plaintively,"You've put me very ill at ...ease."

"Then I'm sorry."acknowledged Tom.

"...alking about a storm attack I mean.You know of general Jennins Jennings, Abyssinkilian line."?

"...s, ma'am."

"General "[illegible]kins division of Dondoblane is due to cross into ...ition near that line, this evening,, and my sisters girl and boyscouts ...there coming down from St johns creek Landing.I was expecting to see there and how followers[illegible] and richy.Maytheresle[illegible]tttttt christian generals to manage their battle formation divisions. It was reported that General Hunden went down bleeding, but that his lieutenant took his place and held the lines of battle steady.

"I've been thinking sir"shouted Timoth in Penrods ear above the roar of conflict, "that maybe the refugees would feel easier if they could seek refure in Fort Popham for if it is attacked it is good as it cannot be carried.There's plenty of room there for them where they can be comfortable, if the attacks might violent sir, and if any section of the christian line gives way in that locality the Cardellinians might rush the camp, and massacre every one.The attack is mighty fierce up your way sir."

"Yes I see that,they get safely at the fort" agreed the general."We don't want to endanger the refugees, be in any necessary danger."

So Timothy Groveton, sent all his troop of boy and girlscouts to the refugee camps, sending every one who were afraid of the enemy to the fortifications mentioned, or to the strong interior of general Jack Evans army which was far out of the zone of attack. As he neared with his child scouts another terrified refugee camp, he threw his troop into position for fear the surging enemy would come around that way as the danger of the christian army being driven back was increasing.The women and children, many of them hysterical flocked to the fort, or Evans lines, frantic to get away from the rolling sound of cannon and the earsplitting crash of musketry and shell fire, but the men folk were not afraid and decided to join the christian troops should the enemy if successful in the assault storm the camps. The women andchildren of the refugees did not forget to praise the officers of the boy and girlscouts.

"If they're willing to stay and give the enemy resistance leave the men folk in the camps,Jack2"suggested Timothy."The rest of them had come to the fortification or Evans camp.But I wonder what that Susan Farrol is doing out there"pointing"They say she's cowardly for deserting Mildred Manning when Evans thought she was an enemy scout, but that I don't look it whereeshe is keeping herself."

"Never mind"she can take care of herself I suppose."declared Penrod."Of course if I get near enough I'll chase her back out of danger .Instead of a coward after all she's a little rechoos."

The refugees all who ent went were soon confortable at the fort.Early supper was served, and despite the roar of distant battle all were now in good spirits.none of the boy and girlscouts were however, and Angeline Richee was worried more, and more, about the outcome of the conflict. She did not fear for herself or friends but of the child scout command of Mary Stancks sister. Unwilling to bother the others with her dread, Mary herself, asked Angeline Richee, and Timothy Groveton, and also Penrod many questions. In the direction of the north the rain of shell fire had ceased falling, or had sifted, but it was utterly smoky outside, and the noise of heavy musketry firing had increased to a redoubled din, and there was much yelling from the enemy now. The attack drove in heavily, the fury ofbattle was"Running high", and the sound of firing along the christian line was like the unceasing roar of an Hurricane lashed ocean along a rocky shore.

"Penrod dear I know I'm a nuisance"confessed Mary Stanck, appealing to the boyscout Standard leader."But is there any way of finding out if the enemy has attacked general Mullikans lines, where my sisters troop of girlscouts are stationed.."

"It's just possible the Standard boy or girlscouts of Dundees division may known"replied the boy."I'll telegraph down, there to you for you."

The message came back, from the Standard child scout guard at the Signal station Number Ten that" nothing had been heard from general Mullikans division, and that the battle was extremely severe along his lines, which was believed to bear the full brunt of the attak. attack.The report said however the enemy's loss was becoming something awful, and that the christian line was being reinforced.Of course the report told also that general Hooners division have been driven to the Dundee Crossroads a few miles away however, broken and shattered, and that a new division had started for the scene, but that all Standard child scouts were terribly hard pressed in their work to prevent disaster along general Jargers lines and couldn't do anything to save Jane Stancks troop if it was in danger, unless they knew where they were located.But general Mullikins communication was cut off from them."

"Then if anything happens to general Mullikan, there'll be no troops able to reinforce him on time."shuddered Mary Stanck, and all others looked pale.In a moment of uneasiness, Mary Stanck insisted on going out on a signal station, where she could keep her gaze toward the battle lines.. Penrod paced the station platform with her. Leaning against the rail, Jack Saunders stood vigil too.. An hour passed. Shots seemed now aimed from somewhere at the station, but they were sheltered, and they held their post.Then from far out in the gloom(the boom) in the direction of the raging battle, a rocket flared up against the sky. It was followed by others,,then came a burst of fireworks signals.

"Oh,oh,oh,"groaned Mary Stanck, almost sinking as she covered her eyes." "There's danger to Mullikan.I know it must be.That's his distress signal,calling for aid."

Groveton down below had seen the signal too, and he swung quickly, without a word, making for the telephone inside.Mary and the two others descended, a the girlscout tottering after,,Jack spring to her side, to give her an arm.Penrods face was white with syp sympathy and concern, when he himself turned away from the telephone instrument to which he had been called to by Groveton.

"yes it's Mullikans army"he admitted very quietly."It's cut to pieces and is on full retreat.General Mullikan is mortally wounded, and the general who should have taken his place is dead.That mans our own battle line here cannot hold either.It'll soon retire."

Mary Stanck did not faint.she sank into a chair shaking convulsively her hands to her face.Groveton handed a message to Jane Melfort, the fast girlscout horseback rider saying;

"See that general Evans get's this note right away.I'll flash a warning to general Manson."

"Is it possible to get a signal flashed to violet and her sisters at Wickey Lansins." then asked Groveton.

"Yes"said Penrod."I'll flash it."

And he rushed to that properv station to send the message.

Groveton looked down at Mary with intense pity.Than a flash of his own daring dare devil resolution lit up his eyes.He rested a hand on the stricken little girlscouts shoulder.

"There's no other child scout troop near at hand.I've signalled to the Burroughs, and the Vivianites, and even the higher grand yet the Standards, but they're so busy that they even now can't get to us."But our troop a is at your disposal."

"What do you mean?"questioned the girlscout officer looking up in appeal.

"I mean"returned the leader in the same low tones,"That I'm a boyscout which you know ain't afraid to do things.I man that I and Angelinia Richee have a stout column of boy and girls who know how to ride on fast horses, and a regiment of good old Abbieannian Stock.I'll request the plan of Timothy Groveton, who's in Gertrudes place and see whether he'll approve of it.It's risky but we must try ourselves to reach your sisters regiment if we have to fight our way through the attackers ourselves. We're soldiers too you know."

Penrod rode up to Groveton who was watching the awful sad scene with an excited but anxious expression on his face.Penrod told of his plan hastily and then said;

"Captian Groveton do you think under such conditions and in such a adventure do you believe that your regiment will stand by me now.?"

"Yes, and if they didn't I'd be through with them."uttered Groveton his eyes blazing as he took a step forward."I think I know your orders sir..."""QQAZ Penrod, Groveton, and other boy scout officers sprang to give their orders of "Fall in".eathing the excitement and the enthusiasm, every one of the others followed swiftly, Penrod explaining that general Mullikans army"according to the signals he recieved and understood, had been literally "Rammed"by the attackers, and had been driven back from the position and was retreating across Dundee Roads. The army was as bad in shape as if it was a ship rammed by another and in a sinking condition.The instant Joe Turner jumped onto his horse the column started moving.Those of Angeline Richees column hastily donned on their heavy cartridge belts, and pistols, and slung on their rifles, and grenade bags...ick at the Van, Penrod by his side, to pick up the way i with the searchlight, and the remainder of the column back of them----that was the last glimpse of the Mascot Rangers as they rode down the road, disappearing in a cloud of dust, to battle with death and destruction on the Dundee Crossroads.

Rocie Rockets continued to ascend from the direction of the stricken christian divisions, and it was believed they came from the child scout Regiment of the Vivianites under Mary Stancks sister. As soon as Penrods column was well on its way,Penrod looking through his field glasses could see where the child scout regime regiment was.He sent a signal himself so that the child scoute of the endangered regiment might know relief was heading their way...

A single rocket rocket came roaring tward them, to show that the promise of help was understood. Then Penrod swung his powerful hand search light around, to pick up any other child scout camp that might be in danger. Once on the far outer edge of the ray, the Glandelinian fortifications of Thumbelinia, showed at that distance small and indistinct.

"Our Glandelinian friends over there, must th ink we have forgotten them."smiled Penrod wistfully.

"We couldn't very well forget them."smiled Timothy Groveton."They were too entirely attentive to us,"

"I'm actually aching to know the secret of that Glandelinian fortification and its grim crowd.."confessed Penrod.

"If I am"retorted Groveton, dryly,"I can at least hold my curiousity well in check.It's possible to know too much about that crowd of Glandelinians,to my way of thinking."

Though they rode together, it was necessary for both of them to talk 9n in loud tones, because of the uproar of the distant battle. So pick bending over a little ,anaged to hear some of the conversation.

"Talking about the garrisons of the enemy at Fort Tyru Thumbelinia.?" Queried pick.

"Yes, wut just the same you must forget it Davis."rejoined Penrod Groveton."As a new member of the boyscout troop, you must learn at once that some things of great dangar are never gossiped about."

"I don't believe I have ever been any where near being extremely talkative.. .2" pick answered flushing somewhat..

"I didn't mean just that"rejoined Groveton."hat I did mean Davis was to cut caution you never to let any one suspect that we ever had such an interest on those Fortifications.s.e..e.s.s.PePerhaps we did have a big one once upon a time, but we are not saying anything about it...."

"At one time?" Penrod started to repeat these threese words aloud, but on swift second thought let his voice die down.Did Groveton really mean that he did not intend to dig any deeper in the affairs of the Thumbelinia Fortifications."

"If he's going to drop the matter I'm not."Blazed Penrod, inwardly."Thos Those Glandelinians went altogether too far with me making me suffer such losses amongst my own following, and putting out of commission Angelinia Aronburg upon whom I sorely depend.I'm never goingbto drop that untill I get even with that garrison."

Almost unconsciously Penrod gazed in the direction of Fort Thumbelinia. He caught himself doing it, and turned his head forward.Before they left the christian camp(scamp) it had been necessary for them to chooose choose their best and fastest fastest horses.In the distance they could see that the enemy istead of dweeping forward in columns or platoons to the attack, were rushing forward in waves.Joe and Ab-(hab) in the rear of the child scout column could be reached only by a loud whistled signal.As Penrod turned down the road, he observed a long swarm of Glandelinian soldiery, like a bigcombre, dash over a portion of the christian position far to his right, hurling the christian troops back against the second line of positions to the rear. During the excitement of the scene a shell exploded in the air close overhead and the concussion was so severe that Grovetons horse fell and Groveton would have gone over into a mud filled ditch, but Penrod with a cry, sprang off his horse, and caught hold of his leader. At the same time two other horses had dropped to their knees, and their riders leaped off or both would have been caught under the fallen horses and crushed.All this time a second and bigger wave of Glandelinian troops followed.As it was all the rest saw how the christian troops battled, and pick seeing the disaster threatening the child scouts, swung a portion of the column around for a moment.Then recovering from the surprise they watched the battles rage.

"We've got to get through at some other section sir"Penrod shouted in Grovetons ear.

"Impossible to get through"answered Groveton."Hold the column on this road, and we'll go on untill we see the lay of the land.Take our course again pick.But watch out that the enemy don't see us.They're near enough enough to give us a hot fire if they see us."

For one instant Grovetonpicked up the situation of the battle in the distance once more with his military fieldglasses.. .He saw that the christian generals in charge was acting wisely.He had brought forward reinforcing lines of troops, was as was supporting the defense with a very heavy and steady artillery fire, and passing smaller guns into position very quickly. Across Davis works he had hurled a line of troops, and supported it with a curtain shell fire, so that the enemy could not drive the troops from the wolks, even though fiercer and fiercer became the Glandelinian attack.

Had the christian line there been less formd formidbly defended, the christian troops must surely have been driven before that terrible human "storm,"so savage was the Glandelinian assault... As it was they had all they could do to hold their own. And to reach the regiment of Marys ister sister, Penrods boys and goils had to go through a portion of that zone of fire.

"Any chance that you can make the regiment under Jane Stanck,Captian?" bellowed Timothy Groveton.

"We can make them sir."Penrod shouted back.

"But can you get through the zone of fire, without our side losing any of its boy and girlscouts.."!"!!!! "

"I don't know sir.We can only try.Master Groveton arevyou the kind of boy who is daring enough to stake his life, and troop on the chance that we can reach and save Mary's sister, and her regiment out there! For I believe the chance is as big for our going to destruction, as it is for saving any one in that regiment."

"I'm the one Penrod"retorted Groveton, cooly. "Go ahead and do whatever you dare."

That was enough for captian Timothy Groveton.He knew his own temper in the matter and felt, that he knew the mettle of the boy and girls girlscouts under him...

"""""Go ahead Dick, right up to theleft of the battle line.It's safer if it is necessary to do so to suddenly dash upona regiment of the assallants, than have a great column of Glandelinian vipers come crashing on us.Get up as close as you can if possible without their being able to see us.I'm going to try to get in our strange signal code codes to Jane Stancks troop which is within hailing distance in that field yonder, but almost cut off from us by the attack.Keep your ears open for orders Joe....."

The last words were shouted through the military magaphone.The column of boy and girlscout was thrown in a long line of formation, and Prwson sword drawn rode in front of them.

"Every one get out the hand grenades.After that when we charge, and there's time, use the sabre."ordered the young Captian."Our rush can disconcert the enemy."

The grenades were to save the girl and boyscouts from any loss if possible, when the foe and they would if necessary crash head on.

"Advance cautiously, and do not let them see us,and not too close at first, pick"added Timothy Groveton, as the column of troopers got to the leftof the Glandelinian wave of attack where the christian line was gapped.This was the opportunity, and the boy and girlscouts of both Penrods, and Grovetons were through that gap in no time, and had come upon the victorious enemy so suddenly, and flung their grenades so rapidly to right or left, or used their sabres so vigoriously, and their horses dashed on with such speed, that they literally went through the Glandelinian column as if the Glandelinians were not there.Nearly half a thousand boy and girlscouts of Jane Stancks Standards lined their own works, as this sudden scene burst upon them.The Glandelinians inthis locality were as panic stricken as if an army of spirits had suddenly appeared and dashed upon them, and they fled helter skelter, enabling Penrod and his column to get to the easy speaking distance of the Standard girl and boyscouts.The gap in the christian christian line was closed by a reinforcing troop, and the Glandelinians here, feared to even rally, as Penrod leaped to a high works with a magaphone at his lips.

"Child scout Regiment in the west."he bellowed."How many have you ver there over there."

"Fifteen hundred and fifty two---adding seven child slave refugees--- four of them girls." came the shrill answer from the camp.

"We're going to try to get over to you, while the christian line holds on against the enemy.Have you anything better than rifles and pistols to come over to us with through the enemys lines?"Groveton himself questioned in his loudest tones..

"We even have something better,"captian"came the responsent.

"Then stand your troop ready, and we'll try to fight our way closer so you can come.As soon as we get into position, sent two or three of your best riders first, to help manage the situation.Then send the girls first, and the boys will cover them."

"Aye, AyeCaptian."

"Now advance in a long line pick, and make the demonstration carefully.."was Grovetons next order, as he himself gave the signal for the "Speed ahead." As they continued to push on at the gallop, they were still some three four threese hundred feet off from the Standard child scout encampment, which it could be seen, fortunately hd had not been as troubled by the assailants as Mary Stanck had feared.Then the boy and girlscouts of Penrods troop rode nearer, keeping the enemy in front of them from rallying, and the enemy still retreating, though they were now opening fire, but without effect as yet.Nevertheless it was the critical instant.Nothing but wonderfully good leadership could prevent the boy and girlscouts from being suddenly attacked, and the situation to be reversed. Though not afraid of any number of christian soldiery, the enemy seemed to dread these Mascot Ranger child scouts.

"Over to the left Dick"roared the young boyscout captian.himself urging his horse forward."Be ready to deploy our regiment If a big sea of Glandelinian soldiery strikes the christian line.I see a monsterous column of reinforcements for the enemy coming at the double time..."

In the other camp, the imperiled standard scouts stood breathless but ready to fight too if need be.They wanted to cheer, but dared not lest the, drown out orders which was hard enough to be heard as it was above the roar of the battle of pundee Crossroads. But suddenly a wild yell went up fro.every child scout on both sides. For a tremendous sea of Glandelinians soldiery struck and drove the christian line from the works and rolled it up or was rolling it up from the battlefield.A portion of that same sea of attack, caught and hurled a portion of Penrods boy and girlscout troop into shelter for defense, but Penrod was hurled from his horse by the collission and thrown to the ground. At such close quarters, Dick javis couldn't leave his command of boys, even for an instant, or all might be dashed to terrible disaster, and the enemy could gain the reputation of once being able to crush even the most dangerous of all their christian foes. put he bawled hoarsely;

"Penrods dismounted and in peril."

Jack Saunders had seen the fearful mishap too, for jean Saunders horse in the excitement had ran into Penrods, and that was what had causedthe trouble, Jean herself also having been thrown and narrowly escaping being trambl trampled on by others. Jack urged his horse forward but every one else in the confusion was in his way and he couldn't reach the spot, while all around and for a great extent the fiercest hand to hand fight of every description was raging as if two legions of the wildest fiends were at war. Joe who had dismounted, crawled along the road, when he caught something of Dicks cry, reinforced by the startled chorus from the Standard scouts. Joe had halted for an instant himself as he saw a burly ruffian of a Glandelinian rushing at him with fixed bayonet, but he shot the man dead, and then clutched tightly to a low hanging branch of a tree and swung himself behind, but as the wave of Glandelinian troops passed with a hurricane of yells, and he heard the cry nevertheless, Jenson straightened up)pop(and fairly leaped forward.

A shell exploded close by, and the concussion threw him flat, but that saved him from the flying fragments though he was all but smothered by the strong powder smoke, and dazed by the fearful noise of the explosion.

Jean Saunders had thought it wiser to remaining lying where she was, while Jane Helfort who had seen the disaster, and whistled to Mildred Maxwell her signal, swung her own troop of followers around trying to get to where Penrod was.If the two forces would come together in a hand to hand melee right here, Penrod in the lines close by, would likely be crushed to death by the trampling of so many feet in the dark, or be bayoneteed by any number of Glandelinians who perhaps would see him.Great star shells flared in the sky however making some parts of the battlefield nearly as light as day. But nevertheless Joe's eyes, almost too sharp to need any of these sar search lights, first caught sight ofPenrods body half under a fallen rock and a pile of earth thrown over him by an explosion. Joe too as he reached that part of the road, just then saw that a long rope had been abandoned by somebody above.In a jiffy Joe caught the rope, and hurled it to Penrod, holding fast at the other end.

"Good, haul up fast my lad."shouted Groveton;s voice, as he caught sight of what the boyscout was doing."There may be a hope before the close quarters fight starts down there.But is the only one.. "

"I don't dare just now haul up."Joe shouted over his shoulder as he crouched braced against a rock."I want to see ifPenrod had the other end. If not then I'll haul and throw again to him."

Joe pulled only enough to bring in the slack, and then he felt a weight at the other end....

"Yes he's got the rope."shouted Joe."Take hold with me Jack---but don't ha haul too fast.. "

Dick was having all he could do to handle the rest of his followers In this ticklish situation,but it proved the leadership of the lavis boyscout.He couldn't allow his own followers to recklessly expose themselves, and veer abruptly away from the rest of his comrades, for that manoevrer must almost certainly caused the enemy to be able to drive them all back, and then the rescue of Penrod would be impossible. Theyyoung captian was having all he could do to save himself for several Glandelinian soldiers seeing him alone were attacking him with the bayonet,and too the christian line itself was having all it do could do,with battling with the great human waves of gray. nd also any sudden wrench would have snatched out of Penrods hands, the rope on which rested his sole hope for life.

As for the boy scout Ab, that restless boyscout in the rear of the others, was going through the ordeal of his life. He had heard picks wild yell through the uproar of the frightful battle. All that was also alive in Ab urged him to leap forward and take command, but his own boyscouts were behind a strong bulwark fighting fearfully themselves for safty, and therefore he knew that he must remain here, ready to obey any order from the leader as soon as given.That much depended upon any of the boy and girlscout leaders. slowly, panting in sheercompanse, Joe and Jack, though now under fire hauled in foot after foot of the rope and the weight fortunately still hung.Once in a while Joe caught sight of his chums head through a sudden passing cloud of smoke.It seemed like years,though the time was not long before they had Penrod close to the edge of the ledge.He had been propelling himself forward and backwards with his feet, while he hung with both hands to the rope.

"All right oh old fellow.Easy now---hole fast."bellowed Joe hoarsely. "We'll have you with us in a jiffy."

All the while now from some locality a great number of cannon was rolling wildly in thundering sound and the shock was becoming terrific. terrific, and shells racked the air with the din and the flashes were as if the wildest thunderstorm ever seen was raging. Dick had contrived without allowing his troop to retreat, or forge ahead, to save off from too much of his part of the conflict.

"Make the haul quicker."shouted Joe over his shoulder to Jack. By that trick they brought Penrod up close to the level of the ledge. "Hold my feet"cried Joe diving his head below the ledge.Jack understood, and obeyed. Joes head and arms launched out past the edge, far enough down to grip both Penrods hands.Jack started to haul them both up.Dick left his post for just an instant and bore a hand.

"Bam. A shell exploded in the air above them, as another sea of Glandelinians was raging against the christian lines which had repulsed the former assault with reat great loss to both sides.But Penrods head and and shoulder were protected from shell fragments by the edge of the ledge, and too Joe was far to b too low to be struck by any of the splinters.He saw too the christian line a little in front of him was too far extended to be struck by the full force of the Glandelinian wave attack, which went further off the other way.Jack and pick were stoutly braced.Looking and feeling like a rat in a trap, Penrod was hauled to terra ferma.From the sharper eyed ones amongst the distant camp of the endangered Standard girlscout troop, a rousing cheer went up.The feeling was stronger amongst the Mascot Rangers, though there was no noise of any kind made, for Joe stopped only long enough to say to Timothy Groveton;

"Look after him sir untill he get's his wind.I'm afraid he's injured."

Then Dancer remounting his horse, took his post beside pick, for Joe was second in command to Penrod.Penrod explained to Groveton how at the instant of being thrown over the ledge to the ground below from his horse he had clutched as by instinct, at the end of a strong limb of something protruding from the ledge wall, and therefore had broken his fall enough to prevent himself from being killed, or recieving serious injury.

"ircle around the works again, and come on in the left." Joe said tersely, and moved forward to swing his column around to the defensive portion of his position.Penrod lay on his back, taking in deep breaths ,while groveton holding fast to a tree stump to prevent himself from being thrown down violently by any shell explosion concussion, squatted beside him.The christian line before the third attack of the enemy had began to withdraw somewhat slowly.It was easy to see that unless some more reinforcements came that even this massive christian line had not much longer to retain its position.This gave the boy and girlscouts fair warning that they had not many minutes more in which to rescue the Standard girlscouts under Jane Stanck.But Joe, at picks elbow, ran his mounted column to the very spot Penrod had planned to do.. The two battling lines had already surged together, but the christian troops in front of the childscouts had not yet closed with the assailants, so well did the christian artillery men handle their ytheir pieces, so that the attack in this quarter seemed to steadily held at a standstill..2.2.2.2.2

In that instant of the slight lull in this locality, while the boy and girlscouts were ready for movements, a number of standardgirlscouts came galloping through an opening in the enemys lines slashing their way right and left with their own sabres and coming safely through. On through the gap came a dozen more at the risk of their lives.put their horses held on to the frenzied gallop, advancing fast raising such clouds of dust that the Glandelinians trying to intercept them were disconcerted smothered and blinded, and the children reached the Rangers in safty. Then another squadron of them came through, cutting down those who tried to intercept them also.One of the Standard girls got wounded and would have fallen from her horse just as she reached the Rangers, had not Joe dashed forward and caught her.Cheers went up from h those still left behind, as they saw this good start to safty made.Next to made it better the Rangers getting grenades ready, hurled themselves forward in a perfect tumult and cleared the way before them.Then as they did so half a platoon of girls outs came onward to life or death for freedom.Glandelinians on foot rushed them, to stop their progress but were driven back or sabred by the rangers and the rescued ones combined. They reached the rangers saftly.

"Help us in this rescue work please!"called Penrod."Go up forward and reinforce us in our efforts to rescue the rest of your comrades."

. Then another platoon of girls came through the gap, and they too reached reached the rangers in safty.just as another started, the Glandelinian soldiers with fixed bayonets began to close in.This caused the Standard girlscouts for the moment to be in the same situation almost as a man dropped into an angry sea.But they were close to the Rangers, who again charged flinging grenades or using sabre and pistol, and doing the rest.

As fast as they came, the girlscouts joined the Rangers in thework.It was hard on them in such an adventure, for in that awful battle field, it seemed as if the next wave of attack being prepared must carry the christian army beforevit. and everywhere the hoarse and shrill shouting of orders sounded much more like panic than the discipline of cool brave boys and girls.One little girl refugee who had been brought through, in fact, after a particularly heavy roll of shell explosions dangerously close to the Rangers, feeling that the end had come, made a frantic dash from the Rangers.Though it went against his grain,Penrod caught her, thrusting her roughly and firmly back to where she had been before stationed, as he shouted at her angrily;

"Hie Now don you fool foriegners that you're safe, don't hinder our work ofgetting the Standards and ourselves also out of this warstorm alive.You can't save yourself that way.you're leaping into a volcano."

After the girlscouts, came the Standard boyscouts.Then Penrod saw that the next that came looked like Burroughs.

"There's a few more child scouts to be accounted for"thought Penrod. "wonder where they are.?"

But he did not ask. After all, too it appeared to be none of his business, but rather that of the Standard captian.So Penrod stood by with his chum Groveton, giving a hand at keeping the rescue work up which had now lasted over an hour.Another"sea" the heaviest sea of glandelinians yet, struck fiercely against the christian line this time along every point, causing the battle to assume a redoubled fury,, and forcing the front line of christian troops to recoil in confusion against the second.The shock threw the the whole christian line into confusion, but the generals were able to save their armies from disaster by means of bringing up machine guns and mowing the assailants down.Shrieks of terror came from the refugees.

"Go over there with the refugees some of you boys, all who can be spared from duty."shouted Groveton."Steady them.Keep their nerves together."

Then to Penrod he added;

"Another smash upon the whole christian line like that sir, will start a disasterous retreat.We've got to hurry this work if we're to keep out of the danger zone, and get clear from the battle field in time to save ourselves.The glandelinians means business this time."

He made rapid signals to the leader of the Standards to hurry on the work of getting her followers through the danger zone.The work of rescue works moved somewhat faster.Only the artillery had saved the christian line and the child scouts so far.If the battle increased in severity which it threatened to do, or the Glandelinians came in fiercer attacks than ever, it was not difficult to guess the end....

"A heavy column of Standard boyscouts were ready to make the dash. "Let them come.Hurry up."roared Groveton and Penrod together, as they saw the christian line"tautening, and opening fire with a dreadful crash of musketry and cannon.But he had misjudged, for the enemy increased the pressure of the attack with great violence, and as the child scouts came dashing through the gappppp gap, they all but reached the christian lines, and it looked as if a swarm of fierce Gland linian soldiers were about to surround them.Therefore Penrod column charged with sabre drawn and hurling grenades, and they were saved.

"Mightyclose shave my friends."commented one of the Boyscout Mascots grimly.

A moment after a man came racing past them, and Penrod had to get a strong grip on himself to keep from wheeling about like a flash and looking the man over... He knew that mans face.He could not have mistaken it in a thousand.It was the "Mutt face" of the brutal Professional International spy, who had over a year ago locked him in a attic with Rattlesnakes.

"That's the one odd Glande linian soldier who didn't come down with the rest."throbbed the young boyscout captian."That Evil spirit of Manleys--the one wretch in the world I must get even with.And his Jeff companion too."

Then Penrod turned to hurry on the work of rescue not taking even a covert look at his arch enemy. He had always remembered that man and his smaller companion, for he had had a good glimpse on him often.

"And if I don't show my curiousity about him!He'll feel sure I haven(t recognized him."reasoned Penrod."He knows that in that dark room and attic,I didn't get as much as a single glimpse of his wicked face.He took too good care for that."

Again the whole christian line took an all but shattered assault.put the last of the Standards, had gotten through and every one was safe.

"Everybody get clear like a flash, the enemy is going to drive in a sledge hammer blow.Dick Stand by with your troop to cover the retreat if possible."roared Captian Groveton through the megaphone. Nor did any one lag.even the Standards were just as active, and they all put their horses through their best paces.As well as could have been, they all swung out down the road.

"The christian line, won't hold its works another half hour unless reinforced."said Jane Stanck huskily. She remained with the leaders, watching as long as she could see.The danger for all too was not yet over, nor would it be untill every one of the child scouts got beyond the zone of battle.But with the fury of the battle to the north, Groveton risked more speed on the columns horses than he had dared coming out into the teeth of the battle., and too the young boyscout leader seemed to have his mind wholly on his big task of making his own encampments saftly.Yet he found chance to mutter to himself;

"I musn't let that one odd refugee have even a guess that I know him, ---but I shan't let him slip away from me.He must be made to pay up."

Swinging the column to an oblique movement as he picked up the now dangerous approach to the camp, he wondered to himself,

"How how on earth did that fellow that looks so much like "Mutt" in the Daily News Comics of America contrive to get amongst the refugees, that were rescued by Jane Stancks Standard scouts.!"

A possible answer was not long in ariving.

"Of course the strange International spy has had time to travel over different parts of the war torn country in season to ship back here by train."Penrod understood."but why such a case, and why should he always make such dangerous trips from one christian army to the other."

To this however there were two answers.

"It may be that he couldn't guess how much trouble for him might lie behind the efforts of various boy and girlscouts regiments, and though he or his "Jeff"companion did not seem to fear Penrod, he did fear the child scouts, and more so Violet,and her sisters whom he never had dared to meddle with or encounter.So he may have thought it best to pretent to have skipped out of Calyerinia for a time and to pretend to get away on some foriegn soil.Then too he may have recieved some masked telegram or a signal code, or other message which told him that as long as he kept away from child scout encampments or the Vivian Girls, he and his companion would be safe in their work.But on the other hand the mutt fellow may have been captured by some scouts and had escaped.It may even be that Jane Stanck had chased t him and that he escaped through the battle lines and had cflited past Penrod. Despite all his puzzling,Penrod did not let his thoughts get wholly away from the handling of his various regiments.His watchful eye was on what was happening.As they came within sight of the Mascot Ranger camps.Penrod relieved Angeline Richee of her guideship.Angeline, tired and hot, and feeling slightly ill and overwhelmed by her desperate desperate exertions, hastened to the rear.Abe came forward, for Joe was in the rear covering the retreat.

Penrod was in the main lead now, and Groveton went some distance ahead to scout, and was soon returning back with a girl in his possession.

"Think of it"he said gravely"I picked up Susan Farrol way out here."

Penrod looked at the girl.

"What in the world were you doing way out here at this time?"he demanded.

Susan looked closely at Penrod, and saw he was a boy she was going to like at first notice.

"I was watching the battle."

"Indeed.And were you not afraid of getting hit?"

"No.Why should I care, when Mildred is wounded."

"You don't seem to care much about hitt yourd yourself.But you ran away from her when you got scared of general Evans."

"I'm afraid of him when he thinks I'm an enemy but ot not of the Glandelinians."

"Hm I see.And yet it is talked about that you shot down about one hundred and fifty Glandelinians this afternoon.Is that true?"

"She felt embrassed at this question shot at her, but she answered truthfully;

"I did shoot lots of Glandelinians down to get even for Mildred, but I didn't know how many.Anyway they attacked me."

"They attacked you boy.Yet according to the reports you had everything your own way.They think you're a mad insane child scout or possessed by a devil or something.They'll not approach you after this as they're awfully susp superstituous. Mildreds sister told me one day you wished to become a girlscout?"

"Oh yes that is true.But Miss Jennie Turmer wouldn't let me be one. She said I'm a deserter."

"You was, in some way, but not one justified for punishment because you didn't be a scout.But we generally overlook such offenses when you run from us, and not the enemy."

"Couldn't I ever become a girlscout."?

"I cannot admit you.If Jennie Turmer won't nei neither can I, and neither will the Princesses.But if you get a pull with Miss Angelinia Aronburg you might have a chance by atoning for your desertion of Mildred.If you want to prove your mettle. you can do something for me very soon.If you succeed, your deed will be in our record books, and that'll be one step to your chance."

"What is it?"she asked eagerly.

"Will your father object to our taking you a long?"

"no"she answered truthfully."He would be glad if I became a scout.He says its wonderful and he would be proud of me."

"Well you can't be a scout yet.That's up to you to show what you are worth first. Now stand close to me.I want you to pay be big head to a all I've got to say to you. As you're not in uniform and am a refugee and are believed to be insane by the Glandelinians this'll be easy for you.After we get well into camp, Sue,I want you to find some means to pretend you're bughouse.Understand.Either somewhere around here, you'll then notice a tall stout man in a long black coat, and wearing a big slouched hat. But first I'll have to ask you a question.Did you ever look at any funny papers over in your own country before you came here?"

"Yes sir."

"The Murr and Jeff Jokes of the Daily News Papers?"

"Yes."

"Well in natural looks the man appears like him.Well get such a good look at him that you can't miss knowning him the next time you see him—but don't under any conditions let him even guess that you are noticing him, as he's as much a crack shot as any of us scouts and he might shoot you down. Um Understand.....,.,?"

"I'm on."nodded Susan, sng slangingly but gravely.

"Then follow me.This will be your chance to make good."

Penrod headed into the camps Company Street.They went down into the company tx street in good formation, keeping well in military formation, untill Angeline Richee showed up at Penrods side, and slightly checking her horse.

"Captian"she said,"We've got so many child scouts amongst us now that we won't even think of going twtward Fort Popham now.The battle is not a surging this way and so we won't need to fear.But how about running in that direction anyhow, just the same, and we'll get word to the refugees that all the Standard child scouts are saved."

As Penrod led his scout squadron close to the fortifiation, they found all the refugees out in the grounds and many lining the fortified fences attracted by the clouds of dust,and the sound of galloping feet or horses hoofs.

"Tell Mary Stanck ."roared Penrid Penrod through his magaphone."hat we her sister,and her regiment through the battle zone saftly, and thatwe rescued even all refugees within her camps.We're tqking them to our own camps now, and we'll come over for you when the battle stops."

AA big cheer burst from the large group of refugees.Then with his signals given forth Penrod urged the column of child scouts once more up The Company Street.

Susan had been missing for some time but finally she returned.

"I got a good look at your friend" alright"She reported in an undertone. "We Whee, he looks to me like a cold blooded blooded devilfish, all right."

"Susan"returned Penrod,"That's the chap who over a year ago bur locked me in a house den with a lot of rattlesnakes because I would not tell where Jennie Turmer escaped to."

Susans eyes looked nearly as big as saucers.

"Going to try and capture him now?"demanded Susan.

"What would be the good?I have no proof aguinst him except my own word.No,no what I want to do, Susan, is to follow him, once he prepares to leave the camp.He gets away what is he is doing doing because he wears civilian clothes.You want to be the first to start leaving camp, act as if you are on some sort of a naughty lark.First run up the company street, and if it is necessary act too as if you're goofy.Get where you can watch that "Mutt"fellow as he comes along. Then follow him, no matter where, only don't risk entering the enemy lines. But for the Love of Heaven don't let him catch you on the trail, or even so much as shadowing him, or he may do a heap worse for you than he did for me, for he's got the nature of Glandelinians even if he ain't one, and hates girls of the christian sides worse than boys. Will you do this trick for me?"Susan.

"Will a hornet sting you?" demanded Susan with fine scorn. "Oh Master Penrod, we'll teach him that any of you boy and girlscouts are the wrong ones for him to fool with.We'll show him."

"Don't let him get away from you Susan.And be mighty sure where he stops at before you come back."

"You just leave it to me."begged Susan earnestly.

It was the biggest matter with which she had ever been intrusted, and the girl refugee felt duly elated.It would give her a pull with the supreme supreme girlscouts and what a sotry story she would have for Mildred Manning.How grandly good the tents of the camp looked as they neared the main christian positions somewhat away from the loudest sound of the battle.In a short time Penrod had halted at the gate of his own head quarters.Susan at this moment darted away up the company street on foot.

"Ask Joe Green to hurry the hot coffee."Jane"said Penrod.

Susan still running soon vanished beyond.Penrod had already told Susan to find him at General Evans headquarters, when she had a report to make for he was going to see how Mildred Manning was, having already also paid two visits to Gertrude Angeline, and found her much better.

Jane Stanck and all her followers crowded round Penrod and his officers as far as their big numbers allowed, pressing warm praise and thanks upon them.But this scene was soon over.Penrod as soon as he could quit his work, hurried to general Evans headquarters, and cleaned off his uniform before going in to inquire about Mildred.He was very happy indeed to learn she had passed alk danger.He then found a chai chair on a quiet portion of the veranda, and sat down to wait, for the time to pass untill Susan returned as he didn't feel like retiring. And too the noise of battle would keep every one awake..Evans's wasn't in, he had got his troops ready to march them to the aid of the christian line so greatly in danger.And when he starts in the enemy knows who's nhe is conteinding with.The first half hour began to file by. Penrod was nodding in his chair,dreaming over aga in the scenes of the battle, when one of the girlscouts of the headquarters shook him slightly.

"Master Penrod,"there is some one who wants you badly on the phone."

"Eh?"demanded Penrod."Oh yes.Thank you Joan Guard.I'm coming."

By the time that he rea reached the telephone booth he woke up with a jolt,for the voice that greeted him over the wire was Susan's saying-

"Oh Master Penrod.I had to go home.Glad to tell you I've had a fine time."

"You went home.I thought you went after the man ?"he said somewhat disappointed.

"Oh I can't tell you why over the phone.I went home all right and in a hurry.Am in the neighborhood of my barracks yet. Meet me there just as soon as you can get here.I can explain there.That's all Master Penrod, but please hustle.You know where I live."

The bell rang off quickly. It was plain that Susan was telephoning from her own home where she didn't care to have too much overheard.But a hint was all that Penrod needed.She had also said O.K and that mant meant that she had really followed her man and knew where he now was, but why did she return home.The rest could—must keep untill Penrod could arive at her home.This part though would be easy.Penrod fairly ran to the horse stable without sending his orderly, got his horse out, mounted, and urged it forward at racing speed.. The Company Street soon became rougher, and Penrod was forced to slacken the speed of his horse somewhat.It was two miles to her headquarters, a long distance to a boyscout impatient to get a look at the mystery surrounding the doings of this famous spy of the enemy.The little girls home was about half a mile from the refugee camp recently abandoned because of the outbreak of the enemy attack.Then, with a jump Penrod realized that he would have to go over a co crossing, and that the corssing was almost due north, where the enemy had attacked the christian lines during the Santa Fe battle.While still a mile away from the Crossing, Penrod caught a momente glance of two persons in the road ahead on horseback coming tward him.They seemed to be Abyssinkillian Burrough boyscouts.At this late hour, and fearful of a trap, as enemy child scouts could disguise themselves as his own, or others,Penrod quickly leaped from his horse, drew it into a thick clump of bushes and his himself, with hid automatic revolver drawn.He intended to capture the two if they turned out to be strangers.Then if they could give satisfactory answers he'd allow them to go ahead.He did not have long to wait before the two boyscouts, slowly riding along, were close at hand.All in a flash Penrod sprang into the road, landing so suddenly that the others fairly gasped in astonishment and their horses reared.

"Radcliffe, Adoledfob."called Penrod, in a voice thrilling with delight. The two boyscouts dismounted, and each held out their hand,greeting the boscout leader with an amused smile.

"It's good as being in heaven now to see you're really safe yet and am still on the earth."Penrod went on ferventl y."Angelinia Aronburg had been wounded a week ago, and didn't seem to know where you were, but she didn't seemed to be reallly worried."

"Probably not."miled Radcliffe."I sent her a code note informing her of the sucess of my mission, and of the fact that I was extremly busy. I was working within sight of the Princesses at Wickey Lansinia, and indeed they had a stirring time trying to learn information about the enemy."

"May I ask how far you have gotten in your mystery?"Penrod whispered. "Adeldedefobs face clouded."

"I know "he answered"if anything,really less than we did when we left you for that territory some time ago."

Penrod recounted, hastily, as they drew in under the shadows of the high pine trees, what he had discovered this evening, and what Susan feFarrol had done even though she was not a girlscout."

"Let's move fast to her home then."cried Radcliffe, while Adeledefob looked surprised/ "What you told us pieced to what we know but didn't think was worth anything, ought to give us the answer to this whi whole bit riddle.I too have something to settle with that fellow and his little whiskered imst imp."

CHAPTER THREE..

ON THE HEELS OF A STRANGE MYSTERY
IN THE MIDST OF THE CONTINUATION OF THE DREADFUL BATTLE OF DUNDEE CROSSROADS.
FACE TO FACE IN THE DANGER ZONE.

Leaving their horses well hidden, they trudged on foot briskly down the road, but to make it seem less suspicious Penrod traveled alone a keeping as much as possible in the shadow.At Penrods advice Radcliffe, and Ade-lede-fob kept in the wake of the boyscout lader leader—out of his sight in fact.But Penrod knowing that the experienced and armed spies were constntly constantly within call felt much safer with regard to any possible trap that might lurk near him.

"What in the world were Radcliffe and Adeldefob doing within the enemys lines so long, and how does they ever managed to enter the enemys lines, stay so long and always get away from them again without even discovery." Penrod wondered."But I believe he doesn't feel it necessary to tell me all he knows just now."

Suspense, wonder, and the thirst for adventure, put new speed into Schoefield Penrods feet.He had done a big soldiers work already that evenig, but now he was unaware of fatigue.The desire, too, to get even with the foriegn wretch, who had all but got him killed by the rattlenakes in that attic, made the boys eyes flash. He reached the vinicity of the desertion vincinity of Susans home, which at this hour, because of the desertion of the regugees, chaced away by battle, seemed as lonely as the grave. He halted, looked uncertainly about, and was about to head for the house on the outskirts of the deserted camp, when he beheld pretty Susan Farrol, at his side,grinning as though at a huge joke.

"Say"murr murmured susan,"It was the easiest ever.Your enemy didn't seeme to have the slightest idea that I followed him.I don't believe he turned around once to even look. Not that he would have seen me even if he had.But say who is this coming this way?They look like boyscouts too."

"You'll know in a moment."Penrod made answer."They're all right,too,— our Confederates in this evenings work."

Then Radcliffe, and Adeldefob came upon the scene.They accepted gravely Penrods introduction of Susan.

"Now tell us Susan like a good little girl."Urged Radcliffe"What became of the man you followed this evening, and what made you come here."

"He did.You see he followed this road, went past my house, and turned dwn a side road, and went into nothing else but to bed."

"You mean"Observed Adeldefob"You followed him to the farm house, and you only believe he went to bed?"

"I didn't take any ones word for it"rejoined Susan with an injured look."I shinned a tree close by the window of the farmhouse, and I saw the man undress, blow out the light, and go to bed.Ain't that enough.?"

"It out ought to be"admitted Radcliffe with a smile.."nd now my girl, where is the house here about.?"

"It's an old abandoned farmhouse."Susan replied."I guess it's the head quarters place for that spies whole queer crowd."

"That surely can not be."Adeledefob broke in.....,.,.,"

"Guess again" Susan challenged promptly.

"Why that builing is within the most strictly watched part of the christian lines, and is in the ownership or recievership of a person who follows rather an unusual line.Instead of raising the regulation of farm crops, he used to harvest and market sheep and cattle, and seels his milk to the christian armies, or rather gives the milk../"

"I'm not saying he's there now"susan admitted."He left when the last big fight broke out .But let me tell you something else... The man I followed to night, when up to the north side of that farmhouse.He let out a call that sounded to me like the noise an owl makes when you tease it, and then recieving no answer repeated it,again, and again.. A short man then came to the window, a man that looked like "Jeff"In the "Mutt and Jeff"munies, and there was some low voiced talk for several minutes.Then another officer came to the door,and let in my man, the fellow that locks like "Mutt", into the house. After that some other soldiers who dressedlike your own, came down stairs, and the whole crowd had a long pow pow wow, though I couldn't get close enough to hear wha they said, as a long quicksand bog seperated me from hearing distance. Now you two new boyscouts if the fellow I followed is a International Spy, as Master Penrod says, doesn't that make the whole crowd out to be queer..?"

The threese boyscouts mused in silence for some moments.

"I'm afraid indeed that I have been rather a little foolish."Radcliffe said at last."Anyhow I have seemed to have put myself on the wrong track.I was not even succesful this time within general Purgatorians lines. But I can say for once, fort Thumbelinia is impossible to be carried. By the way Penrod, and you too Susan, does either of you know Nero Fannias hired cronies?Are they really Glandelinians, or are they natives of some foriegn country.?"

"Why"answered Penrod."Nero Fannia himself(the Mutt fellow) was over in this country some years before the war, and has been operating for the enemy generals ever since I first became acquainted with him.His hired spies were all strangers when I first heard of them/.That they have the nerve to come here so often gets me."

"How long have you been acquainted with this Professional spy?"asked Adeldefob.

"Since some time before the battle of Delights Junction November 19 12. or sooner."

"Do you know the man Susan?"

"No Master Adeldefob.This is my first sight of him."

"And Penrod how long has that strange white wagon, been seen near the outskirts of our own camp."

Penrod and Susan glanced at each other with new light shining in their eyes before Penrod Answered;

"That wagon was first noticed early this morning."

Radcliffe was silent for some time as though trying to connect this information with some other data in his moind.Whatever it was however, he did not think it wise to state just now.But at last Radcliffe observed;

"I'm on the road to imagination that we're beginning to get Nero Fannia and his "Jeff"cronie tied up in some lies that he may find very hard to explain.Once when he was cornered he claimed to be in as much ignorance as anyone about the spying depredations and seems to have proofs to show he's on our side.Oncehe said a party of Officers paid him ten dollars last year to prend to spy on us, while he was really getting information for the christian generals from the enemy.He also said they had paid him nothing this year because some of them have either been killed in battle, or have not been able to show up, and he doesn't know where to reach them."

"That seems mysterious which no one can explain."Said Penrod.

"He also claims they say to be as much in ignorance as any one about that strange white wagon.When he was questioned he said a party of hunters paid him twenty dollars for privilieges to keep it there so the enemy wouldn't steal it."

"Huh"burst in the irresponsible young Adeldefob"I guess Nero Fannia would not have to look further than that farmhouse, if he wants to find the owner of the wagon."

"Unless Nero Fannia himself is the owner."inted Penrod.

"It all looks like a pretty bad tangle, at this moment"said Radcliffe untright musingly."ut I guess the truth is boys and susan, that We are right on the heels of the mystery.A few good moves on our part now,and we ought to be at the bottom of the whole affair.."

"But if he is really an enemy of your Christian soldiers"put in Susan, "how does he managed to go through with all he does, and is never detected?couldn't it really be possible, that he is really doing this for your side, and pretending to be onthe enemy side. How does your many various christian generals get such information I've heard about that is so mysterious?"

"That can be likely and then maybe not. What gets me if they're not foes of our side, whe why then did they lock me in an attac full of rattlesnakes."?

No one could answer to this question.

ut Susan then came out with;

"Maybe they were fake rattlesnakes, and that he did that to test your courage."

Adeldefob drew his searchlight from a pocket and lit it.

"you are not afraid"Penrod suggested,"That a light may show us up to some prowling foe?"

"Very slight danger of that."Responded the boyscout serenely."From what your new found friend Susan has told us, the whole crowd are now either sound asleep or have left the neighborhood.They think probably they have us wholly off the track.."""QQAZ

"Yet Nero Fannia must remember Adeldefob, that you've been talking with him."Penrod continued.

"Who in the world said I had?"

"Why you just told us, Nero Fannia's explanation, about the mysteries of his spying habits, and about the unknown owners of the strange white wagon, "

"Nero Fania didn't explain that to me."returned Adeldefob shrugging his shoulders."I haven't never shown myself to that dangerous spy yet.It was a runaway child slave, that had secretly obtained that information, or what passed as inforn information from Nero Fannia."

"Oh da say"ejaculated Penrod suddenly."You know of that low vaultlike windowless brick shed on that farm." ?

"Yes"nodded both Radcliffe and Adeledefob.

T"The farmer who owned the house used to store wool in that little building before shipment."

"Yes?"

"Well, "went on Penrod eagerly"Why isn't it more likely that the spy wouldn't use that little brick building to hold some suspicious articles or whatever mysterious things he deals in to use for his spying way.?"

"It is likely"agreed Radcliffe while Adeldefob nodded his approval."I have already figured that out."

"Don't your followers Radcliffe, of the Lagorian boy and girlscouts ever make raids?"queried Penrod.

"Yes, when we think we have evidence enough."

"From all that you and us know now then, we must be pretty nearly ready for such a raid."

"I'm afraid not."replied Adeldefob, with a quick sahek shake of the head."Suppose we make a quick descent on that farmhouse, root and branch.? Suppose we find nothing in the shed, but wool and other farm products? The spy could'n hid stuff amonst that, and that was the regular legal business of the farmer who lived there.We'll find nothing aboard the wagon, as it stands by the road.And we know from experiences there is nothing to be found out by just suddenly making them prisoners and holding them for investigation.So that brings us down to a descent of no purpose whatever, in which we gain no evidence, that would justify a single arrs arrest.And suppose they'd have such papers on their purpose that would show they were reallying working for our own side, while pretending to spy on us, whether that was truthful or not?That would not justify us arresting them either, and would make us the laughing stock of the whole neighborhood.Remember when we arrested the Vivian Girls when mistaking them for Glandelinian boyscouts.Everybody inthe camp laughed about it. And yet our blunder if we made one here would yet convey to the enemy the knowledge that would be worth everything to them by showing them just how much---and how little---we know of the deep game they're playing.And supposedly they really were operating for our side in so mysterious a manner.Tha Then we'd get into trouble for interferring with them.In our work we have to go slow."

The other scouts saw so much sense in this that they remained silent untilll Penrod spoke;

"Adeldefob,I'm going to ask you to go down to those woods, that overlook the farmhouse, and where the white wagon is usally left parked. There's deep high brush around there, and with any ordinary care you can remain hidden in case you run into the neighborhood of the crowd. what I find to find out especially is whether any of that crowd have the purpose of sending out more spies to night, or whethey they themselves will go out between now and daylight,."

"Send out spies in the midst of such a battle as is bl raging to night?"protested Radcliffe."It would be a foolish and dangerous time for any one of them spies to leave such a shelter to go out on such a battle field."

"But you must remember how reckless these men are.They're not the kind to stop at desperate chances.If this night suits their purpose, they'll go out on scouting tours of their own, even though the battle grows far much worse."

"That must be true at that."nodded Adeldefob."If the man you met Penrod Penrod is a sample, no chance is too risky or too big for any of then."

"Then go down to the field I spoke of, and watch the wagon es specially, and if necessary the farmhouse.If the wagon is out when you get there, come back at once to Susans house and wait untill you hear from me.If any time between now and daylight, the wagon puts out down the road, come at once to Susans home.If you don't find me, you may meet Susan, who'll have word from me.I'm going to take Susan with me for a time."

"Miss Turner has given orders, through Gertrude Angeline, that I was to take my command down to Fort Popham in the morning you know."Adeldefob reminded him.

"Are there not other officers of your command who can handle the Lagorian begiment?" queried Penrod.

"Yes of course, there are Ned, and John."

"Then stick to my work. "urged Penrod," nd I'll be responsible to Miss Jennie Turner, for your attac absence."

Adeldefob needed no further urging. He knew that Penrods word would be as good with Jennie Turner as if they were brother and sister, and besides Penrod was far surperior in rank anyhow. Aside from the love of adventure, that is born in every boy real or not, Adeldefob knew that Penrod longed for the hour to come, when he could feel that he had fully evened the score with Nero Fannia, providing he really was an enemy. If he wasn't an enemy then he would let by gones be by gones. Or even if the enemy was sorry and begged forgiveness only then would Penrod let the matter drop. But if he was a spy its Penrod duty to even frustrate his work.

"Don't get caught, don't even let yourself be seen."was Penrods last word."Remember that a single false move now will ruin all. You may have Radcliffe with you as a cover."

Adeldefob and Radcliffe su scudded off into the darkness, glad that they knew their way through this section... They plunged into a bypath, which Adeldefob knew, led to another that would take them down close to the wagon h they sought. Though the battle was still raging furiously in the far distance and seemed by the sound to be extending, the sound nevertheless told that now the enemy was coming out "second best". That gave a promise that the enemys attack was going to be a failure.

"I don't know yet"thought Adeldefob,"How Penrod ever got away from that attac attic filled with rattlesnakes that day. But then Jennie Turner was quite right in saying that Penrod knows how to take care of himself. Penrod during all these months has been doing a good deal of work too sin ce I saw him last. And yet he'd been on the wrong scent at this moment if Susan had not been able to tell him a few things he didn't know. I guess us boys are of some use in this world after all.

And Gertrude"he continued as he neared at last the half wooded somewhat brush covered slope that overlooked the wagon, and which was a wide wild spot. "And Gertrude"he continued, as he began to proceed with the utmost caution now. peering all about him as he started down the slope"Is wounded, and that put's Penrod in a sort of jeopardy as she's his best helper." nd to us all Gertrude is the best worker of the lot- and without her in command now——" He gave a sudden yell. His feet went out from under him, and swiftly he shot down an inclined pa plane. Inanother instant he shot through space, then landed with a jar, with Radcliffe on top of him, that left his mind all but a blank.

BUMP. Radcliffe who had landed first groaned, and his wits almost went wool gathering. However he did not lose consciousness altogether, it was more as if he was having only a bad nightmare of dream, and striving with all his might to make up. He knew that he and his comrade lay on very soft ground, and which no doubt saved them from being killed or hurt by the fal. Listlessly he tried to rise, and then finding that he felt much more comfortable to sink back, did so. There was a dim light in the place,, though for a little while, Radcliffe was hardly interested in his surroundings. When at last the young child scout leader came more fully to "himself", he sat up, and looked to see what had happened to Adeldefob. Adeldefob was standing up and as Radcliffe arose stiffly to his feet, Adeldefob said it-

"Whew but we sure had some tumble."

"Indeed and how."said Radcliffe in answer. "And what I want to know is how we did get into this place."

"Well for one thing we fell in"corre cted Adeldefob.

As they looked around, they discovered they were in a cave, but a cave not made by natural disturnbances but by many recent seige laborers ,they could make that much out now. Where they had fallen the floor was of soft earth, but there were brick walls instead of the natural walls of a natural cave, and not far from them on the ground, stood a big pile of large wodden boxes, and it looked as if each box might weigh several h undred pounds. Looking closely at one of the boxes they read,"HANDLE WITH CARE. T.N.T.

The light that was in the place came as the two child scouts soon discovered from several lantrens fastened to the rocky or brick wall some thirty yards or so away from where they stood. The cave too was a place of coni considerable size, but was shaped like a huge room of q a factory building. The next discovery that the two boys made in gazing about them in wonder was that the roof appeared to be some eighteen or twenty feet above his head. and moreover there were everal several large round holes, and one was almost over his head...

"I believe"said Radcliffe pointing"that we must have slipped and bounced dow down here through one of those h oles."

"you said it"declared Adeldefob grimly"and one of the next moves for us will be to find a way to bounce out of here again....."

every moment brought more freshness to the briefly dazed wits of the two childscouts.

"Anyway"reflected Radcliffe,"I ought to be mighty glad we had this fall. This v cave must belong to the Mutt and Jeff spy gang. It's their hiding place I'll be bound, their warehouse for explosives, their whatnot. It's another step in laying bare all their tricks."

Full of this idea, Radcliffe, whispering to Adeldefob started tward the nearest lantren, bent on exploring this secret cave to the utmost limits. What a tale he would have to tell Penrod now.

"That is if can find the way to get out of this place"he thought to himself with an odd uneasy smile. From then on the two scouts lost tract of the time, nor did any of them think of looking at their wrist p watches. Indeed both of the boys were so engrozzed in solving this "Chinese puzzle confronting them, that time matter little to them. By pacing they discovered that the cave was something m ore than six hundred and fifty feet in length. It width varied anywhere from fourty feet at one point to a hundred at another and a great number of lighted lantrns hung making the whole place somewhat lit. up. At one end of the cavern that he guessed to be the northern, there were a number of narrow clefts in the rock. Through these currents of air, and a little light came. The draft between these crevices and the two holes overhead, one of which through which they had fallen was sufficient to give very good ventilation to this underground cell. Yet it seemed impossible to find any kind of opening by which they could leave. and by degrees a great awe crept over the young explorers.

"It would be sure tough if we couldn't find out our way out of here, and simply stayed on an on untill we starved to death."Radcliffe said to Adeldefob with a shudder.

The other didn't find word to say anything. Yet unless other humans came to their aid that seemed likely to be their fate. If human beings did come in here in time they would almost certainly prove to belong to the "Mutt and Jeff"spy crowd. For the lighted lantrens in the cave showed that it was regularly used.

"Gracious. What in the world was that now?"Radcliffe, and Adeldefob, stood still losing color for a moment. The sound came once moe, more very loud and distinct. a long, low drawn out, strange almost unearthly wailing cry, more like an evil spirit suffering the tortures of the dammed than even that of a ghost."

"That sound surely do sen't sound human. "mur muttered Radcliffe, who was a firm disbeliever of ghosts."

"It may be that some man or Glandelinian is in this cave somewhere unseen, and that he may be devil possessed. "declared Adeldefob. "You know many Glandeliniane are possessed, and because of this war and the enemy many places are evil possessed too right here in Calverinia."

"It's the same old wail I heard out in Angelinia Agathia when I was there, so it must be only some of the "Mutt and Jeff"crowd. "declared Radcliffe. "If it is a possessed man then we'd better look out. If he sees us he'll be more dangerous than any Glandelinian. It's lucky though we have our crucifixes and Rosaries with us."

"Some one is coming, but where from?"declared Adeldefob.

While this speaking in whispers their footwere not idle. Indeed it was plainly time to hide, and Radcliffe, and his companion in their prowlings about this strange large underground room, had discovered the one spot that really did offer a full chance of concealment. That was a high rocky ledge of considerable length close to the wall in the darkest part of the cave. Behind the ledge there was a shallow shallow depression. The place offered just room enough to hide three or four boys in case no one took the trouble to peer down behind the ledge. If he did the boys would have to draw their weapons and kill him if he was a tricky Glandelinian enemy. Not a second did the wo child scouts lose in tucking themselves away into the hiding place. They lay so that they could raise their heads at need, and so that they could rise quickly to their feet if it became necessary to fight. But if it really was a possessed man or woman, two of these boys couldn't battle him or successfully through the magic powers of the evil ones, and they knew it. Just at that instant, that Radcliffe, and Adeldefob, securely hidden, did raise their heads, their surely felt the "goose flesh" bristling all over their bld bodies....Though the two leaders of the child scouts would not believe in ghosts under any conditions(no Abbieannians do) yet how could they understood the reason for the strange and awful apparation at the lower end of the cave nearest the boxes of high explosives and T.N.T.! There in the dim light stood a strangely shaped gray colored figure seemingly more than ten feet in height. The robe covered everything except that dreadful figures head. And such a fearful head. It was worse in appearance than the most hedious skull. It formed more like a head with the flesh almost decayed away, but the lower part of the head had something in shape like that of a lions, with mouth and a strange beard, the upper had two curved horns, and one on top, and high brush like standing hair, and all of this glowed with an unearthly light, that seemed half smoke, and half fire. Once more and again in came the awful wailing sound, and it appeared to come direct from the frightful apparation.

"Is it the devil"gasped Radcliffe.

"Maybe"answered Adeldefob, shivering, and I guess I'd feel like making a more dismal noise if I looked like that thing.A ghost in ghost stories cannot look half as frightful , a skull will look or does look beautiful incomparison to that thing.But maybe it is a human being."

"If it is what can it be?It looks so natural or supernatural?And if it is a human being, how is the trick done.?"

"We can tell if it is a spirit any enough""If it's a spirit it'll go through a wall and i disappear.If it reaches the wall, and turns back its a man in that garbe."

"No very much to the astonishment of the watchful child scouts the horrible figure showed plenty of evidence that it could move.But if it was a spirit why could they not see through it.? With noiseless thread it came slowly up the center of the cave. Much though they wanted to see it all, the two boys quickly ducked their heads down out of sight that they might not be seen, for if it really was a demon he would be a worst object to meet with, without proper means of defense than the most savage glandelinian soldier would ever be. The strange apparation went below by, then at the upperend of the cave suddenly seemed to dis appear, and then seemingly from some other spot suddenly rep reappear and come moving back.The two boys however did not see this movement.Yet at frequent intervals, thelow horrid wail sometimes not only sounded but rose to an unearthly piercing deafening shriek. as if some lost soul was dreadfully tormented. The two child scouts were not entirely over the "creepy "feeling"yet thr though their curiousity was getting the upper hand.At least the shriek came once more from the lower end of the cave, and then the two boyscouts dared to take the chances to raise their heads ever so cautiously.They were just in time to see something that looked ten fold more strange.The apparetions arms came out, one hand red as blood holding a two forked something on a long handle, and the other a number of long javelins or darts smoking like torches, and then the monster had turned to come back, and the two boys dodged down out of dreadful figure was no fake.They were in a possessed cave. There was no sound to the thread either, and yet an awful sulphurous smell prevaded the cavern.The big fellow came slowly, as though thinking hard.Then of all places in the world he seemed to seat himself on that very ledge behind which the two boys crouched.His back was turned and showed two enormous black wings.The two boys could look up at the big broad shoulders. The two boys couldn't bear the suspense any longer, but to make any sound seemed dangerous for it looked as though the monster intended to remain where he was.Naturally with so much danger at arms length the hearts of the two boys began to beat even faster and more heavil heavily.They feared the sound would soon betray them to the evil creature and did all in their power to stifle their dread.Then a new sound came to the ears of the two hiding boyscouts to fg. frighten them.In that utter stillness the ticking of the watch on their wrists seemed to make a louder noise than cla could any church clock.

Then it must have heard something after all, for to their astonished gaze the evil thing wasn't there having seemed to disappear as if into empty air.Then later on, before they could move, there was a light suddenly showing into the cave and a big uniformed man came into the place and sat down on the eledge, drew out a pipe, sniffed at the strange atmosphere in the cave, filled and lighted the pipe, and went on smoking slowly.

"I reckon this rig I've got will keep meddlesome ones away."chuckled the big fellow loudly enough for the two boys to hear."They say this strange room in an underground for some reason is possessed by evil spirits but I don't believe it.My comrades never saw a single one.But anyhow what's this strange smell."?

As he seemed to be this time the "Mutt"fellow by the appearance of his face, the two boys now seemed a good deal more afraid of the big fellow, than he was of any seeming ghost, let alone a fiend.A crucifix could scare a fiend, and yet not scare this fellow. The big fellow smoked on seemingly unaware of any betraying sounds in his neighborhood. The truth was as the two boys ealized the stranger carried a wrist watch of his own, and so if he heard any kind of ticking, he would naturally thic think of his own little time piece. and hearts no matter how loudly they may seem to the owners to beat, seldom drive their noise on to the ears of the other.From the smell in the place however the fellow seemed susiouous suspicious and looked three or four times tward the large boxes of explosives.

"Hello there."grunted the big soldier at last....2.2.2.

Then indeed(you are in need) did the hearts of the two boy scouts seemed to stop beating after one wild jump. Truly this was to them a cave of terrors, for that cool hail was deadly seemingly far worse, than even the first glimpse of the demon had been. owever the big uniformed fellow did not take the trouble to turn around.Both boys however were at first too startled to stir or make any answer, But they were soon glad enough that they had kept quiet for the "Hullo" proved not to have been addressed to them.Some one else had entered the cave at the lowerend for the boys could hear the foots teps.

"Yes indeed, and its all right if we have to use it."replied Nero in that low rumbling voice of his. "However it most scared me as I walked down the Company street coming here, for thought I saw something flit past me with something like a glowing Head on and then vanish.If that was a true apparation I'd had to meet it in the dark."

The new comer laughed as he joined the big fellow whom he callled Nero.

"It don't take much to scare half of them they're so confounded suspicious that I sometimes could play ghost on them." he said bending over and slapping the big fellows shoulder.As the new comer bent he showed his swarthy beared face to the two boys.Yet not looking for any one there he did not appear to see the two hidden boys,..

"That's that "Jeff "person "checked off Radcliffe, sure that he recognized this little short man of fifty, attired like a soldier of Abyssinkile."I never laid much heed to him before, but I'm pretty sure its that "Jeff"person all right.He looks like him well enough. I wonder what his name is.?"

"Well"said Nero between puffs,"If there's been some natural suspicion aroused against us,I feel pretty certain our last little trick will throw those soldiers off the trail trail."

"How about the boycout called Penrod Penrod?"asked the "Jeff"person. "Oh that little fool of a Jackass. He don't know what's he doing. I put him into a rattlesnake filled attic once because he wouldn't reveal to me where a certain girlscout hid herself.I was looking fo for oncalled Jennie Turner, but not the original one.But as I said your little trick ought to throw them all off the trail."

"It ought to."nodded "Jeff"."But they can't catch us anyway.That is they can't get to rights or us to rights.We're too clever for them."

"What was that last little trick?" The two boys throbbed with cur iousity.They tried almost to stop breathing as they lay there, hoping that further conversation would tell them something about the trick.

Then conc consternation and despair suddenly seized Radcliffe for their own.It was coming---must come.He surely couldn't hold it back.Indeed Radcliffe realized with a world of sickening dread, that he was going to sneeze.

Let any man imagine himself with a dreadful sneeze coming, a real wicked diabolical tickling in one or both nostrils, and your safty from discovery or your very life at stake on keeping still.. That was George Radcliffes predicament. nd to make it worse he was a terribly loud sneezer.With the most desperate swiftness, and praying desperately at the same time he worked a big handkerchief out of his right hand pocket, forced it against mouth and nostrils, held his breath and con- tined to pray, the "Hail Mary, "and Omary Concieved with out sin---"

Indeed seconds of almost killing suspense went by.Of course the more he tried desperately to kill that dangerous sneeze, the more he felt he must let it loose in a few seconds more. nd he didn't dare to picture what the fate of himself and his comrade would be if he were captured here by these two dangerous men.

"Well"said the short man who looked like "Jeff" as if continuing his thought aloud"Once we get safely by to night, we won't care for a long time to come.The enemy is making us rich for doing this and we'll go through it, not that I hate either side.But I'm out to get money and this is a good way to get rich quick."

"Oh we'll get by all right, even if any one is prying enough to take a look in at us to night.The onlyones who dares to meddle with us is those crazy Mascot Rangers under that Penrod.The only way to meet with them is child scout against child scout.I'm seeing Fredrick Darger and Gerald Starring to night.They'll help us."

"Never you mind I've got all the tricks fixed."returned the big "Mutt"fellow rising and starting away.

The two men looking right perfectly like mutt and jeff in faces and size sizes moved together tward the lower end of the cave, talking at and at the same time making quite a noise by the passage of their shoes over bits of rocks..

That sneeze came.Kerchoo.But not only was it a muffled sound, because Radcliffe buried it deep in his frantically held handkerchief, but the noise that the men themselves made closedtheir ears against this betrayal but the short man too himself had to sneeze, and he did it loudly five times, and the cave rang with the din.. The instant the boys sneeze had passed, and confident that there was no more in reserve, Radcliffe peered cautiously over the ledge of stone, relying on the gloom at that point to help hide h im and his companion from his enemies, should they glance in that direction.The tall fellow stopped long enough to reach behind a jagged shelf of rock.Then close by a big block of rock swung from what had looked like a solid wall.It revealed a very broad passage through which daylight shone in faintly.The two men passing out slowly, the stone soon swung back into space.

"Now I believe we can get out if there's some kind of machinery there that does the trick,"cried Radcliffe exm exultingly to Adelfedof, Adeledfob.He started up but Adeldefob held him back aying-

"Slow does the thing best Radcliffe. We would sure look wise and pretty swinging that stone around, if those two dangerous spies happened to be still standing outside.."

Holding his wetch wrist watch nearer to the light of one of the lanterns, Radcliffe saw that it was twenty one minutes past six in the early morning.That gave him a strong idea of how much time he and his companion had been down in this terrifying cave.

"Why it's real day, and the war is at work as fierce as ever. "he muttered to Adeldefob.

"Better it is to stay here just fifteen minutes more, to give those spies plenty of time to saunter away from this locality."said the latter.

It was the longest quarter of the h our, Radcliffe,and his companion could remember in their whole life,(get you a wife) But they stuck it out; though impatience o tigged at their brains and nerves. At last when the full number of minutes had passed, the two boyscouts stole out of their hiding place, and taking out their crufixes for fear of again meeting with evil spirits, moved softly down the length of the cave.

"Oh"said Adeldefob."See what I discovered."

"What was it?"asked Radcliffe.

"Here's a lever of some kind beneath this broad shelf.If I move it we both can guess what will happen..."

His guess was wholly good.As he swung the lever w tward him that immense block of stone in the wall began slowly to move.In another minute the two boyscouts had stepped through some three or four feet of wall and were on the outside.

"But now I've got to find something else that will close the stone back into place."he said, giving little heed to his new surroundings.

After lighting his flasher he found another hidden lever on the outw ide behind a round stone.Using this he swung the big stone back into place.

"It must have took them a long time to get this thing into working order."throbbed the young discoverer.Then mindful of his own safty and that of his companion, he closed the block into place, and turned to view hi his surroundings.They were in a broad tunnel, but the walls on both sides were straight like those of a room, and the wall flat as a ceiling in a house(mouse) , and it was some fourty or fifty feet long, and twenty feet in width and sixteen feet high.Down at the far end daylight flitered in, through a curtain of fall colored leaves.Thra Threading softly the two boys x scouts stole down, untill Radcliffe who was in the lead, could part the leaves, and peer out beyond. Fourty feet further away the blue waters of the broad Norma River lapped at the edges of the River cove along the shoreline. Now they found themselves standing on a small narrow ledge of rock, five feet above ground.They jumed down. Looking back and up, both boys were filled with adimra admiration.

"ny one could easily se spend t he day around here, without ever suspecting there was a hole in the arth back o f those bushes. "he muttered to Adeldefob, his eyes shining.

"nd oh, won't we have something, though to tell Penrod, when we get back to him."said Adeldefob in answer.

"That is ev if s we ever do get back."Sai answered Radclif e."Remember Adeldefob we are not any where near out of the danse danger zone yet."

Then they turned for a look out of the cove, then across the fields to have a look at the white wagon, that should be resting in the road out there.They both started rubbing their eyes."

The wagon was in the river, only a foot and a half of its top showing above the surface of the water.

"That incident ought to stop our fine birds, from carrying out their wicked plan."thrilled Radcliffe.

But a grin came to Adeldefob 's face.

"You don't know from nothing "he said."I'll bet that's the trick we h heard"Mutt and Jeff" discussing.

"What do you mean?"asked Radcliffe.

"That wagon sticking so little out ofwater is intended as a notice to any of us prying boy or girlscouts, that the wagon is dumped into the river because it is out of business."

"Yes indeed.you mean it's only a blind."

"Yes."

Having seen, all there was to be seen just now, the two boys stole carefully around the small river cove beach, untill they found an easy climbing wayy up the slope.Yet they also had to use every foot of the way with utmost caution, as they might even encounter Abbeyinian scouts or sentries, and be arrested or shot by mistake. And too they were on what could be temporarily called now on the "Mutt and Jeff" territory and might be espied from any point of it, by them, or their followers, and be shot and killed too. And even to be caught here, at this time, meant more than the two boyscouts cared to think much about. So over the field with drawn pistols they wormed their way, between clumps of bushes, and across fields of high grass. Nor did they began to breathe freely untill finally they found themselves not only off the dangerous territory altogether, but near the very gate of Susans home.

Finding usan nor her father not there, Radcliffe decided to stay ther there, to await her coming, while Adeldefob, struck out speeding speedily across the company street, untill he came at last to the place where he and Radcliffe had hidden their horses during the h ours of darkness.

"There's no sense in going to the crossing in broad daylight."reflected the boyscout. At "At this late hour of the morning I'm much more likely to find Jack Evans, or Penrod in their own proper headquarters..It's to Penrod. I'll go."

Mounting his horse, and tying Radcliffes on behind, he rode briskly down the road..Not untill now with all suspense passed, did he realize how dog tired he was.And yet he was delayed a trifle when coming upon the camp of the Standard girlscouts themselves, he was halted by one of the girlscout guards, who wouldn't let him pass, untill some one identified him and proved who he was.They have to do that of course for it is true clandelinian boyscouts will disguise as Mascots and others. and they have to be cautious.And then before he reached the burrough child scout camp, Adeldefob to his disgustdo found himself having a hard time to keep awake.Yet he covered the ride somehow, easily passing through their camp as the guard on duty recognized him at once, and then he went on untill he reached the Aronburg Vivianite girlscout Rangers camp where he was directed to Penrods headquarters on its outskirts asjoining the Mascot Rangers camp. It was Penrod who admitted him.

"Come in"said Penrod quietly.

Then as quickly as he had closed the tent door;

"How tell me George, what kept you so long."

"Oh "said Sad Adeldefob rather carelessely,"I and Radcliffe, too a double foot dive into one of those caves probably belonging to our "Dear gracious friends" we know so well as "Mutt and Jeff".

"Q cidentally or pruposely."

"Purposely against our will!"

"I understand"said Penrod catching the joke with a twinkle of his eyes"ut with joking aside, you discovered of course through your accident, that those spies, if such they are, are out of spying business for a while.You saw no doubt then that their white wagon is on the rivers bottom?"

"Yes, but they're not out of spying business"blustered Adeldefob."ome how they meant to pull off their big trick this very night."

"Without that white wagon?"smiled Penrod.

"Yes indeed"declared Adeldefob.

"she's a rather big wagon you know Adeldefob.They could get another to day, but that would be known and they'd have to buy one too.No I don't believe they're planning for any real move for to night.Can't be possible."

"Then listen to a ll I've got to tell you."retorted the young boyscout, "nd I think you will change your mind."

One disclosure follo2ed another quickly, only he left out the spirt business.Penrod listened, his eyes opening very wide.

"By jove"George"he burst furth forth at last,"The cleverness of you two boys has saved the days for us.go the two arch boyscout enemies of violet and her sisters, and Gertrude Angeline are going to help the spies.I intended resting to night and get some extra hours of sleep because I needed sleep badly, because too I was secure in the belief that nothing could happen.But now my boy I've changed my mind.but you must get on that bed and get some sleep yourself.you and your companion and a number of boy and girlscouts, and soldiers too are going to have the biggest night of their lives to night, including myself....."""QQ

"I must go to Miss Jennie urmer, and report to her first off."

Adeldefob objected.

"I hardly think that will be necessary,for I've already sent word to her that you're detained by me with Radcliffe on very important military business..Young Susan Farrol at at home sleeping now, but I want tokeep you here, where I'll have you the instant I want you."

"Put Jennie Turner gave orders, that we go over and get the refugees from fortification Popham this morning."

"Angeline Richee, and her followers, are over there doing the work now. And the attack has ceased, and its awfully still to say."

"Where is Angelinia Aronberg, by the way!"

"She is ling in the base hospital badly wounded.she's left the whole command at Timothy Grovetons orders."replied Penrod."Go into bed with you and get some sleep before you topple over..."

Yet indeed Schofield Penrod,did remember in time, that the young Burrough boyscout captian might to good and hungry if not half starved. So after ordering a hearty breakfast up to the room, to which meal Adeldefob did rather more than his share of justice, the worn out boyscout did go to bed, while Penrod, after a nap or so after of another two hours on his own cot got up and left his big tent...

"Well you sure are a fine"double crosser, sleeping your day away when you should be showing the enemy a thing or two."rang a merry voice in the room.

Adeldefob awoke with great difficulty, but at last he did get his eyes open and sat up)(. Joe Green, in his best uniform, stood before him beside the bed."

"Are you going to sleep forever?"challenged Joe.Then sinking his voice he added;

"See here you must be up and doing now, for to night will be the big night for us all. Oh Yes I know and plenty.At least Penrod told me plenty of it, and to Angeline Richee too.And now Adeldefob it's half past four in the afternoon, and its dark and raining. Dress, then eat these sandwiches, that I've brought up with this bottle of milk. Then we're to hustle down to Angeline Richees headquarters.Penrods orders are that a whole squadron of us are to run out and try and capture the two spies and their whole gang.We're also to use the best speed horses and sure must have all the ammunition we can carry, and our most relible reliable weapons. Penrod says we're likely to need every hand grenade we can also carry, and he wants to be sure in advance of all we can do."

That being a lot for Joe Green to say, all at one time, he sat down on the bed after the effort. Adeldefob found his uniform, pressed and laid out, and donned it. Nor did it take him long to eat all he wanted, and he drained the bottle of milk to the last drop(except he didn't eat the bottle)

"Now come along boyscout— hustle"he breathed into Joes ear."The big night for a whole squadron of us hey.I can hardly wait for thedark to come."

The Company Street, as it happened, was deserted in this section for this moment, save for one boyscout, who walked down its length so unconcernedly as not to attract attract any ate attention from chance looker ons. He entered Angelina Richees headquarters, a small sort of a one story house, but erected by the scouts themselves, and found the door locked. He had passed the guard unseen.After a swift look about him the prowler took out a couple of skelenton keys, and instantly unlocked the door with one of the longest. Entering carefully and cautiously, this prowler a boyscout about fourteen, and dressed like a captian, closed the door behind him.

"Now just one or two quick moves, a small hole opened in this part of the wall, and explosives set in, and all dirty brat scouts who are in here some hour afterwards won't make trouble for us Glandelinians any more."chuckled the "bomber" looking gloatingly at the hole he had made into the wall.

There came the sudden sound of the gallopping of many horses. The prowler had just about started to insert the explosive, and just as he was starting at his treacherous and murderous task he was disturbed and startled out of his wits by that roaring sound of horses coming down the company street.Glancing oup out of a low window hastily, the stranger beheld the cause of the noise.Angeline Richee, with Adeldefob, Radcliffe, and Joe Green and a lot others, all natty spick and span in their three bright colored uniform clothing had just turned the bend in the company street, and the foremost of them had halted suddenly at the entrance of the place.

"Caught by those Mascot wildcat rangers"growled the stranger."No time to do the job either.But I musn't be captured if there's any way out of it. One or two I could get the best of, but there's more than a hundred."

A hasty look around, convinced the bad boyscout, that there must be at least a hope.There was a big box standing by the wall, and hardly stopping to think, so short was the time, as the scouts were already coming with a heavy swift thread down the hall,the prowler raised the heavy lid of the big box, squeezing himself bete between the many the many colored uniforms there. And that he might not be deprived of air, and suffocated, he slipped a piece of heavy wood under the edge of the lid, yet so placed that it was not likely to be noticed.

Angeline Richee came gracefully in first.She took out her ket to key to her room, but of course found the door unlocked.

"Richard Hanson must have been back here."Angeline observed to Jean Saunders."It was careless of him to leave this door unlocked."

Having left the room in perfect order when she went away with her comrades to Fort Popham, it took her no time to get it arranged for the reception of the others who must be waited for.Adeldefob had seated himself so that he faced Angeline Richee. For a few minutes there was silence untill the hundred and ten had filed into the big room and then took their seat, broken at last by Adeldefob, who inquired ina necessarily loud tone;

"So there doesn't seem any doubt Radcliffe, that the two Professional "Mutt and Jeff"spies will make their big attempt to night."

"Not after what we overheard in the cave."Radcliffe replied."Mutt and Jeff" were chuckling at the way they were going to pull the wool over our eyes.And they came mighty near succeeding too.even any one of us can be fooled once in a while.Those spies are as sly as foxes."

"Susan Farrol, and even her father, are ordered to accompany us, as we'll start at eight, and its six now. "Adeldefob continued."I suppose Susan will be almost wild that he father will go with us. She's so excitable that I've been wondering if it wouldn't be a good idea to have her pretene to act nuts, and fool the enemy as I've heard from Penrod the Glandelinians thinks she's a mad girl. She'll sure to "Jonah the enemy in some way."

"Don't talk about Jonahs."begged Angeline Richee, with an amused grin.

"I don't want anything to happen to our expedition to night.After the way the Mutt fellow used Penrod that one day he won't rest untill he's repaid him by seeing him get the punishment of a spy---as he deserves to be, and Penrod hold us all responsible for the outcome of this adventure."

"I'm wondering observed Joe"If there isn't likely to be some savage fighting to night, in case we do overhaul the spies and their gang.?"

"Penrod will bring a squadron of powerful Abyssinkillian soldiery won't he?"asked Mildred Maxwell.

"Now if you can get Penrodto tell you all his plans in advance" laughed Radcliffe dryly"You're smarter than I am.All I know is that the whole band of us here, are to go out on the adventure, and that Penrod, Timothy and even Jennie Turner will be here too."

They were talking loudly, to make themselves heard, above the din of other war noises outside,and why not.The stranger concealed under the box lidsmiled softly to himself.He had news worth carrying if he could only get out of the building.

"Now"said Angeline Richee herself" when it comes to the time, get all the speed out of the horses tht that you can.We never put our best horses at their very best before, but we've got our orders, and we are going to do it as soon as our main leaders come."

"Seems as if we ought to get around the world in time for breakfast"laughed Mary Stanck gleefully.Then thinking of something she wanted to show them, she said"Just a minute,I want to show you the uniform I got if Susan Farrol proves her mettle and get's Angelinia Aronberg to let her become one of us."

She walked over to the big box, lifted the lid and threw it back, the piece of wood falling at her feet. In that same instant to the amazement of all present, Mary Stanck narrowly escaped turning a somersault from sheer amazement.

"what in the world are you——"she stammered staring down at the big boyscout stretched in that box.Then sternly drawing her revolver she added savagely;"Come out of that box, and come out quick before I bore holes into you."

And to the further amazement of every one in the room,the stranger pulled himself out with alacrity, as though he feared she'd slam the lid down on him, sit on it and smother him.Mary at the same time fell back, while a number of boys andgirls at once surrounded them both, but keeping their eyes eagle eied on the prisoner.

"Who in Heavens name are you, and what are you doing in here boy?" demanded Mary.

"I hid away from here, to escape from some boyscout friends who were trying to play an out raged joke on me because I'mbn foriegner."lied the stranger.

"That's a lie"said Mary bluntly."Ha what's this in your pocket. I want to see it."and she deftly put her hand into his pocket and drew out several good sized sticks of highest explosives, worse than twenty sticks of dynimite in force.

"So you were going to blow us all up eh."

Angeline Richee looked terrified.Probably the stranger would not have hesitated to tackle a christian soldier, but to try anything on a boy or girlscout was too dangerous, and as there were so many in the room, and a number now by every door and window on guard to try any escapade was now out of the question.

"Well I know I'm an intruder here."he said insinuatingly."Let me leave this house, and I'll pay you more than for the unintentional trouble I have caused you."

"Do you think we're as simple minded as that?"answered Mary."You came in here on purpose to insert this explosive somewhere in the house to blow us all up, and you too can be held as a spy for you overheard every word we said about the coming work of to night."

"But my little lady I----l---I-----"

"Don't little lady me"she said curtly."You're caught that's all, your a spy, and a bomber.You'll have to face our leader here."

"Shall I force him before her now?"asked one of the nearest girlscouts whose face to the man put him in mind of a fierce wild natured phanter.

"Yes."rejoined Mary, stifly.

As she spoke, she drew back, so she wouldn't be in the way of the "Phanter faced girl.The man sized boyscout who feared what she carried in her hand, and noticing the enacing looks of the whole crowd of Mascot Rangers, decided not to take anychances in attacking even one of the girlscouts, who looked at him with such eagle alert resolute yet seemingly to him"wicked" eyes.

"I&ll go before her then."he announced.

He went but Mary Stanck followed at his heels with both pistols drawn, ,then slipped past the stranger.The stranger pretended to ignore Mary Sanck, but looked at Angeline Richee, asking;

"You're the captian here?"

"Not exactly" answered she curtly."I'm the most superior one of the whole boy and girlscout bands in the whole army if you want to know it.What account do you give of yourself, what's the explosives, and these k3 keys of mine doing in your possession?"

"I told this other girlscout(pointing to Mary Stanck) and she didn't believe me."

"Nor do I blame her as all you Glandelinians are liars."answered Angeline Richee dryly. "You broke into this house to do the dirtiest work on record, to blast this house while we're in it, and blow up to our destruction.and you a boyscout!Why deny it.?"

"you kid scouts have such fertile imagines."jeered the stranger."That it would be hard to even invent a strange enough fairy story to meet with your expecitations."

"Oh clear all that way away, there's no such things as Fairies here"re torted Angeline."Come out into the open boyscout.I'm not even going to try to bluff you.You've your own reasons for fearing that my command here might get in the way of the "Mutt and Jeff"crowd to night,and you meant to wreck this house, or do something equally desperate.Now didn't you.Be vstraight forward--if one of your crowd of glandelinians can be anything like that."

There was the sharpest keeness in Angelines look, and her tone was very sharp and brisk, and also there was something that suggested in her as anger and disgust. She was a girl nearly as pretty as any one of the Vivian Girls, but her face also had in it some thing, that showed too that if she really was aroused, she was as dangerous as a Rattlesnake and to her enemies almost as merciless.

Returning the steady gaze thoughtfully, the stranger soon replied;

"I will have to come out into the open with you then.I admit that I have reason cwhy I didn't want your command to go out to night.

"I did want to blow every one of you up, or at least I was sent to do it."

"You infernal scoundrel."burst indignantly from Angeline Richee.

"It's fair in war you know."

"Yes, that's what all you Glandelinians say, fair in war to massacre children.That's why so many of us children are in the army now to give you back all you do to us.You are also a spy for you hid in that box and over heard our conversation.You broke into my headquarters, and had stolen my keys from somewhere."

"But it's fair in war and---"

"Stop your talk right there."ordered Angeline Richee angrily."You Glandelinians never had sense enough to know how to fight a war anyhow. As for me I'm going to take you before the highest official tribunal that can be found in our army, and signal from the signal tower untill I bring soldiers who will take good care of you."

With a few brisk commands to some of her officials, the boy ans and girls started to get ready to leave. The man would have been tempted to draw a revolver of his own, but there were too many scouts in the room, and their looks were too menacing, and besides in his quick exit from the box at Marys command he had slightly injured his arm.

He knew it was impossible to escape from them.Dazed by the suddeness of his being captured, the prowler was now trying to think of some scheme to get away when they got outside with him, but it seemed as if some of the scouts must have read his mind for Jean Saunders said;

"you forget we got the upper hand here.You are not going to even think of getting away, or get the best of any of us, and if you try to you're going to be full of holes for we'll all fire on you at once.Your kind don't care q rapt for us either."

"You won, I'm out."almost whined the stranger.He had just tried to use his left arm, and had found that while that member was not broken it pained him so that it could not be depended upon in a scrimmage with a baby.Don't let him go out with any more untill I get a bit of cord"said Jean Saunders drily.She disappeared into a cupboard, but came out instantly afterwards.

"you won't need to tie me up,"came from the beaten boyscout."With my right arm fit for a sling, an infant could handle me."

"Well we're infants"said Jean.

"See here you're surely not going to tie my hands." pleaded the stranger."My left arm is next door to broken.You'll put me in torture if you force that arm behind my back."

"We're co going to force them both behind your back, and we'll see whether it tortures you or not."retorted Jean ."Out both your hands behind you quickly."

Jean and another girlscout had to take hold of the boys left arm before he would obey.The prisoner made a lot of fuss about it, but Jean, patient, firm and yet humane, forced the mans left wrist behind him, and was satisfied that the act caused no pain at all. With that the right wrist was put in place besides its mate.While he was surrounded with leveled guns the prisoner made no resistance, and Jean tied the two wrists together with with masterly hitches and knots that even a seacoast boy or sailor is likely to know.

"Now let's take him along with us comrades, and we'll make him join our expedition."proposed Angeline Richee."We'll humble these Glandelinians good.But we'll have to do something to our house now for a blind.Signal to our headquarters that an explosion is going to occur, but not to pay any attention to it"she advised to one of the boys. He saluted and went out.The prisoner was taken outside and stood by a trse heavily surrounded.

"Let me have your handkerchief Jean."desired her friend Jack, taking out his own.

"See here, what are you going to do?"demanded the prisoner uneasily.

"You've even lost the slightest right to inquire."came Jacks cool retort."Calm him Joe if he shows signs of nerviousness."

"This ironical advice though very much meant, Joe Green interpreted exactly by stepping closer to the Glandelinian boyscout, and holding his two pistols in a most threatening and business like manner.

"The slightest little yelp out of you, and I'm glad to try these pri pistols."he warned.

Jack quickly forced a gag into the prowlers mouth , and made it securely fast.

"I surely don't hate to do that to the likes of your kind."admitted Jack, and there was no reluctance in the tone of hisvoice."nd to night too for our own cause, which you hate so much is a big military business one, which you probably no know as well as we do since you overheard our conversation, and therefore we can't allow any of our generals" hom you call "Christian Dogs" to be beaten for want of a couple of Handkerchiefs placed where they'll do the most good."

The prisoners eyes gleamed with rage, but he of cou course could not make an answer.

"ow I think we need a good strong body guard for him so there's there'll be no attempt on his part to run Joe"finished Jack."We'll need a c couple of owls also to take a look t at this impulsive little Glandelinian gentleman once in a while you know, and I believe Jean and you Mildred Maxwell have such eyes, and therefore I'll ask you two to owl him."

With which laughing lightly, Jack bounded forward to reach his horse. There was an explosion somewhere but no one paid any attention. The dynimite and other explosives the man had was set off so they could do no harm afterwards.Then when all were outside, a strong cordon of soldier guards were placed around the structure and the whole party started. Despite it all however Angeline Richee was somewhat worried.Of course she and Penrod were the highest of the child scout leaders,and she was really the highest of them all. Of course they had a right to defend their cause against these two Professional spies. Had Violet,and her sisters been there it would probably have been a different matter, for they knew how to act and were the highest of all in rank except the Emperor.

"However I'm doing it on their account"reflected Angeline Richee,"So I know it's legal and square, but it's the first time we have ever started on an expedition that will probably even involve us all in a real close quarters fight. Those Professional International Spies, and their crowd are exceedingly dangerous to trifle with."

For a few moments she remained in the mttttttt lead of the column, then she uttered some strange sounding signals which the prisoner could not understand, and when she was in the lead once more it was almost a whole troop of exhausted, limping troop of child scouts on h foot, instead of horses, that once more began to move on through the ide wide Company Street.The troop did not hardly move at all, and even walked at a lazy shuffling gate, and dropped themselves as if they were dead tired or ill. After a few minutes of this, Mary Stancks curiousity proved too big to contain all within herself. She halted untill Angeline Richee came up to her and then demanded;

"What ails the whole troop Angeline?"

"You'll find out by and by!"came the strange mysterious answer. But Angeline's illuminating wink, prevented Mary from becoming downhearted Aever the crawling pace of the troop.Mary when we get near the camp of the Burroughs over where Penrod has gone, get a crowd of us to surround the man so he'll be entirely out of sight.I don't want him seen by any one amongest even the scouts, providing there's secretly disguised Glandelinian scouts amongst them which I hope there isn't."

"Naturally not."Mary replied, with a grin of understanding.Then she recovered her place, while Angeline Richee gave her whole attention to handling what seemed a most crippled regiment of boy and girlscouts. Even when they had entered the big camp of the burroughs, the place where Penrod was then occupied seemed a long way off.But at last the company of child scouts headed slowly in tward the yards of the Burrough Officers headquarters.There was a crowd of boy and girlscouts outside and within the yards,, for that late afternoon they were off for a time to use the evening as they wished or for their childish games, and so forth.Angeline advanced her troop close enough to the gate to speak to Penrod from that distance, though she made no attempt to reach or go into the gate, which she even was allowed to do.

Thereupon Penrod who had been looking out of the window, hurried down to the Veranda.

"Come right in Miss Richee."he called.

"I----I'd rather not"Angeline called back,, with pretended hesitation.

"Why not?"

"Well,I----I---- we haven't been careless, Master Penrod, I'm sure, we haven't, but---but--- but---"

"Come right out with it Angeline please.What's the matter!"demanded Pe o Penrod impatiently and looking worried.

"I don't exactly know sir what is the matter exactly."the young girlscout officer replied looking sort of sheepishly."But none of us I believe care about going out any where to night as they all seem so dead tired.You saw us coming up the Company Street.That was the best possible speed 'were were making, and maybe everybody amongst us feels and looks as though we'd break down at any instant.Hons honestly sir,I'm afraid to take my troop here out to night on an expedition, for fear we'd be too tired to return to camp again.There's George Gross.He can take your place while you come over, and let me explain why we want the night off duty."

Though he was much worried, and disappointed, Penrod obeyed this request, telling George to take his place.Meanwhile hundreds of the Burrough scouts, who had overheard, were possessed by at least some severe apprehension.Penrod came quickly forward to the gate.Angeline Richee led Penrod aside where there were no one close by ordering the burroughs to continue their games. Then she told rapidly what had happened, finishing with;

"There ain't not one of us out of sorts sir.Never was our troop of boys and girls here in finer shape.But the Mutt and Jeff spies might have secretly enemy disguised scouts even amonest the Burroughs and we acted accordingly.But here's the Point.That Mutt and Jeff crowd if the two of them didn't do it personally, sent a eighteen year old Glandelinian boyscout into my headquarters with the purpose to blow us up when we were all within the building.We've got that tool of theirs where he can't sent a signal to them if any are here secretly disguised, and my demonstration which no doubt momentarily had you worried, for you looked it for the moment, was meant to throw them off the scene,t or scent in case they have any one amongst the crowds here watching for news of us.I set off the dynimite to make the enemy if any are here, think the spy has blown up my headquarters."

"Angeline Richee you're clever enough for ten foxes."beamed the boy scout leader, gripping the girls hand."You're great.The Vivian Girls shall hear of this.We'll be successful to night in frustrating their plan but all the credit will be to you."

"Did we do perfectly right in treating the prisoner as we did?"

"Quite right."proceeded Penrod."I'll take the whole responsibility, for that,"

"But what are you going to do with him Penrod? It won't be wise to take him into the camp now will it."

"Not by any means"retorted the boy scout officer"He better stay a prisoner in your own headquarters under strong guard, untill this nights work is over, and he can't do us any further harm.There's no jail camp in our own positions that holds Glandelinian prisoners, so its best to keep him in your headquarters untill he can be sent to a proper place of detention.Now I'm going to where he is hidden and have a look at the little scoundrel.""

While Penrod was so engaged, Angeline Richee found chance to explain to the burrough child scout Matron in low tones what the real matter was.As Penrod came back he looked very grave,but---

"Good thing you nabbed him Mary."he whispered exultingly as he passed Mary Stanck."I've put on hand cuffs in place of that cord."

With that Penrod turned in at the gate of the Burrough headquarters. both he and the Burrough leader, showed very long faces as they entered the gate.Angeline Richee looked after them with a fine pretense of the greatest concern.

"Master Penrod."she called.

"Well!"returned the boy scout chieftian.

"Shall I bring my followers into the camp and rest them up!"she said this but expected the answer that was coming as her request was only a blind.

"No"came the answer"In a cold voice that decieved all the listeners. "Stay where you are on duty.Don't do anything untill I came back or till I've had my supper,"

So they all"had to remain on duty, while Angeline Richee seated herself on the end of a fallen log, acting indeed as if though she were not trying to look thepicture of worry, anxietyband woe.It was a fine piece of acting, that hoodwinked every one in the respective commands and Joe Green whispering of his idea of another scheme to her suddenly left the ranks and balwed out;

"Oh. Fine captian of a Ranger command ,a ain't you.Think you know all about running an army of girls and boyscouts, smarty--but you can't do a thing except smash up a whole command up, and get the rest too tired to hardly move an arm or leg."

"Fine and manly you are, Joe Green"retorted, Angeline Richee pretending to be sour."All you can think of is to jump on a person, after they're down."

"Oh Yes."grinned Joe."I said you're going to lose your job as commander ain't you.?Well losing your commission as about all you was ever good for."

Angeline then turned her face away, pretending to cry, and Joe Green after a parting shaft of sarcasm, seemed to hurry away to tell every one he met how Angeline Richee and her officers had put by sheer blunder a reliable command of boys and girlscouts out of commission.He told of some things in a fashion that would not be a lie, which just what she wanted him to do according to the plan, but unknown by others he soon returned to ranks, and finding her said;

"I've done it as far as I could Angeline.Mutt and Jeff must have some watch around here amongst the Burroughs or elsewhere, to keep track of what happened to us."

"Yes that may be"she answered."So it'll be mighty funny if he doesn't get word that our string is drawn."

If Penrod was very "Angry" at Angeline, he simply did showhimself unusally generous, for he sent to her from the headquarters or secretly invited her into the building to recieve a most bountiful supper which she and her officers ate.It was just before dark, when she returned to her command, and half an hour later Penrod, George Zimmermon, and even Susan Farrol came to the Ranger command.

"Now get under way."directed Penrod.

"As soon as we can, and the best we can!"Inquired Angeline Richee with a meaning look."Yes of course"he said loudly to throw off all scent."And you'll answer for this disaster to your troop to night."

She pretened to look hurt and afrighted.George had gone to take command of a portion pretending to ignore her, and Penrod put Mary Stanck in full "command of Angelines regiment, saying she couldn't know how to lead any more.When the regiment of troopers finally got started, moving and walking slowly down the Company Street, the glances of quite a crowd of apprehensive and sad ones followed the regiment as long as it was still within sight.

"My it sure does seem tough to have to pretend, even that all of us are half crippled from fatigue."said Angeline Richee to Penrod, when we are just making the start of "Our big night".

"I hope it does prove to be the big night of success in frustrating the plans of those two Professionals."replied Evans wistfully."My girl friend I have been a long time hoping to put this matter through very successfully.I want to even get even with those two fellows."

"Big luck to you to night then."said Angeline Richee earnestly.

"Why Angeline Richee, if I do succeed in this enterprize, the credit will be due to you more than to myself or others.Due to you, and Radcliffe and Adeldefob, and in lesser extent to Susan Farrol, all who arecaccompanying us now. If we go through to success to night, don't think I shall ever imagine that I did most of it."

As they were out of earshot of the Burrough Camp now, Penrod looked momentarily down at the ground, and chuckled heartily..

"You find out Mary, that the crowd of Glandelinian spies had sent a disguised Glandelinian boyscout to either destroy or cripple Angeline Richees troop in a house by intending to blow it up.And Angeline she comes into the Burrough camp with the whole troop at the limp, and with long faces.And she keeps the enemy guessing was as to what became of the boyscout they sent to do the job.That is genuie, girls.No wonder the enemy generals everywhere say Mary and Angeline are the most dangerous christian"brats" alive.It sure took you every time to hood wink the enemy."

Penrod laughed heartily.Angeline Richee and Mary themselves couldn't help feelig some pride in hers and Marys achievement but Angeline said;

"It was not I who discovered the culprit.It was Mary."

"If those fellows have found a right number of fast moving men even on foot, they'll exc expect to run away from us like the wind; in case we show up."went on the boyscout leader.Why Angeline Richee. You're followers ha act as if they were half dead.One would think it would take us nearly all night to leave our camp."

In truth the numbers of child scouts she had taken with her, were acting a little worse, than lazy lizards that are afraid to walk. As Penrod said, any of the glandelinian soldiers if only on foot would have no fear of being overtaken, by these creeping "lazy"bunch of children on foot. But Angeline's clever plan must be carried out, and they were heading near the spot where the spies were supposed to be and where she had left her own and all the horses of her followers in hiding. The moon too it seems would not shine at all as clouds overshadowed the skies and there seemed to be lightning in the southwest..Out over the northeast the sky was still red with the glare of the far distanced forest fires, and a sort of haze overhung the horizon.

"There's something I have been always wishing to ask you Radcliffe" hinted Penrod, presently.

"Go ahead and ask!"suggested Radcliffe,

"Oh oc of course if you don't think it best to answer just now for fear of our prisoner overhearing you won't."

"Of course not."Replied Radcliffe quizzically.

"I've been wondering Rad— what happened to you the night you went away tward the enemys lines, and when you disappeared so mysteriously.?"

Radcliffe laughed enjoyably.

"I thought that would puzzle you a good deal(meal)"he admitted. "ut in fact there was not anything strange about that night.You see I succeeded in reaching the outskirts of the enemy that night.Nothing happened in the landing.I even hid my horse, as I thought without being discovered. "

"That's about the way it started with me."inted Penrod.

"Well continued Rd Radcliffe,"For some time I prowlered around the enemys headquarters acting as a boyscout and serving meals to one of the generals, and then I went from one part of the camp to another very cautiously you understund---without running into anything mysterious or hostile.Apparently I seemed to be the only human being within the glandelinian encampments.I even got to the extreme north end of the enemys positions near Thumbelinia, and there lay the immense fortifications."

"Then you knew all the soldiers were in the fortifications and not in the camps?"

"Yes of course.I didn't dare to approach the camps, so I then started to go through the center of the encampment, going as stealthily as an American Indian would.Penrod it sure rather got on my nerves to go through such an encampment, and yet not find a sign of a human being.All the while I knew there should be a few men there, or how could I account for the nearnss of the fortification...!"

"It must have been puzzling?..."admitted Penrod....

Finally my boy I stepped on a small rock or something on a steeppp hilly portion of the encampment, and sent it rolling.Then all like a flash came a challenge.I didn't answer, but I stoood stilll behind a very big tree... In the dark I saw some soldiers coming.Bang went a rifle——"" that bullet, and several others fanned my face so close, that I could feel the heat from the lead."continued Radcliffe.

"The shot that Violet,and her sisters heard."p broke in Penrod.

"You didn't shoot back,did you... !!!!!!"

"No I didn't want the Glandelinians to find out there was a spy at hand, and besides if I did fire back I might have brought too many against me, so that resistance would have been useless. I stood absolutely still for a few minutes.Then I dropped to my knees and by crawling in that position I got away as silently as I could. While I was getting away I heard some others proling about the bushes where I had stood. After thinking the matter over further,I decided to get into an old abandoned house and hide, hoping if glandelinian officers came in I'd over hea enough to set me on the right track.You see what I was doing was to try to learn if possible the mystery of the Abbieann horror, as no one is giving that plan up.So I got back first to where I hid left my horse.I sent him running off tward camp.Then I worked around to the house.There seemed to be no one inside, nor was there any guard around.Inside the house I found a locker that suited my purpose.It was nearly filled with hanging clothing.I hid behind that, and felt pretty safe, and so I was.It was pretty nearly two hours before anyone came inside.Then as I judged by the voices, five or six men came.They growled and swore a bit about the child scouts.But I didn't learn learn anything.All they did was to complain about us child scouts, how dangerous we are to be trifled with, and all that grumbling while they ate and played cards."

"You must have been in there a long, long time."observed Penrod.

"Probably"agreed Radcliffe."Of course you know I didn't dare leave the house long untill after the others were gone.Then I concluded that since I had disappeared,I might as well remain out of sight for the time being.Later I found a chance to sent to Angelinia Afonburg, a code note letting her know that I was safe.After that I hung about the fortifications, disguised as a boyscout child slave driver and working slaves under me as a blind, trying to locate who the commanders were of the garrisons, and to find out whether they knew anything about the disaster at Abbieann.But they didn't.Then coming back I got wind of the two professional spies here.But I'll admit that, untill you and Susan helped me out I was taken in by the pretenses of these two spies being on our side, and not the foes they reallly were."

Susan had stood behind listening.She was so interested and excited that she actually forgot to say anything.But now she began to dance.

"What in the world are you doing that for."gilei Schoefield Penrod.

"Why we are out for excitement with your Glandelinian enemies, ain't we not!"

"Yes "nodded the boyscout sc chieftian.

"Well"went on Susan almost plaintively,"If you know how mighty little excitement there usl usually is in a refugee camp, you would know just how I feel now that the time"You call the big night"has come. And that thiw is my first experiene experience with you boy and girlscouts."

"Go ahead then and make all the racket you want then."laughed Penrod. "Get it all done at once, so tht you won't feel tempted when the time comes that b we absolutely must have silence."

Saying which Penrod halted the column as if pretending they must rest to prevent a "break down" another ruse, and then sauntered to the middle of the troop to take a look at his boy scout prisoner, and try to extract some information from him.The prisoner still hand cuffed and gagged had been watched with more alertness than was requied. As to talking however, that was something that no one could drive or coax the boyscout prisoner to do, not even for the pleasure of being freed, on patrole if he would talk, or for the gag to be left out.

"Say please, please"demanded Mary Stanck, plaintively"How much longer does our column of boy and girls stay"Sick2" and tired out.!"

"I find it tough to keep up the farce!"Smiled Angelina Richee.

"Why say"admitted Mary Stanck,"Treating all us boys and girlsttttike girls like this makes me feel so ashamed that I want to hide my face from the rest of my comrades.It doesn't seem half decent.It's like a big reflection on my character for handling a column od good strong lively child scouts."

"If we run into what we hope to to night"Angelina Richee replied gravely,"You and all the rest may have a chance to distinguish ourselves to a fullness beyond measures.We're in the locality of our horses now.I heard one of them neigh."""""

"And I feel orsepy too."went on Mary Stanck pointing to all the extinguished camp fires of the whole numbers of various child scout and Camp fire troop regiments.There was no signal lights either, nor anywhere save for the flashlight that Penrod occassionally lit.

"The lights are off by orders of Angelinia Afonburg, from the base hospital who knows our plans.she's our main supreme commander and knowing our scheme to fool the enemy spies has the right to order the camp fires out."Angeline Richee rejoined.... . . .

"I know it "assented Mary Stanck."Yet for our troop going through our own lines like this in the dark, makes me feel as if we were skulking little pirates or bandits bent on robbing either side."

They were near their hidden horse station now, having passed out of their stormy appearing and Penrod came to the front again.The weather though not stormy or threatening was t growing thicker with smoke like haze and the loke like as is likely to be when forests are on fire far away.

"If we are near where the spies are how far do you think we can be seen,Penrod?"asked Angeline Richee.

"At one half of a smile any keen eyed man might catch sight of us even in this dark."Penrod replied."But in this haze even at a shorter distance than a mile,I believe we are safe from detection, unless one is using a powerful night glass."

"Our footsteps isn't making a noise enough to be heard for a third of a mile!"

"Not in this thick dusty road."

"Then to be reasonably safe, don't run in within a mile of the enemys spy station."Angeline Richee ordered."And before we mount our horses everybody must cruise about a bit, and keep out of sight."

Penrod repeated his orders, that there might be no misunderstanding. Putting ould his searchlight, Penrod dropped down on his knees, and seeing him do that a,, all the rest did the same, then Penrod took out his night glass..

""Don't move any more faster than you have to on your hands and knees, while he hold about this place."he directed.

The boy and girlscouts had lessened the speed still more, to Mary's secret disgust.But everything depended on stealth and trick, not on any ones sentiment..... To those who did not know what they were doing it would seem as if they were watching the movements of the luziest band of uniform children ever seen in the world.Yet they covered the half mile needed to reach the spot where their horses were concealed, and to take up the position ordered by Angeline Richee.For some minutes she carefully examined both the north and south sections of land near the farmhouse some distance beyond Susans abandoned home, through her own night glass, while Penrod was doing the sm same...

"Do you make out anything at the cove near the Farm Captian Groveton?"she finally asked, passing the glass to that new boyscout leader. Groveton spent some time looking through the glass..

"I don't believe there are any horsemen outside of the cove, nor any one moving off there."Groveton replied finally. "But now and then it seems to me that there is some one moving along the farm field at the southside of that farm house yonder....."

"That's what I thought I observed"commented Angeline Richese.

"and--and"added Penrod,"there seems to be something in quiet shapes putting down a certain road.I'm sure they're horsemen.If we get a little more to the south,I think perhaps we can see a little more."

"Do so then,"nodded the girlscout leader.

Slowly and carefully Penrod and his followers and the others advanced while he and Angeline Richee frequently kept their glasses to their eyes.

"By Jove there's a column of sm something out on the fields yonder--a larger column of horsemen of some sort,I should say.Th haze makes it hard to tell exactly what the shape is that I see.You look captian Groveton."

Again Groveton held the night glass to his eyes.

"It's a column of horsemen, not exactly a small one either Miss Richese.But I can't make out either gray or purple uniforms.What would you think Angeline, if the crowd under "Mutt and Jeff" are using civilian clothes for disguise to night."

"That wouldn't surprise me any"same the cool and truthful answer."It would show how afraid they would be of us, yet how determined theybarsto they are to put some big move through in spite of any dangerous chance. If they have good speedy reliable horses to night, then its because they're bent on showing a clean pair of heels to any persuer."

"They're loading the animals that is sure."mused Penrod as he continued to watch through the glass."Then they must have some hiding place within our lines near that farm, even if we or christian agents couldn't find it."

"What more likely than that they have another cane under the building as they have on the other side the one Radcliffe was in with Adelefo?"asked Angeline Richee.

"True indeed"nodded Penrod.

"I wonder if they'd feel disturbed if they knew we were out here." mused the girlscout leader.

"Very likely they do know it Miss Richee."said Groveton quietly."

"That That "Mutt fellow" or his confederate or any of his followers could have a night glass as well as ws.Are you going to suddenly move inon them Angeline."

"Not untill the column gets under way.I'd rather catch them with full evidences against them--if that is what they're loaded with."

Penrod in order that he might keep up the watch with the night glass called Susan to take his place of observation.Susan wanted to talk some of her girlish excitement off, but Groveton a stern commander, shut her upvery sternly and severely, explaining that silence and watchfulness, were needed now more than talk.For n another hour the watchers waited. Then suddenly they awoke to the fact, that the other column was under way coming theattthem tward them at a full thundering gallop.

"Stick to your post,Susan"ordered Penrod tersely. Sta"Stay till I sound this Honker I got in my pocket.Everybody quick.On your horses at the rw ready. Joe Green you master the situation.Mary you'll soon be able to save your feelings by humping our bodies up."

Everybody were on their horses as quietly and as quickly as ghosts could have done it.Penrod himself reached for his powerful pocket searchlight, ready to turn it on when the proper moment should arive.Everybody had unslung their dangerous rifles(dangerous to the enemy) to the rettttsat readiness.

"That has a businesss like look."muttered Susan also on a horse.

"Never mind "Mary Stanck interposed, who sat on a horse alongside her own. " tick to your horse girl.You're going to have the best of your life, for your desire to become one of us."

The other column went somewhat to the left.They seemed likely to pass going west, half a mile from the child scouts on hor horseback.

"Let them get opposite."directed Angeline Richee."Then give chase."

Penrod ev ordered every one to swing west, so they could immediately head in that direction.Over the ground came the loud noise of many fast galloping horses as the other column began to rapidly forge ahead. "How after them."breathed Angeline Richee tensely.

In an instant Penrod turned on his powerful pocket searchlight, and swung its dazzling rays acrosss the fields, untill the keen light piercing the thin haze rested momentarily across and upon one of the leaders.

"Susan"cried Penrod"Lead an oblique course after them."

The Glandelinians gave taut taunting yells, but in another instant those yells died out, for they saw what they thought were soldiers persuing them was a great column of boys and girls on horseback.Moving children are so small that for even a glandelinian cavarly squadron it's impossibl to hit them even if the enemy were all crackshots. Angeline Richee urged her horse far in the lead, cocking her rifle bringing the butt to her shoulder.He fired in the direction of the nearest leaders.That single shot though it did not hit any one, was the signal for the suspected body of Glandelinian spies, to stop and surrender, or recieve no quarter.That the command carried by that shot was not to be obeyed was almost instantly apparent. The column stopped goingfor several seconds, and then opened a withering fire, but not one of the scouts even hear d the singing of bullets.

"They can't hit any of us in the dark."Cried Angeline Richee."More speed to our horses comrades, but don't crowd it on all at once she commanded."Susan cover my fire."

At about the time the shot had been fired the Glandelinian horsemen had not been making their fullest speed.After answering Angelinew fire by a tremendous but none effective fire of their own, the glandelinians increased their speed.The girl and boyscouts not wanting to jade their horses too rapidly, did not crowd matters at once. Thefore Therefore in fact during the first few minutes, the child scouts seemed to gradually lose ground in the race.It became a stern chase, and it sure was bound to prove a very grim one.Every horse of the enemy was well mounted as Penrods searchlight showed.As far as darkness permitted they believed there were eight hundred of the persued, while the child scouts numbered nearly one thousand.Then as the horses were urged on a little faster the child scouts appeared to be gaining.Only for a few moments,though for the Glandelinian horsemen proved too that their steeds were fast, for they increased the gait of their horses to such a degree, that they left the dare devil child scout persuers further to the rear.

"Now make the horses go their fullest speed."Penrod bawled through his magaphone. Out now in the clear fields, Susan was a safe and excellent coverer.She kept leading the child scouts right at the left wing of the fugitives.Again the persuers began to gain, though not for long. The glandelinians managed to show another spurt of speed."

"Now let the horses go the whole limit if you think our steeds can stand it."Angeline Richee shouted excitedly.Therefore the Crowd of spies if they were the ones under "Mutt and Joff" had evidently discovered that there might be such a thing as boasting too noon. Penrod was now in the lead, the night glass at his eyes. But Susan could see what the enemy was going without night glasses for she suddenly shrieked;

"Look out Penrod, Angeline Richee, Groveton.They've dismounted and are going into position to open fire."

"They are eh!"asked Angeline Richee quetly."Going to fight us eh!"Then this night sure is going to be lively.Dismount everybody, and charge them on foot.But don't expose yourselves.There's plenty of objects of protection here."

Hardly had they all dismounted and began to worm their way here and there tward the position, when a long bright red undulating flash seemed to wave along a stretch of high ground to the southwest.

"Phee-e-e-e-e-" aped a wave of bullets through the air, but no one mong the scouts were hit.

"We'll show them we don't stand for that."snapped Groveton."Everybody open fire when I do."

He raised the rifle quickly, taking fair aim at where he had seen one of the flashes.Every did the same, and their fire was terrific..Penrod did not fire because he was watching through the night glass for the effect of that volley."

"Did I seem to hit any one Penrod?" queried Groveton.

"I think no one hit any one sir."was Penrods quiet answer."It's too dark to see to shoot I believe."

Three more long undulating flashes followed along the enemys line, almost altogether. which showed that the fugitives plainly were very desperate, even reckless to despair, when they dared offer such direct resistance to the kind of children, which the Glandelinians of any kind feared more than the most dangerous fighting christian soldiers.Most of the bullets raped by harmlessly overhead, bringing down many leaves and small twigs from the trees overhead.One of the bullets struck a sapling close to where Susan Farrol was crouching,making her start back.Then she stood straight again,lifting one hand to shake her fist at the Glandelinians.....

"You don't scare little Susan Farrol out of any fun with you rascals that way, concarn you"she yelled angrily."You are not scaringany of us at all."

The others answered with two rapidly aimed volleys.

"Did I hit any one Penrod?"Angeline Richee again inquired.

"I think not miss.The enemy are too closely sheltered."

"Marksship or makrmanship is a very difficult thing in the dark, and it seems about equally hard for the foe too.

"Two more loudly sputtering volleys flashed out along the enemys position.

"Consarn them Glandelinian cats."Yelled Penrod."They're firing at us leaders."

Such seemed to be the case, for the fugitives now began to fire their volleys faster, and it seemed by the sound that most of the bullets swinged by close to Angeline Richee, Angeline Jennings, Penrod, Groveton and others than by the privates and lower officers.Yet many of the bullets wi whizzed by close enough to give even all the privates and the Abyssinkilian soldiers supporting them the same knowledge as before in earlier parts of the war of what it means to be under fire.

"What's the distance of our range."demanded Dolores Mic-Hollester coming up to Groveton.

"It seems about one hundred feet according to the brightness of our own and the enemys flashes ."

"Angeline"she said"how about our using our hand grenades."?

"Yes but suppose the enemy throw grenades too in answer and they land amongst us.Only when we're on horsback do we throw grenades.Now it would be folley."

"Hold our lights on them"directed Groveton."This nonsense has got to stop. I'm going to do my best to wing a glandelinian soldier with every shot,and I want my followers to do the same."

The next time that Groveton fired, one of the men who seemed to be an officer directing the men was seen to topple over.Before the fire of the rest of the scouts about thirty Glandelinians seemed to drop, and about ten horses too, and others gave yells of pain and blasphemed. Yet a second later Penrod himself gave a quick little gasp of pain.

"Yes, they've got me, but that's fair in war I suppose."It's give and take now comrades.Here Susan take my rifle, while I examine and fix up my shoulder."

Susan took the weapon, just as Richardson Davison came running forward forgetting the danger of the result and flung a hand grenade amongst the enemy.

"I've got to do something to disconcert the enemy."he breathed his eyes flashing, as the explosion seemed to create havoc amongst sixty Glandelinian soldiers and sent the earth flying into an eruption that even startled the child scout aggressors.As to make matters worse for the Glandelinians however not one of them was equp eqi equipped with a hand grenade or any kind and could not answer back that way.

"Keep that gun of mine going Susan."Commanded Penrod sharply.

"""I---I ---I---can't---you gave me no bullets"she began.

"My mistake,--here"and he handed her a cr cartridge belt."Fire as fast and as straight as you can into that crowd of gray devils.Bowl them over if you can by every shot.They're worse than the worst law breakers in the world and its a mortal sin to refuse to shoot them as long as they carry on the war in this fashion.In the name of Heaven I order you and all the others to shoot to hit."

Planting herself firmly behind a tree, the young girl waited only an instant to get the hang of the sights along the rifle.She was as dangerous as she had been during her wild career in the woods despite the dark.She fired, once, twice, thrice, four times, and again and again until the gun was empty.For every shot she fired a man fell to the ground or dropped to his knees with groans of pain.It gave Susan an exultant feeling for an instant as she remembered poor Mildred Dunbar lying wounded in Evans headquarters, and this was to realize that again she was getting even with the murderers who fire even at little girls through open windows behind their backs..but too also she was doing soldier duty now as well as the rest of the girlscouts along with her, and for the countryand Gods Own Holy cause. she refilled the gun and again fired untill the magazine was exhausted..she would have liked to use her pistols but the range was too far.This time she missed only one Glandelinians, and that was because he must have seen her aiming at him and he ducked before she fired.But she got his hat just the same.

Penrod having scorned to go to the rear to have his slight wound treated which was through the fishy part of his shoulder(right) had his coat off and his sleeve rolled up.

"You'll find cartridges enough in my coat pocket ,Susan if those in the cartridge belt gives out."muttered the boy scout leader. But she yet found plenty in the belt, and again swiftly filled the magazine. All the others within sight of her were surprised for try as hard as they would to hit their enemies, Susan seemed to be the only one to hit her man for every shot,and they missed every time.Susan too was now having her first exciting taste of being under heavy fire, for the girl and boyscout leaders who had seemed at first ot to prove to be the fairest target, were not sonow as the fire of the enemy converged for that tree behind which Susan crouched. she heard many of the bullets strike about her but withall her boastfulness, and despite her strang strange and adventure and desertion of Mildred of the past, the little girl in reality was no coward, and never had been.In fact she was reckless, like Jane Melfort.

She saw a Glandelinian officers head above the works, then she brought the rifle butt to her shoulder.However she did not hit him in the head as he ducked at the sound of the rifle, but h he lost a lock of hair just the same and gave a c great and loud cry of rage.Indeed there is such a thing as good markship markmanship, and there is another quality known as good luck.Though there were many Glandelinians still firing, and though their bullets came fearfully close Penrod himself was the only one so far who had been hit by the time that Susan struck over again as many men as she had cartridges in the rifle.That with some other lucky shots from oths others disposed of a great number of t the original marksmen of the Glandelinian fugitives.But their places were quickly taken.But all this time the Abyssinkilian soldiers, and Mary Stancks girls and boys were cautiously and secretly working around the territory to surround the position.

"I think we can advance a little nearer without our comrades being hit" muttered Joe Green.

The instant that had been done, the firing of the child scouts began to have better effect and the Glandelinians lost two score more of wounded and ten killed or dying.

"If they have many more men yet we'll be having a long tough battle beforre we can capture them."grinned Penrod.

The boy and girlscouts were holding all their promise of the speed of their advance.The Glandelinians were failing a bit in their fierce resistance, especially as Susans fire was so unerring, and so the child scouts and the Abyssinkilians now opening their fire from all sides moved steadily on the defenders, lessening the distance every moment, and also the numbers of the Glandelinians, while the enemy couldn't couldn't it seemed hit a single attacker for all they tried.How they cursed, swore and blasphemed.

With two hundred and fifty three men hit, and six of their best officers ---all of the luck on the side of the child scouts, the enemy must have lost some of their insolent assurance.Seeing soldiers anyhow they really didn't believe they were really being attacked by Child Scout Mascot Rangers.Two many of the men still crouched with rifles at the ~~battlings~~ works edge, theydid not seem ready to use them and as they didn't fire, then the firing of the scouts also stopped. Either the Glandelinians were afraid luck was going against them, or they were waiting to fire at closer quarters.Penrod having attended to his wound, with the help of Mary Stanck who dressed it for him, did not trouble to put his coat on again.Instead he snatched up a magaphone bringing it to his mouth and shouting;

"We're coming into your works and capture the lot of you whether you intend to surre surrender or not.Better give in as you're surrounded andcannot escape."

"Who in Hell are you!"

"I'm Schoefield Penrod, Chief Supreme leader of the Mascot Rangers and other regiments of child scouts if you want to know, and I mean to make you all prisoners."

"You may be a child scout all right, and all your followers too, but if you do come in amongst us, you'll get the bayonet and all your followers, and be buried in dog pits for good and all."came the significant retort, from one of the chief officers, as he stepped forward into the glare of Penrods searchlight.

"Indeed.You may try it well enough"answered Penrod."But if you do you and all your followers are now threatening an act of massacre of a troop of child scouts which won't be accomplished at all.If you carry matters too far you'll have yourselves to take for it, as we're all all ha armed with hand grenad grenades.Whatever your conduct will be, as the commander of the Rangers and others,I'm bound to cross the position on all sides and come amongst you to make you yeild to my demands.I am even preparing to do it.Go after them Angeline Richee.Over the works with every one of your comrades.And have your hand grenades ready if they show signs of resisting or opening fire again."

The child scouts were nowcrushing forward from every point of advantage hand grenades ready for the throw.They were the kind that explode from hiddi hitting objects as they are thrown.Most of the enemy then tried to start a retreat.They were good hardy fighting men, but not quite in the condition,and as lively as the many child scouts who outnumbred them still more, since they suffered such a heavy losss. Susan herself passed her rifle to Mildred Maxwell who was close by. Her hands were on her pistols now, her eyes calculating the fine problem of getting near enough to the enemy to let them see who she was. As the moments passed, the child scouts and the soldiers overhauled their "prey. foot by foot, and the foremost of the members of the opposing side were barely a dozen feet from each other.....

"Ready"shouted Penrod at last.He ran up to the works.A Glandelinian officer tried to strike him with a sabre, but Penrod downed him with a well aimed shot.Then he was the first to spring amongst the works, holding a revolver in both hands, while the rest followed with their hand grenades still in their hhhhh left hand, and a pistol in the other.

"Take the position at the left, and drive the Glandelinians to the rear, Susan."called Penrod tensely."Momentarily I'll give you command over the scouts in that locality.He leaped o upon the inner works with pistol ready. Joe Green and his troop of boyscouts followed. Susan true to her trust obeyed the command, a company of the girls following her.The boy and girlscouts were in the works--as captors or as captives.!!!"""

"Nobody invited you little soldier brats into here or to fight us soldiers."roared the Glandelinian leader, stepping forward, one of the sabres he caried in his hands. But the purple passion in his face, the ugly gleam in his eyes looked more dangerous than the weapon.

"Yes, and nobody invited you Glandelinians to massacre children who cannot defend themselves as has been done in the past."retorted Penrod. "That's why we're doing this."

"We ain't the guilty ones."

"You would be if you had the chance.If you had the upper hand over us,and we were not armed, you'd have done the same to us.Besides a christian officer, whether he be boy or man doesn't have to wait for an invitation to come amongst works he desires to capture."

"Is that so you little brat?"

"That is so you viper."

"Stop calling me a viper you little brat."

"Then stop calling me "a little brat."

Penrod's coolness filled all the child scouts and even the Abyssinkilian soldiers with admiration for this youngster of unquestioned courage.

Penrod then said crisply and decisively;

"Colonel,I'll admitt you were in command here untill we came to take possession. It is my duty therefore, to inform you that this natural position you selected to defend yourself against us with is seized in the namaof the Abbieannian government as military property.and you and your followers are prisoners of war whether you surrendered or not. And if you resist us you'll recieve no quarter.I'm displaying now this, red flag as a warning.We only tell you once."

"You say it easily"sneered the leader.

"Why in the world shouldn't I."retorted Penrod as calmly as ever."If you e resisted us much further with so many of us amongst you it would surely be the act od of a madman or a fool who wants to commit suicide. If you fight us, and even do succed, and massacred us all in case we were not properly enough armed to resist you to success what would in the end become of you,wherever you and your troopers went even if it was within thevery trenches of the Glandelinian army, they would be persued as pirates and murderers by the whole power of Abbieannia, and shadowed by every girl and boyscout regiment there is ever in the whole country, or registered in the ranks. Now since you are all under arrest, I direct you to file out into the company river besides the river, after laying down your rifles and other weapons as token of surrender. You will all consider yourself as prisoners of war, that much xredit we will allow you, even though you do not deserve it, for what most of you Glandelinians do to viclet, and her sisters. My own prize regiment the Fourty Nith Ninth Degree Mascot Rangers are now in charge here."

Not one of the Glandelinian soldiers, and even the officers offered to lay down their weapons. Instead th troops waited gallenly to see what reply their officers,and the general in charge himself would make, for in general these Glandelinians were really and truly stubborn and were not usually the surrendering kind.They would rather fight to the last man than allow themselves to be prisoners. ut the nature of these child scouts partly subdued them more than the fiercest of the christian soldiers could have done.That swar w swarthy man of the enemy, Colon John his name was allowed his lips to part in a sneer..

"See here Master Penrod if that is your name, if you are in control over us Glandelinians here, and wish to take our works from us without another battle, you won't mind proving it will you.?"

"Not in the least."rejoined Penrod h shortly. "Within a very few seconds, if not sooner, I and all my troop lined up here are going to shoot down every man of you here and give no quarter either to whom I and they still see holding any kind of a weapon in their hands.Davidsonia I give you full authority---direct you to have your command--y to shoot as soon asyou see me doing it. Remember these men are defying us boy and girlscouts who don't take any monkey business as soldiers usually may do, and therefore we'll give them ten seconds to surrender their weapons. and flags and whatever they have in their possession pertaining to the military..."

There were plenty of murmurs at this--but some signs of weakening here and there among the sullen Glandelinian soldiers, but nevertheless in the midst of the impression, created by the threat of the boy scout leader, the boyscout Gerald Starring who was amongst the Glandelinians but who had not been seen for that time, acted on his own account. Leaping forward, ere anyone could guess his intention or hinder him Gerald Starring wrapped his powerful arms, around Susan Farrol.

"Girlscout."he roared,"You and I will go a swimming whether you like it or not, and drown together before I'll surrender to these christian girlscouts. and their boy leader."

As he uttered the words, Gerald Starring, holding the surprised but not frightened girl in his arms, leaped to the bank, then plunged into the river.Locked together they sank below the waves. Cool as he had been Penrod gave a gasp of dismay at this sudden blow to his plans.Gerald had been an easy target for many, butthey were afraid of shooting the girl too.Yet hardly had the first splash sounded, when there came a second, for Mary Stanck thinking in ten tenths of a second had gone head first into the river to help Susan if help were possible. When Mary had first crossed the enemy works, she had carried with her one of the long spike lances which the girlscout cavarly usually use to go fishing with in case of off duty, and as she went into the water, she still gripped that handy implement.

Susan and her assailant came up together, but Gerald bore her head under once more.In fact the big boyscout of the enemy succedded in sink ing with her? When they came upfor the second time Mary Mary was close to them.Susan screamed and fought with the fury of desperation trying to claw his eyes out, and to get her pistol butt in readiness to hit him over the head, but he grasped it and flung it far across the river. Yet she struggled so hard that she even gave Gerald a hard time in handling her.Rapidly through the water, with a long side stroke, forged Mary.

She got close enough, then swung over, balancing her big spike. At close quarters she raised the spike, striking a savegae savage blow that fell heavily on Geralds head.It was the first that Gerald knew of the presence of another girlscout foe.That blow all but stopped the big Glandelinian boys activity.with a hoarse bellow, he let go of Susan Farrol making a strong wild plunge to reach Mary.But Mary with the fish like courage of a sea coast boy in the water, sank unconcernedly swiftly swimming under water, and coming up at a new spot.Gerald watching for her, made another spurt through the water, drawing a pistol.Mary had forgotten hers but she waited for hims him nevertheless.Just as the boyscout got close enough to try to use his pistol and shoot Mary Susan Farrol seized one of his legs.Again Gerald was forced to turn and fight.That gave Mary a chance she did not miss, of darting in close and landing another angry blow on the big boys head.It was a glancing one,but even so, the big boyscout roared, and began to fear her. susan had let go of the boys leg, forced to do so by Geralds violent spasmodic kicks.But the two girls were now were now on either side of him, wholly at home in the deep water.

There was another source of danger to Gerald.The christian girl and boy scouts had shot themselves somewhat ahead even though Penrod had not yet secured the mastery there.But Some other girl and boyscouts belonging to the Regiment called "Fire flies "on the obbside oppeside shore had witnessed the affair, and a half dozen or more had shot out across the river in one of their fast motor w boats. They came so quick and ran so close in fact as to compel Mary Stanck to dive to get out of the way.But Mary came up near enough still to be a factor in the fight.. Once more Gerald tried to pounce upon Susan but after striking him a stinging blow in the mouth with her fist having lost her pistol in the fight, Susan let herself go below the surface in the intense darkness.Down after her went Gerald, but when he arose to the surface surface alone, the engineer of the boat containing the "Fireflies crew" having stopped speed and reversed, was close enough for one of the "Fire fl flie"boyscouts to lean far out and strikevthe big enemy boyscout over the head with the muscle of his rifle butt. Then reachin reaching over with one foot, the boy whose name was John Perkins, told the engineer to shut off the reverse, as he had done the forward speed.Then swinging the boo boat hook around he deftly caught the all but unconscious Gerald Starring by planting the hook in his coat collar.He swiftly had the enemy boyscout alongside.Susan and Mary plunged forward withtheir fastest strokes and hauled themselves on board. Then all three gave their atte attention to hauling the big boyscout onto the bridge of the big Military boat.Nearly unsc unconscious with what few senses Gerald had remaining werescowed by the speed of the unsuccessful almost disasterous fight.The three were alb able together to bend the big boyscouts arm behind his back, and bind them ere any fresh fight dawned in Gerald.

"Now right back to the shore."came crisply from Mary. "We must be there to see the result."

Penrod his nerves however briefly shaken by the late happenings had not yet carried out his purpose of compelling surrender.The Firefly captian on the boat ranged the motar boat alongside the shore, and Mary and susan quickly stepped across to the shore, the boat veering off. A number of other boats were approaching those on shore coming over to see what was wrong, and having approached to investigate the sound of so much firing they had heard.

"Good susan, and Mary, you're fine girls"breathed Penrod in a voice low, though exultant."Now mr commander of this Glandelinian army here,I'm going to give you and all your comrades untill I count ten---

"you need not to do so."roared the sulky commander."If you make a move to shot at us, we'll do the same thing, despite the fact that boatloads of other scouts are coming to reinforce you."

"Untill I count tent to lay down your arms and submit."insisted the boyscout officer displaying more fully the"No quarter flag""One,"

A large number of the Glandelinians seeing the grenades most of the scouts had in their hands, turned hastily as if trying to get out of the way of the ex pected explosions."Two"counted Penrod."Three, four, five, six,-----"

"About half a dozen of the Glandelinians laid down their rifles, and discarded their pistols and cartridge belts, and then darting out of harms way.," angry half blasphemous noise escaped from the enemy commander, thro though he still glared ferociously at Penrod and the boy and girlscout fficers gathered around him now.

"Seven, eight----"reeled off Penrod.

A another great number of men laid down their rifles and other weapons. The Glandelinian commander screamed and swore with rage."

"Nine ten,"finished Penrod.

With a roar that was part groan, the commander laid down his weapons, and then all the rest of the Glandelinians did the same.

"You little christian dog brats didn't get us."he snarled, as he stepped to the left, as commanders do after surrendering.."It's the power power of the Abbieannian military government behind you, that got us."

"Gill us Christian dog brats again"and this Red flag will be displayed for a massacre of Glandelinian soldiers wheher they surrendered or not." warm warned Penrod and his eyes flashed."I warned you before we're not brats, nor christian dogs."

"But,--- but---

"Step into those empty waiting boats all of you"ordered Penrod smoothly. "Now Groveton, take your command to the right, and have eve ry body their rifle rady to shoot down any number of men who tries to make an escape."

Then Penrod and his other child scout officers went forward. They came to the horses "parked"by the Glandelinian officers and soldiers.Here guarding them were twenty four other men and some boyscouts, and two Glandelinian girlscouts. and some child slaves. But the Mutt and Jeff fellows were not amongst any of these.

"Dawsonia, take the horses into possession."directed Penrod cooly."You my fine fellows"go the Glandelinians and scouts guarding the foe horses,"go ahead of me and my followers, and get into the boats with your comrades.No you child slaves, remain here, where you going, come back here, you're not prisoners, but rescued. Captian Groveton, my boy,I now place you in command of the boats, and their prize crew. And I thank the Fire Flies heartily for coming to hap us. help us."

The finish had come quickly enough.The sight child slaves were elated over their rescue and showed their happiness as only children can.As far as could be seen, nothing now remained but to take the cap tured prisoners into the christian lines.The motor boats of the Fireflies being provided with very powerful searchlights, Penrod after all got aboard the others swung the ray of his coastward, untill he had picked up his present bearings.Then he tooted a signal for the others in the Fireb Firefly boats to follow with their prisoners, keeping as close as safty permitted. The Glandelinians felt deeply peeved to think they had been forced to surrender to children. But to resist or attempt to escape now would be rank sucide.

"The capture of a whole Regiment of Glandelinian soldiers and child scouts, and the rescue of eight little slavies eh Penrod !"gulled Angeline Richee."How does that feel, after having been so lately in a house attic, paying a visit to unseen Rattlesnakes.!"

I c""I can tell you a lot better, when this big night is over"laughed Penrod."It never pays to boat boast too much you know, untill we are sure of ourselves."

"Oh for all purposes,I guess we're as good as safely home now." hazarded Mary Stanck.

"You never can tell"replied Penrod.

The motor boats now went at a pretty good rate.By and by they were close to the main section of the christian position, and Penrod who had been for a moment with the girlscout Mary Mic Hillester now came forward again.. They stood there chatting untilll Penrod after a glance down river, suddenly clutched atthe arm of Angeline Richee.

"Ede that Angeline!"he demanded huskily.

"That was a series of strange searching rays,,, and they were for some reason or other shot straight up and down against the ever darkening sky."

"But what can it be from"demanded another of the scouts.

"It may be from some ship, yet that ship is pretty far away, and so far away as to be entirely invisible."

"What are they doing!"

"Giving signals of some kind"answered Penrod."and those signals look mighty suspicious."

Angeline Richee watched those signals with interest and also suspicion, but yet she was not q girlscout who would jump too hastily at any comclu conclusions.

"Do you imagine Penrod, that that is another ship loaded with Glandelinian scouts helping the "Mutt and Jeff" spies!"!!!!! "she inquired.

Penrod tried to check down his eagerness as he answered;;

"what I think Angeline is only a mere guess, but here it is, my prisoners were out for more to night against our armies, than merely a helping those International spies, or scouting on us.I believe Angeline if I ain't mistaken that Mutt and Jeff, and his Confederates also int endedto meet some big river ship or cruiser, that brings over important experienced Glandelinian scouts from the enemy side of the shore near Fortification Thumbelinia. I'll bet the big ship is out there, whether it is a armoured steamer, a launch or a motor boat, or a sailing vessel"

"But if we did not now have our hands full with these prisoners, and if even we had not yet captured them, these Glandelinians would have been too far went by this time to see the signals."objected Angeline Richeee thoughtfully.

"Yes, Angeline I suppose they would, because as soon as they knew we were watching their movements, they were wild in their desire to lead us away from the bigger pize. prize.. See that signalling Ann Angeline? It is growing almost frantic."

"It looks that way sure enough."assented the girlscout leader....

"Now watch me give them a signal back(put in the slack) and see what happens "proposed Penrod.

Angeline then watched, and Penrod shot the searchlight of the boat so as to make the ray go high into the sky, then dropped it.This he repeated six times.Then there was a pause. Then he swung the light first to the left, and thence to the right, and then up and down swiftly, and then made it give a sort of circle.Then there was a long pause.Then a shaft of light from the unseen vessel did the same thing.Penrod answered it just as it had been given.Then there was no more signalling from down the river..

"Didn't I guess right!"asked Penrod his face aglow..

"Yes,"she agreed smiling at him.

"By jove we ought to go after that ship."breathed Penrod excitedly.

"But how can we!"asked Angeline Richee.

"What is to stop us!We have with us now ten boat loads of these Fire Fly scouts, besides the en empty boats now loaded with the Glandelinian prisoners."

"Yes, but to go out as we are might only invite a prompt rescue of the prisoners we now have, and probably mean terrible disaster to us in the bargain.We don't want to blunder.Yet to go into the Burrough Child Scout Camp and get back means lo the lost of valuable time."

"There's Fort Medal, an Abbieannian Government post our there guarded by the Standard child scout corps." quivered Mary Jane pointing over the port bow, at the shore of the river they were now close to.

"But you must know all fortified works held by child scouts isn't a prison camp, and none of us regimental scout leaders ever wants enemy prisoners within our own camps."replied Penrod."However on a pinch and at my urgent command------they might--they might-------""

"It's surely worth while trying for, isn't it?"questioned Jack Sa undors eagerly.

"Well maybe if it's got to be done."admitted Penrod."But I don't like to do it.Well I'll try it.And as I run in tward the fortified works, you can keep the horn tooting the scout call.They will understand on shore, and chase a number of child scouts down to the pier, to find out what all the whistling is... .. "

"And Penrod"laughed the girlscout leader easily"It wouldn't be so if you were not thinking quickly.Your plan is just the idea."

One of the Fire fly boys went below, now to look over his engines.

Jack took his place at the horn.The entrance to the water spread tward the fortified works was made, and Penrod taking the place at the wheel, swung well around to port, steering straight for the fort... The other boats kept at a safe distance behind. It looked as though excitement were the one thing needed to keep susan from letting the prisoners she was guarding so much as even talk to her.No matter what they said to her she might as well have been dumb, or that she had no tongue.

For fully two minutes and a half, before Penrod steered the leading boat into the pier at "Fort Medal" Jack kept soundinghe scout call kept sounding the scout dal call on the big boats auto like whistle.

That unusual noise had the desired effat. effect.A goodly swarm of boy and even girlscouts dressed exactly in uniform like the Vivianites, but wearing different colored heart shaped hats could be seen running down to the pier with their rifles readt.. rifles at the ready.. There was a chief boyscout officer, and several girl officers too amongst them.. by the time that Penrod brought the leading boat,,, gently alongside the pier... The ones directing the leading boats, ov obeying Angeline Richee's signal, lay in groups and then ranged alonside of each other. as to guard each other so the prisoners couldn't play no tricks.

"You are one of the girlscout officers in chief at this post?"questined questioned Evans, leaping lightly ashore, and hastening up to one of the girls who happened to be wearing the uniform of a superior officer.

"I am Captian Henrietta Mableson, the chief commanding officer of highest rank here."responded that girlscout."I heard you sounding the Mascot Danger Scout call, and supposed that something must be wrong."

"Every one of these boats are loaded with Glandelinian prisoners." rmiled Penrod.

"Prisoners "echoed Captian Mableson."put my dear sir, this is a Child scout Military post, not a prisoners camp.Violet,and her sisters you know are opposed to us child scouts to keep Glandelinian prisoners in our midst."

"These are Glandelinian prisoners, caught in the act of helping two Glandelinian or International Professional Spies."explained Penrod. "In case of grave necessity the Princesses allow me to put prisoners where ever it is necessary untill they can be properly moved."I am Schuf leld James Penrod, and am the chief boy scout superior of the Abbiannian boyscout military revenue service.Here are my papers captian."

By the light of a lantrep that one of the Standard scouts carried the military girlscout officer looked at the papers.

"What can I do for you, Master Penrod?"she asked..

"It will all be very easy captian,I think.What I wish to ask you to do is to take charge of the prisoners, that I have aboard these boats.If you will lock the prisoners I up in your guardhouses,I will not ask you to keep them for me any later than the morning.Then I will come here with a force of Abyssinkilian soldiers and take them off your hands."

This was a most unusual request, yethone within the power of the commanding girlscout officer to grant.Captian Mableson thought but a moment, then agreed.

"I will also ask permission to leave their captured officers in a se special house where they can be under special strong guard."Penrod continued."We suspect that one of the ships on the riv er engaged in helping these spies is waiting out yonder down the river.We mean to go alongside of her in out boats."

"That will be all right"nodded the girlscout officer."Seargent take all the prisoners come ashore nder guard.How many have you Master Penrod.

"About six hundred and nine in all, sixty three of them wounded."

"Be very careful sergeant, that none of them get away from you.You would better use sergeant all the child scout soldiers that are here.Even the men refugees with us will be of some services."

It took half an hour to get all the prisoners ashore.

"There are but six hundred and eight prisoners in all"reported the sergeant.

"By Jove, I forgot the Glandelinian boys boyscout out on the other boat in the rear."Muttered Penrod."And also that other chap gagged through all these hours.Captian there are six hundred and ten prisoners inall."

"Then be good enough to signal the other boat to come in with the remaining two."requested Captian Mableson.

Susan was accordingly signalled, andcshe brought in the boat. Captian Mableson went to look over the entire lot of prisoners while sullen but cowed now, under guard of alert and dangerous Standard child scouts.Of the sixty wounded many were painfully but not dangerously wounded.

"Pardon me"whispered Angeline Richee, resting a hand on Penrods arm, "but you don't know what sort of trouble you may have on your hands if you succeed in overhauling the ship down the river doyou?"

"We may have quite a lot of excitemen "admitted Penrod, butshe appeared wholly cool about it.

"I was thinking "Angeline continued"That you would have a heap less trouble if you could bu borrow some of these elder Standard scouts to take out on the boats with us.So much is known too about these Stand ard scouts, that even the most desporate Glandelinians are not likely to put up much of a fight if they find themselves facing these Standard Mascot Rangers."

"By Jove,That is a good idea indeed. dmitted Penrod quickly."but I have imposed on this good girlscout captians good nature a good deal already."

"Still Master Penrod"hinted Angeline Richee herself,"What are any kind of girl or boyscouts for in our various armies no matter where they are,if they are not to help in distributing prisoners if necessary.If I don't want to intrude ideas upon you, but would it not be a good notion just to ask this Standard girlscout captian for a few of her more elder boy and girl sc soldiers?At the worst she can't do more than refuse."

"She an't indeed that's true.Admitted Penrod."And it might be a real good confort,out yonder, a little later, to have our own troops backed by the Standard girl and boyscouts with their good old bayonets."

The last of the prisoners had been brought ashore now.The Glandelinian boyscout Gerald Starring,as he stepped to the pier, singled out Susan Farrol with his eyes.

"This is your time to laugh you little foriegn fool."admitted the big boyscout, seemingly without grudge however."Still I'll have another day sooner or later by myself any time as I'm as slick as the Vivian. Girls I spies in escaping from you christian peoples..But don't go to bed to night, believing I meant to assault you or drown you to death out yonder in the river, for I didn't. It struck me that if I started some excitement by a ruse or something, or started a big ruckus,I'd either get your crowd excited or off their guard, and give my own side a chance to get the upper hand.But my soldier comrades were too dull to see the point and---and--- well that settled it."

In a jiffy just thensomething else happened.Gerald Starring while while finishing his speech, had been covertly using his eyes to good advantage, talking first the lay of the land and the river.Now like a flash he bolted past the line of Standard boy or girlscouts knocking three or four of them down with blows from his fists.Bounding off the pier to the river he leaped in, starting to make good his escape.

One of the Glandelinian soldiers took the nerve to follow, and he also knocked some of the scouts down and raced for the river.

"Halt or we'll fire."shouted captian Mabelson , sternly.

The answer from the soldier was only a derision, and he kept on running.

"Squad No.One."commanded captian Mableson."Aim low and fire."

As the eight boyscout rifles each sent a red streak into the night the Glandelinian soldier, stumbled and fell.Shots were also sent after Starring, and though he was wounded he succeeded in getting across to the enemy side of the shore where willing hands drew him to dry land. Two of the Standard scouts reached the fallen man however, and he was found to be suffering from eight painful light wounds in his left leg, and right arm.That shooting had an excellent effect in keeping the other prisoners in line.

"Corporal No.Two."ordered the girlscout captian."Get the surgeon and a hospital stretcher, though in fact the scoundrel don't deserve kindness and mercy.""""QQA

"I'm truly sorry, we're making so much trouble for you Captian."said Penrod apologetically."He seemed to forget his own bandaged wound.

Captian Mableson only grinned.

"No trouble really."she replied."My comrades always like something to do. I almost wish that the others would try to make a bolt like that one and the enemy boyscout did.They need target practice my comrades do.."

At this the Glandelinians who were near enough to hear this did not dare try to do it.They knew the Standard scouts didn't care no more about shooting them, than they did about shooting rats or mice. when they got to acting too funny. Angeline Richee nudged the boyscout captian's arm significantly.

"Captian."I hope you'll overlook my greediness then."Smiled Penrod"but have you a few elder boy or girlscouts, who would appreciate an av advent r adventure on the river to night?"

"What do you mean!"asked Captian Mableson, looking at him with a smile.

Penrod stated his request for a few elder boy and girlscouts of the Standards to go out on some of the boats, and aid in boarding the suspected River ship.This was a very unusual kind of service to expect from these high grade Child Scouts, the youngest Regiment in the service, but the more older children in it, but captian Mableson was prompt in saying;

"I'll let you have as many as your boat can tee take, let alone leaving some boats empty to take on the prisoners. Colonel Marcus, take fourty men, and Colonel Jane take fourty elder girls, and an equally number of elder boys, all of you armed with rifles and bayonet, and twenty rounds of ammunition.Go aboard the boats here as soon as ready, and take your further orders from Master Penrod.."

Not more than ten minutes had been spent, ashore.Penrod was at the wheel of his boat, Joe at the Motor, and the rest at the bow and stern lines, as soon as the little squad of officers, had stepped aboard, his selected boat, while the others had filed in the extra boats..The Fire Flies as a reinforcement were to follow too.

"This is surely going to be the big night."murmured Penrod joyiously as he headed the whole fleet of motor boats down the river.

"If the captian of that Glandelinian ship hasn't tired and sailed on." hinted Angeline Richee.

"We'll know mighty soon enough."Predicted Penrod."George, will you take the wheel..!"

George did so.The little group of Standard child scout officers sat on the deck house, further fttt. aft. They looked up in interested curiousity, as Penrod reached u out to the searchlight apparatur apparatus.Four flashes, first up and down, Penrod slowly made, aiming them in the direction from which the down river signals had come.Then followed moments of suspense.

"Hurrah"cried Penrod, at last, for the signals were answered in the distance.. Now Penrod signalled with two flashes.The tresponse came with the same number.Yet by sending the flash horizontally down the river our boyscout hero could not yet pick up the far away ship.He signalled however every two or threese minutes, as the fleet of motor boats raced down the river.And every time the signals were answered.. At last when some seven or eight miles down the river up, Penrod picked up the ship-9(Though he didn't lift it to his shoulders) still hull down. She was lying to, or else, moving under the slowest heavay headway. Penrod now directed all the boy and girlscouts, including the Standards, to go into the cabin, and to refrain from showing themselves untill they were wanted. Going at more than twenty mile speed,Penrod soon had the big ship within hailing distance.He and Angeline Richee were in Glandelinian uniform"all of a sudden as it seemed2" that served as a very good disguise, in case those on board the big ship were looking for persons whom they suspected as enemies.The ship which was a war cruiser and heavily armed like a battleship, and a vessel as long and heavy, was under bare headway, as Penrod and his line of boats began to round her stern, and prepared to come up on the port side.

"Now there's one thing we can't do, Angeline Richee,"Warned Penrod. "We can't attempt to go alongside tha t big cruiser if she suddenly puts on full speed.Our boats would be mashed to kindling and all of us drawn under the big boat and droned or cut to pieces."

"Motor boats ahoy."came th e su sudden hail from the rail of the Glandelinian war cruiser.

"Mary Jane ahoy"an answered Penrod, having read that name on the stern of the big vessel.

"What in the world do you want of us.Your voice sounds like kids.""

"We've some visitors for you."replied Penrod pleasantly, in a tone meant to be mysterious.

"Who in the world are they!"came the quick demind.

"Ever hear of a boyscout called Gerald Starring, and of his gang!"asked Penrod.."We want to come alongside, for we got to hurry this night's work, as Nerf Nero Fannia and his companion are anxious to get it through with, before the Nationals discover their work."

The side ladders were let down, and Penrod and his other boats not much than drifting along were making for it. The instant that he touched, Penrod and others leaped ontp the gangway followed quickly by a perfect swarm of child scouts.The Standards too appeared, also getting on..the ladder, and following Penrod, who was mounting the steps fast. followed lastly by the "fireflies."

"Hold on there you little christian brats."roared a voice aboard."We don't want ye either on here for anything or even as prisoners.. Get off as quick as ye can or we'll shoot you all down."

"Dare you to try it warned Penrod displaying a hand grenade and his following doing the same."Captian if that's your title"continued Penrod stepping onto the vessels deck, while the rest of the scouts crowded in thick lines behind him with fixed bayonets "At present arms""I'm Schofield Penrod, and I'm the chief agent of the child scouts of the Mascot Rangers, and these are all my following. We take charge of this vessel untill further notice.If you ring for speed ahead, or attempt any resistance, you'll do it at your peril.You're heavily outnumbered.Here's my authority for what I m am doing."

Penrod held out his official papers, but the captian bounding suddenly back,, looked uncertainly at his big crew, all who were crowding close with the blackest most defiant and dorisive looks. It was at this instant that the "Fireflies" came up the ladders to join in. For a brief in stant it looked as if the captian might try to resist, but many of the crew looked very doubtful as they saw that business likefile of boy and girlscouts, ready for work of the sternest kind, those in front with presented bayonets, and those behind with dangerous hand grenades in their hands.

"I see captian."announced Penrod,"That you're in league with the "Muttand Jeff"spies.Bring me your ships papers.If your identification isn't satisfact orily,I shall be compelled to hold you and your crew as complicated in the work of aiding the worse spies there are."

"The game is up,I guess."declared the steamship captian, his black scowl giving place to a sickly grin."I will admit I can't offer any explanation for what I have been doing....."

"Then captian"ordered Penrod,"You'll go ahead at slow speed, and make for the pier of Fort Medal."Captian Richee"To Angeline Richee2" we'll all remain aboard, and I'll go to the bridge with him to make sure, that no wrecking or other tricks are attempted.."

While the big craft was making slowly f down the river, and the late moon shown through the deep smoke haze,Penrod discovered that the captian really was an aideqd aide-decamp of the spies.He was communicative enough to state that he was captian Lawrence Equal, and that the "Mutt Fellow" was a man from Spain, and military manager for general Richardson Raymond Federal, Glandelinias's highest commanding general, and that the little "Jeff" fellow was a man of Italy, but really not of that Nationality though he had lived there for a log time, but was really a man of Irish birth, and was the head of the largest band of Glandelinian spies in the landelinian army, and that "Mutt"was his aide.

Off Fort Medal the motor boats of the "Firefly "Boy and girlscouts were ac anchor d anchored, and the Glandelinian prisoners of the big ship also brought in taken ashore to the Standard Child Scout Military Post as spy prisoners.

To the girlscout cptian of the Standards Penrod said;

This big ship is a lso loaded down with plenty of provisions and war munitions.I had examined everything on the way in.Can you place men sentries to guard the boat for the night.?"

"I will."Nodded the girlscout captian.

Penrods own troop as the sun ross that morning red as blood through the smoke haze ever and ever and "forever"it seemed covering the whole sky, were returning to the fort, with half a hundred mounted Abyssin kilian soldiers of the heaviest kind to take in the prisoners.Indeed these were now to relieve the . Standard scouts in guarding the prisoners all of whom were trafer transferred to heavily guarded wat on trains, and brought into the internment camps. Then too Penrods wound had been attend ed to and dressed by a docter who pronounced it a mere scratch.The morning was well started, when Penrods troop, returned to their own part of the christian seg seige lines.Dick was again in the lead(head), the others except joe green, riding near him but b on either side or behind and indeed all were so weary that it seemed as though they could keep their eyes open no longer.Yet all the child scouts soon found some thing to interest them, and get their eyes fully open again.To Penrods surprise and horror his headquarters shack or barn had been partly destroyed by fire. Jennie Turner and her sister Francis stood looking at the shacks ruined and smoke filled interior.Besides Jennie stood the Vivianite chief leader Hettie Kaurmann, one of whose hand s rested on a boyscout wearing a purple coat but a gray pants, and the style Collegeantulent hat of the landelinian soldiery, and that young Glande linian boyscout was crying as though he had recieved a well deserved thrashing from a school teacher. As Penrod and his followers dismounted from their horses almost simultaneously, Penrod and Angeline Richee scenting something, dismissed the others, and stepped over to the little group by beside the ruined building.

"Oh hello Penrod, and Miss Richee."was Jennie Turners greeting."This Glandelinian boyscout, didn't know you had allowed me to live in your headquarters while you were away for these few days, and it seems he has gotten himself into considerable trouble through his ignorance ignorance.I have arrested him as a "fire bug". And I believe he knows the penalty fire bugs recieved in our country."

"Let me go little girlscout leader----please do."I sobbed the boy piteously.I'LL GO to work for you, join your rank, anything.I'll work the bill of damages off."

"Do you think'd have a young Glandelinian rascal in my ranks working for me"demanded Jennie Turner ironically."No ,no you Glandelinians whether soldiers or child scouts are all meant sort of people, and now it we will do you good to settle with our own lawfor your wicked if even called military war deeds.You're guilty of arson and will pay the penalty..If you had been a man you'd of faced the firing squad."

Penrod and Angeline Richee after a close look at the burns interior, and its outside hardly needed to be told anything.

"A little after daylight, two of my boyscouts caught this boy running away down the company street and the building on fire."put in Francis Turmer herself."I had him chased but he bolted and almost got away, but a cavarly squadron of Abyssinkillians came down the company street and he was captured.Now I guess he'll have plenty of chance to feel good and sorry for the mean trick he thought he was playing on you two."

"What did he really do?"asked Penrod.

"Why"answered Jennie Turmer very sharply "he almost caused me to be burned to death.I was in bed when the fire started, and it was some of Jean Saunders's boyscouts who got me out on time.Then they got bucketw and water and put the fire out."

"Let me go"whined the Glandelinian boyscout brokenly."I'll never do such a thing again.I'll be decent after this."

Jennie Turmer shook her head grimly.

"You are the chief one here, you coax her to let me go Boyscout(to Penrod) and I'll be your friend for life."promished the Glandelinian boyscout.

"While she was in possession for those three days, the house wasn't mine and so I haven't anything to do with the matter."replied Penrod."In fact was you a man I'd shoot you down like a dog where you stand. Here some of you scouts over yonder.Take this boy and put him in the penal station.He'll get his deserts for this fire."

Therefore this Glandelinian boyscout by his spitework, had injured no one but himself.He was courtmarshalled by general Mansion, and only his being a boy of nine years of age saved him from the death penalty which is the case upon fire bugs in time of war in that country.He recieved the maximum punishment that could be methed out to boys. Within the next night,Penrod assisted by others of his highest officers unearthed all that remained unknown about the crowd, who had helped the escaped Mutt and Jeff"spies make such criminal use of the outskirts of the very christian lines.For two years already the dangerous operations of Hero Fan nis and his accomplice had been going on.All who were seized had been sent to prison as spies.Had they been successful spies all of them would have been hanged. During the whole war up to now, some certain christian camp would and had been secretly the hed headquarters of these two desperate International Professional spies.Officers who had so even attempted to investigate such places had vanished.So these two spies had a bad reputation. It was always the practice of these two spies to try to even capture some leading boy or girlscout but had recently found that as dangerous as for a person by the bare hand to try to grasp a vicious rattle snake by the tail. Though most of tjeir band their band here in had been broken up, and their members sent to prisoner camps, yetthe operations every one knew would not be really stopped untill those two spies were apprehended.Though the men looked like Mutt and Jeff, both in size and looks, yet that was no disguise, for that was their natural looks and form.They wouldn't disguise themselves for the chief reason they intended to show themselves and defied capture under any condition.Their powerful strength had a lot to do with their escapades, as no prize fighter in the world, or the worlds best strong men together couldn't cope with one of these spies. As a blind of some sort these spies always generally used a sort of White covered wagon, which had been really used in only transferring them from army to army wherever they were to do their dasterdly work. They sometimes disguised as christian officers. For the success so far Penrod was genetiosity himself.He described to Angelinia Arenburg when he went to see her in the Base Hospital where she lay wounded, the splendid parts played in the whole affair affair by Angeline Richee and her fellowers.Angeline Richeecand her officers therefore all all had letters from her in which that high official spoke most flatteringly of their plucky services to their country.

It was not untill four hours later that it was learned that "Mutt and Jeff"after their escape from the persuers, had fled to the enemys lines.There learning by wire from some source that his followers were captured by the boy and girlscoutd under his arch enemy Penrod"The Mutt fellow"his name not known went to general Purgatorians headquarters to ref report the affair. But the general was afraid to arouse the temper of the christian child scouts, when the situation was so desperate and therefore the spy couldn't get any satisfaction. The next day afto after this big night, Jean Saunders approached Jennie Turmer with the news---

"The little girl Susan Farrol has made some good record of herself Miss Turmer, and she wants to join the girlscout troop."

"Bring her in to see me then."replied Jennie Turmer."We want several new girls.I'll overlook her desertion of Mildred, as long as it was not a desertion in the face of the enemy.I've heard of that affair in the woods and couldn't believe my ears,.Bring her to me."

Already Penrods troop had been increased to a total of nine new boyscouts. Jennie Turmer examined Susan Farrol, and then sent her to Penrod to be registered.

The next day news arived that Violet,and her sisters wished the Mascot Pangor troops to be at Wickey Lansing,a while Evans should come too.They reported in their message of the battle that raged there.

"We're going to have a grand winter of excitement comrades."declared Penrod.

For some reason or other to day the temperature that afternoon despite it being October was one hundred and twenty in the shade.Heaven only knw knew what it was in the shadeless blistering glare without, where the shimmering rocks were almost red hot to the touch. Susan Farrol stood it as long as she could.For an hour she had moped and mowed and tried to fan herself to get cool.Finally she got up and crept forth into what she hoped for would be col cooler shade---untill that moment she had been invisible by the way, in her green gray outside violet and yellow stockings and dress in the light and dark green foliage, showing herself as a fine pretty young girlscout, but now as dangerous to the enemy as any other scout, with something of the quickness of a bird in her alse alert glance and all but the calculating intelligence of a grown man in mein and expression.From what they learn in instructions and of how willing they are to learn, and the interest they take in their lessons, the boy and girlscouts of the christian armies are perhaps the most intelligent of all Abbieannian children. The Glandelinians have named the Christian child scouts"The little brat soldiers, who are like the demons escaped from hell"

She was on a spying venture of her own decision.She had paused near the edge of the raging battle field(for the awful battle was still raging) peacefully peered round about, and overhead for fear of shrapnell fire, for no matter how brave a person may be they don't hanker for shrapnell wounds. The boyscout sentinels always onwatch at any point of the christian lines were using umbrellas to escape the blighting heat. The Christian soldiery, out fighting were not in camo, and their generals were no where in sight.Slipping out of a grass stretch almost in crab fashion, susan crawled tward the river, then started to climb down the precipice there by means of a strong overhanging vine and utilizing a multitude of well known tiny finger holds, and toe purchases which no human being elsewhere could have possibly recoginized.The sheer drop beneath her was almost a precipice, but Susan went down that long vine like a human spider, hanging with her hands here and there, while she sought a grip below with her feet.Then her hands would drop for an other lower grip, all of it with a surety that would have driven a human experienced human fly to despair.Finally she reached a stout rope ladder of a flowering sort of fall growth vine that dropped sheer to the beach of the river below.Susan wished to see what was going on, for she knew a disaster was threatening some portion of the christian lines.She knew time and again general Evans had warned the generals to keep their troops away from the lower works already recaptured by the enemy untill reinforcements could be sent to them, he had impressed it upon the generals with lectures, and with map showings and the like.But one of the generals had not unfortunately recieved the warning, and this situation she reallly feared now--she had once seen the vast, scowling debauched ed ruffian of a Glandelinian commander, general Richard John Purgatorian, (his enemies called him a"Purgatory"that ought to be in---well never mine the word), and he was as powerful in his own physical strength as four strong men, and he ruled his glandelinian armies with a military discipline that made it so hard for the christian armies to drive the Glandelinians back.Therein lay the root of it all no doubt why the seige of Vivian Wickey was so stoutly resisted.Susan and the general knew each other too well, for she had once been almost a prisoner in his hands. Therefore certain it was that if there was one solid fact anchored to date in her brain it concerned her fear of this Glandelinian general and the mutual hatred that existed between them.Since she had learned how big a scoundrel he was her hatred of him had been there.It also almost seemed as if even at that early age, the Glandelinian general was able to read the futue future of this crafty foriegn girl who though not an Abbieannian had her heart set very devotedly for the Chir Christian cause..No there need be no doubt but that he knew that and much more with that crafty inteligence that flaamed from the diabolical eyes beneath il low ridged brows..But he feared her secretly. Had he had the chance he would have murdered her, but her refugee camp had been in the very midst of the various regiments of child scouts and to try anything an impossible .Susan dropped lightly as a little acrobat by the edge of the beach of the river a look of precocious cheek and satisfaction on her beautiful but daring fur face.No eye of the enemy had yet seen her, and if they did she would play mudgirl.She for a moment squatted on a hot rock, and looked about, her pistol drawn for need in case of instant action.....22

The river from the heat was far from sweet smelling at any time during the seige, and to day it was worse than ever. It was lower too, and it threw off a breath as of a hundred Chicago packing plants, Limberger Cheese factories, dead rat smells, with glue factories somewhere to windward- ard it was quite covered with a green scum. Leaning ar over to see if there were any fishes in the stream, she suddenly heard a deep organ note of warning from some soldier sentinel on a high rock as he craned and peered. The enemy was advancing to make an attack, and another instant and the entire christian position was crammed with soldiery with pointed rifle and bayonet in a dark purple glittering wave. Susan knew very much what dangers lurked inany most common place occurance and she threw herself behind a low but thick projecting rock to be safe as she watched the the progress of the assault. The Glandelinians were coming forward in a long gray wave, and shot forward like a flung reata, and simultaneously a new and more advanced wave suddenly rose far ahead from a high sea of grass. All for one, and and one for all" is always the "landelinia" code, and every one of the Glandelinians shocking Susan n's ears with their blasphemous derisive devil yell were speeding forward at the speed of a mans best pace at running, working themselves into a fury as they came all adding their noise, by harh harsh almost barking challenges, and fierce rapid movements, while the eyes of those nearest which Susan could see gleamed white and terrifying. One of the Glandelinian generals was in the van on a white horse. He was no sweet picture to look upon as Susan could see through a field glass she carried. His course greenish gray uniform coat all worn bristled almost like the coating of a roach. His uncouth human form and the mad glare of his sunken eyes, were simply and unash unashamedly diabolical. His rage against the christian defenders was the rage of the "Hellish pit" itself. The christian troops in possession of the advanced worksthus assailed were fighting fiercely with bayonet, and small artillery and hand grenades, and with every conclevable weapon at the "shocking" pressure that assailed on two sides of the works. The Glandelinian wave was temporarily hurled back before Susans eyes with fruig frightful loss, but it moved forward again waiting for an unguarded moment in which to loop the christian powis position with the double "coil" assault. by which the Glandelinians annihilate or drive back the defending troops. The attack was severe and violent. and the pressure terrific. It was a hand to hand fight along a six mile front which could not be described, and as fierce as some of the fiercest fighting hand to hand inWorld War battles. So greatly was the misup that each bunch of troops were compelled to fight almost independently, obeying its own officer. Susan saw a christian officer get up his machine gun. Two or three christian soldiers tried to help him but they fell. The fighting was most hot and heavy, and the officer finally blazed away, handling the machine gun by himself. It was literally "a knock down" and like a drag out fight between mobs. Half a dozen times Susan saw that the Glandelinians came near getting that bold officer. They kept charging the gun fiercely, and those christian fighting wild cats held them off with shots andbayonet thrusts. Three times the officer had to move the gun back. The tripod weighed sixty pounds or even more, qud and the gun one hundred, yet he was such a strong man that when the troops moved back, he took the gun on his back, and the spigg spiggoties carried t carried tripod and ammunition. It was worst than an all around, dirty hot hand to hand fight. The christians were falling back all the time, and for a time it seemed as if they didn't get any help. Susan wondered why the other three christian columns didn't show up up. The third time that officer who was a captian set up the gun and went into action with it, but the glandelinians with defiant yells were closing in. More than half the number of christian defenders were dead, most of the others wounded, and scattering, in groups and singly on the slow retreat, it seemed as if the victorious Glandelinians were literally chasing them down. It seemed too the christians were licked.

Before the Glandelinians could accomplish a victory however, a new long christian column rushed forward from a long line of high works in the rear, almostcrushing the left wing of the assailing wave by the weight of the onslaught. The Glandelinians fought back with diabolical fury. Twice the Glandelinians stri struck hammer b lows upon that new christian column in strokes that would have driven back a much stronger line of troops, but the christians clung to their attack, like an army of bulldogs, opening a fearful fire. Then the rest of the christian divisions held in reserve flung themselves forward in one howling ravening wave, literally covering the battlefield in purple in fierce motion. Then inexorably, foot by foot, and working all in unison they began to sta straighten out tout the whole Glandelinian wave by the fiercest attack christians had ever yet made. No other christian general yet had ever brought to bear that mighty yet cunning effort with all human thought behind it. The Glandelinian wave in its defense and counter attacks, looked to Susan like a "steel hard tessellated formation that quivered an again and again with convulsions that flung part of the line of h christian troops back against their own positions, but as more and more of the christian troops came forward, and grappled with the desperately str ruggling Glandelinian army their united weight and strength at last began to roll it up from the field. Two minutes from the start of the desperate tussle, the christian division of troops that had been defeated first, and which had been relieved from the crushing ata attack that raged against it, and the little the worst for its awful situation, ever then joined in the fray with the main line of christian l attack. But that by no means ended the struggle. It was fully a quarter of an hour later before the christian troops finally cut through the enemy and drove his wave back literally, ripped, torn, and shredded to pieces. And only then did the terrific turmoil before Susans very vision cease. Finally the smoke cloud shroud settled. and the enemy could be seen recoiling in confusion to his works. Presently all was quiet again along the Norma Run, but the sight was not a nice one to look upon. Countless numbers of dead and wounded were left behind. That sight of the rescup from the "Toils" of the vigorous Glandelinian assault was significant of that luck was was that was to follow Susan throughout her career as a girlscout.

During the summer months that had passed she had developed phenomenally, in strengthand weight, and craft, and finished the child scout lessons andmaxims in which all child scouts would serve their country. She learned of the many quick deaths, that come from shrapnell fire and she seemed to have developed subtle vision in her very feet and the very hairs of her head to avoid them with. She mastered the subtle book of sound as well as scent and sight. She had even learned the different calls of the boy or girlscout stations, who act as alarm senders for all the christian camps camps, and knew when their cry meant the approach of Glandelinian prowlers. the advance of an attack or any danger that could lurk within or outside of a christian camp. In all things she had proved her self to be a master pupil before she had ever asked to become a girlscout, as she had studied everything in secret, and despire her fright in encountering encountrying Evans that day, she had nevertheless a certain amount of headstrong cou courage, and somewhat the same rashness of Jane Mellfort. It bordered upon be belligen belligerence, that strage courage and she came by it honestly. It had it was her fathers.

While she was still watching the battle scene from her hiding place, and had observed the christian country su charge to its final success, there soon came an abrupt chan change change in the situation. The lull which had lasted for only nine minutes was broken suddenly by a double Glandelinian artillery storm, whose shell fire swept everything before it, while the Glande linian generals again drove an assault against the hole or whole christian line, untill after fifteen minutes of it, the christian position became untenable. It was at that moment that one of the officers in charge ordered the guards to sound the deep rolling drum notes, that drew back the shattered christian troops from the works. The generals knew that the prevailing Glandelinian attack storms would continue to sweep from this direction, and therefore they began at once a retreat to the shelter of the higher and more stronger works behind. The first lap of the retreat under shell fire led through dense bush and grass, that stretched for many miles along the shore of the river—a dangerous passage if the Glandelinian artillery would be massed that way during which the retreating christian troops would be without shelter. But as they retreated, to ward off the advancing foe in their direction and seeing the wind was from them tward the foe, the soldiers in the rear of the retreat, started a long wave of conflagrations amongst the high grass. The advance of the enemy in this direction placed Susan in some danger of being seen should the Glandelinians pass that way, for even the conflagration did not check their advance. They seemed to be fire eaters. They crossed the fire by leaping over obstructions in a long line, and soon emerged from the grass, frightening a few deer, who fled across the plain. But now the christian forces were well located in a new strong hold, and waiting for the onslaught to come. While she was here in hiding all the various regiments of boy and girlscouts were greatly active in their efforts to foil the enemy in his attack upon the christian line. They tracked retreating Glandelinians to their positions by following them in their flight, and heedless of the danger would blow up a trench or a generals house, hurling themselves into position with their booty justvahead of the enraged swarm of Glandelinians, and opening a sudden withering fire, mow down a of all of the Glandelinians to a last man before they could even retreat. Then too the child scouts would spread out in a very long thin line, a each boy or girl far apart, carefully examining every inch of distant Glandelinian position for signs of the n enemys advance, and when it happensd suddenly surprise the enemy skirmish line by a simultaneously deadly fire all along their line and causing the Glandelinians to flee for dear life. Penrod led his own troop on the expeditions. Dangers during all these expeditions were constant for all this was done during the raging battle, and this battle was a very severe and extensive one. Death stalked the battle region in a hundred different forms. And Glandelinian batallions of scouting parties well armed, and having grenades of their own hunted nightly and every day and hour for traces of the boy and girlscouts. Therefore even Penrod himself often did sentinel duty, and one could see him, particularly at the dangerous sunset hour, humped, "Evil to the enemy" and lowering silhouetted upon the highest position, a gargoyle figure of pure gamboage at at that distance.

At this section between the christian lines,and the foe armies affairs became more aggravated than ever.Times beyond number during that day and night the Glandelinians would make a venomenous rush, and charge upon the christian position here or there, in rmy attacks along a thirty mile front,and set up an inferno of battle that no one could describe in its frightful fury.A vicious attack here and there left a big gash in the christian lines.But the time was fast approaching when a general definite vlash must come between the christian lines and the enemy. The development of the besieging christian lines was now such that it might have been taken for the concentration of all the hosts of Heaven instead of an army of mere human beings, and their resistances to the enemy attacks, and their own counter attacks, made scenes beyond description, terrible.The christian armies here were more than a match for any of the attacking Glandelinian waves, and were boldly and savagely disputing every inh of ground, even though the christian generals did not yet dream of the true extent of their remarkable power.Only general Mans ion reallly knew about that..It was now when even the highest of the general officers began to watch and direct the thrend of things, with growing anxiety, that the rottenss of battle worked one of those grim swift turnovers, for which a battle is always so sadly celebrated.

While during a ~~counterattack~~ counter attack, as wave after wave of christians swarmed up tward the christian positions still in the hands of the recently victorious foe, the enemy artillery opened a fire. that swept the whole front wave away as if before a reaping tornado.The second line of troops broke and fled tward their own lines before that seething thundering horror, but their general Chacnanta was mortally c wounded.He had been foremost in the advancing first wave of attack, and a shrapnell shell had laid him low.queerly enough it was a glandelinian soldier who reached the wounded general in his terrible plight.He bent over the fallen one, peered deep into the sunken eyes, then offered him the support of his back.Together the pair worked their way under fire into the Glandelinian works, the arms of the fullen enemy about that of the ene glandelinians body, as if at the end they had rubbed out the war enmity between them, as perhaps they had.For some ten minutes after wards the fallen christian leader lay on the floor of a tent his hard brown ey eyes unchanged, in tractable, implacable as ever.

The following night the prisoner died.

Seeing how the battle was turning out, and noticing the loss of the general, Evans took the reins in his own hands.He had turned with his full strength into sheer ferocity against the Glandelinians.For some time there was dangerous resistance against him, for in the attack the enemy showed his bullying, blustering, tyrannous temper against the christian line and tried a deep laid wicked crac craft of violence and dominance, but Evans put that down in no uncertain way.As no other kind of Glande linian general, no matter how strong a column they threw against him could hope to prevail against him, he quite automatically soon found himself master of much of the works recently taken from the christians by the enemy.But the fury of battle still continued in Maudlin rage.Evans knew he had won at first too easily, for he had yet to be tested ti to win as far as he should win, for in the wildest battles there are s dangers and disadvantages in trying for victory against a strong foe, before it is earned in its ripeness.That enemity of his against the Glandelinians, and his remembrance of his own life as a child slave, when a boy, and what violet,and her sisters had suffered, still lived in Evans, linked now with dreadful battle temper, which could be expected to land the whole christian command in this section upon the enemys lines in an irresistible attack, andwhich he did.Minute by minute his angered restless spirit strangely unpeased,Evans. led and drove the christians head in the assault, and always drove the Glandelinians from works to works, always northward and inland from the river, breaking all records for the fury of the battle.Somehow in the heart of the young general strange strange things beckoned, instincts of the past that would not let him rest.The advancing christian waves held together as one beast through that wonderful discipline ingrained by great training, which brooked no compromise, permitted no delay or hesitation.Utter obedience without question was always required, and in every crisis given.That was why the christian troops was so hard to be beaten.Nothing could resist the advance of Evans or his troops, and he proved to both sides that he was born to the role.It was to be seen in the utter fearlessness that blazed from his eyes, and of his patriotism and valor which only death can stop.Evans was a man who never retreats, and that he would always turn back and assist the weak or wounded, no matter what the strength of the enemy. Thus Evans met and bested some of the grimmest enemies confronting him.The boy and girlscouts themselves followed him in his advance and many times their ranks closed up in battle array, whever whenever danger threatened.Once they were attacked, by a squadron of Glandelinian cavarly, who strovevto ride down and break through the fight ing formation, but after one brief vlash nowever, the Glandelinian hose hornemen retreated with eppe speed knowing well they were lucky to have escaped intact from thecwave of fighting childre children that had all but surrounded them.Once the band of child scouts defied a pack of Glande linian artillery men, and they also had to be wary wary of the great shrapnell shells that hurl fragments downward as they exploded.Always too as they went, there followed in their wake, Glandelinian shadowers, watching for a chance of successful attack.Then when no other protection afforded for them,the brand would creep into some natural abatis of bristling six inch thorns nicely calculated to discourage the fiercest enemy attackers that came forth.Evans won his say and was back again in the old christian works. In a swift exultant rush and almost with the suriety of a miracle, Evans led his followers onward.Then he was in possession.But then he caught an indistinct blurred movement upon a line of enemy works a mile or more away. Countless vague forms seemed massing through the haze,,, of battle smoke,, and also eddying upon thevhighest works, and a long line of heavy artillery walled other positions in dense black and white smoke and the din was so terrific as to make one believe he was witnessing not only the explod explosion of the earth he was on, but all the other Heavenly planets, and the destruction of the whole universe as well. The advance of the new enemy body was at first much too far away to be seen with clarity through that smoke pall, yet general Jack Evans knew.In another moment he knew why the enemy was massing so strongly at that point, and he sent a swift wireless message to general Mansion to warn him to mass for defense and be on his guard.Another great wave of Hobbonite Glandelinians,,,,, far larger than the attacking gray waves of the morning before, but equal to his own, was advancing, perhaps a hhh million t strong.

It was these too now that he decided to show that he could defeat, by virtue of the strength of his own army, his own prowess and dauntless daring, and first of all by the Help of Our Blessed Lord, whom he loved so well.As quickly as possible general Evans began his demonstration against this new Glandelinian wave. The enemys advancing wave of men stretched awayfor miles to the north and east, and apparently all the Glandelinians who were advancing were of a single great division of Hobbonites undervarious high generals. For twenty minutes general Evans watched.Then a new line of battle appeared.A great gray wave mightier even then the first, ripe in discipline and evil, terrible in their brutal pride of power, came swarming tward the positions the christians under Evans had just recaptured.A great stirring and excitement was evident among the christian generals all along the line, and the deep loud xhorus of yells as steady as the howling of a terrific windstorm went echoeing along the whole two opposing lines in its ricocheting.It was a most amazing spectacle.

It seemed madness no less for Evans to brave the death dealing conflict and worse that is meted out to any who deliberately arouse the wrath of such fierce and dangerous Glandelinian soldiery.One can only lay it to his unusual Love for Country, and the unconscionable daring of the Impetuous that had driven him to do it.That was enough for general Evans, it was in fact too much for him to go and retreat after he had won so far already even though now he was heavily outnumbered.He decided to deal with that situation, and at once.He remained to meet the wrath which followed in the form of the advancing gray waves.The Glandelinians were led in person at this spot by general Purgatorian himself.At thesecworks like two counter tidal storm waves the two enemies met with a frightful shock--general Evans saw to that, knowing how sorely his divisions were out numbered.The frightful demonical fury of the battle and its utmost frenzy and wild energy, that was joined within and without those long line of high positions was well now impossible to desf dexribe.

Following the awful tense moment, in which the christian armies threw themselves into position, and the enemy were temporarily checked in his advance by the most frightful devastating christian artillery and rifle fire on record for all battles of the past, the attacks and movements of the enemy was so swift, and eye decieving in their rushes, retreates after repulses, feints, demonstrations, and fiendish clinches with the christian lines, and breakaways or retreats, that no One who witnessed the tremenous conflict could say which side was the punished, or the punishers, and the scene and frightful losses was a hundred times worst than Waterloo. along this given space.General Evans second Lieutenant was mortally wounded, and Evans lost three horses under him and his hat, and had ten buttons out from his coat by bullets.Half the time they fought at distances, keeping up a annihilating rifle fire at each other in the most steady manner so that the region became smoke bound, again the charge would be made so fiercely that it seemed as if both the opposing waves, were wrestling,"worrying" and rending like innumerable human beings demented by demons, with cable like fingers and crossed musket butts or fighting savagely with pistol butt, musket butt, or bayonet and ny any weapon they could bring to bear, or wrestling man to man, acting the black arts of the pit in their frightful mowing grimaces, yells, curses, loud breaths, coughings and other sounds.Times some number of men on both sides fell still, locked jowl to neck, cord like muscles standing out on their arms, as they slowly strangled one another with their handholds, or worked dark diableries of the wrestling art trying to cut or tear one another very muscles out by the roots. Some opposing enemies even skittered spiderlike round and round some fang of rock in a game of feint and dodge, trying at the same time to club or bayonet one another, like red hot devils upon red hot rocks. All of this hand to hand frequently raging most savagely amid a skirling, yammering and howling from each combatant, as of hundreds of thousands of High landers playing a dirge on their bagpipes while drunk at the same time. It was evident from the outset that the two opposing lines were well matched... What at first the Glandelinian waves of human fighters had in size, the latter made up in greater agility, more artillery, and topped with that "bottomless" valor and desperate assurance, that lived in the hearts of the Christian fighters, and what's more, more and more reinforcements came for the christian side. steadily, and none for the attacking enemy.. The batteries of the christian long range artillery prevented that. For more than a quarter of an hour the desperate hand to hand fighting raged, and then came. finis. The very eyes of the Glandelinian soldiery were smouldering blood shot, and hell pitted with fury, and they were now resorting to trickery. They after being repulsed again flung out viciously at the christian lines at a moment when it was hoped for that the christian line was shattered, with the hope of being able to send the Nationals flying from the works.

The christian wave of troops came loose from the position as intended, but not either driven back or on a retreat. They came loose from the position, in a madlun maudlin ttttttttttttttet counter charge, and it was an exposed open gap of the Glandelinian surge of attack left open to the attacking christian foe for the brief test fraction of time, and there the christian troops gripped with the hq enemy hand to hand and cle clinging to the attack like wild leeches, bayonets and rifle butts at play and firing shots to right and left. Back from all positions the Glandelinians were flung, struggling desperately under the double weight of the christian assailing tide, and the christians brave as many insane men raged on. Followed one of the grim grimmest Glandelinian retreats on record, almost a "Death Retreat" for such awful numbers fell, the Glandelinian survivors retreating in frenzy back to their own positions, with the christian attackers at their their very heels. The whole glandelinian surge was laid up open, and spouting red flams and smoke in vain, and the Glandelinians lost even a line of their position also.

But the Glandelinians still resisted and then aga in attacked most doggedly, and though there was a temporary lull in the bloody fighting, the firing spread like a train of volcanic eruptions all along a line of battle eighteen or twenty miles long. The battle raged with the fury of a war within a war. The Glandelinians in one of their frightful frightful almost almost successful attack got behind a portion of the christian position and burned most of the christian positions in Santa Fe Works. The Nationals under general Waughin had to come forward and fight the desperate an army out between two rows of fiercely burning buildings and tents and rows of flaming trees and high grass and brush, and in the midst of dry peat bog fires. They fought desperately in that flaming inferno against the assailants. with the fire scorching off the hair and eye brows of the contenders of both sides. pusing that part of the conflict the battle came dangerously close to the refuges camps near Fort Popham and the refugees got the scare of their lives, but officers came and quieted them down. They were frightened and confused, because of such a wild uproar of a battle so close. They kept trying to get away from the territory. The scene was horrible worse than a night mare.

On the christian side general Monetenegro Jose had been foo wounded in the fight, and borne to the rear. No matter where the titanic battle raged every christian soldier got the taste of the kind of fighting that no one could dare to think of. The first fiercest glandelinian rear guard charge had failed, and the fighting was getting hotter still. Colonel Griffin was hit beside Major Johns. The major picked him up out of the dust and put on a first aid bandage. He couldn't lay him down the ground was too hot. Lieutenant Colonel Hanson ordered three of the soldiers to take him back to the rear where many od of the doctors were working on the badly wounded. Wounded men were l ing as stick as grass in a field all along the Grate Road, and the number of ambulances and wagons that were full of woundedwas appalling. Even the doctors and other wounded were under fire on the open road, but they couldn't desert their post under any conditions. It was seen by the Major that the colonel may be mortally wounded, for a bullet had gone through his throat. He got him hoisted onto his back, and started tward the road, then he saw about a dozen dozen Zimmermannian Glandelinians coming on the run, and shouting to him to drop the wounded man and surrender..... .. He had to drop the colonel but not to surrender. There was only time to shoot one of the foe before they closed in. By good luck the Major fixed his bayonet, then there was not the slightest time to know what was happening. Half a dozen of them were trying to jab at him with their bayonets, and the major was just tutomatically going on with his own bayonet. However he had been in great exhibition drill with the bayonet, and that all but saved him. There was one sensecond when the Major couldn't move--an arm held him around the neck--and he saw one of the foe aiming a rifle at him. For some reason he missed, and the Major got loose and was at it again with the bayonet. The Glandelinians gave ground for a minute, and the Major got the wounded colonel on his back and started. But he had only made a couple of yards before he had to drophim and fight again. The other christia christian soldiers being defeated atbthis sector were falling back acroass the road, and didnot see him see him. That was the hottest Hand to nand fight this christian major was ever in in his life. All knife, rifle butt and bayonet work, bloody buisness. It seemed to last for hours, but it only was for a few minutes. Some christian officer saw the majors predicament , and half a hundred retreating christians came running back. They took the fight off the Majors hands, and when it was over, it succeeded in rescusing the woundes colonel. The Major didn't get a scratch, but there were thirty two sabre cuts and fourty bayonet jab cuts on his gun, and two bullet holes in his hat. His Company was in the next charge made by general Currens christian division. They were trying desperately to break the Zimmermannian line, but couldn't do it. In that charge Lieutenant general Gorman Pete was killed, by a shot between the eyes which blew out the back of his head. Finally those who were l ft of the Company formed a hollow square around the wounded. They had been fighting for five hours, and their ammunition was nearly gone. They fixed bayonets, and f and finally expected it to be knock down and drag out as long as they lasted against the rebels. The Glandelinians closed in again, but a young lieutenant of the Abbieannians had got through to the main line, and sent help sent. Two battalions of the Fourty Four Infantry came out on the run, and drove the dogged Glandelinians back. And the Company was out of ammunition when the reinforcements came. The Christian officer Captian San Nicolas charged a whole crowd of Glandelinians single handed, and captured sixteen prisoners.. During the dreadful fight came another scene of horror and thrill elsewhere simultaneously. Colonel Fernado's Regiment was in all the fighting there was, and one of their first jobs was to repair a telegrpah line hurled down by shrapnell earlier in the battle. and they came near being killed to the last man. The big Girl Knool Big Yellow Brick Road ran between the Santa Fe Works and Wickey Lanninin and followed a branch of the Norma Run River. About half way between these two sectors of simultaneous raging Vivian Wickey Seigo Battles the road made a sharp turn out of the high what fields, and for two or three miles it ran at the edge of the river bank. An ernormous column of Mic-Hollestinian Glandelinians had got to the other side of the river at that point, and the Colonels Regiment didn't know they were there. After having dug themselves in, they blew down the line with shrapnell. Two hundred soldiers went out from the road with Captian Turns and a sergeant of the Signal Corps, to find the break and repair it. They came to the break, the sergeant climbed the pole, and they were all standing in the road when the Glandelinianscne nearest fired a volley into them. They were on the opposite side of the river. It was like opening a heavy fire acrosss the street. Sixteen of the christian soldiers were hit, and all the survivors jumped for cover quick, and retured returned the fire effectually. The sergeant was shot off the pole, mortally wounded. Several of the soldiers drag ged him back to cover at all risk, and then Captian Turns went out and climbed the pole. This christian regiment were cornered and outnumbered, abould twenty to one, they had to he have help and it was his duty to send for it if he could. But the Glandelinians concentrated their fire on him, but nevertheless he got to the top of the pole, and got hold of the wire before he was shot down, and when he fell he brought down both ends of the wire with h im. He was shot twice through the left leg, and once through the arm, and the fall knocked the wind out of him. There didn't seem to be any hope of getting help by telegraph, and a soldier was sent on foot to reach the christian position if he could. He started to run and was killed.. A second man was sent, and fell before he had gone three steps. A third was sent, and this time to go on a fast horse. He got about thirty yards, when both fell.. The captian himself decided to go. Meantime the whole regiment had been fighting desperately for an hour or so, and hadobrought down a whole platoon of glandelinians dead, and a whole drove wounded, but 5thhere were more to take their places and they keptttheir line of battle shrouded thick in smoke. The captian noticed his friend lieutenant Jones. He lay in a deep ditch about ten feet from him, wounded, but tapping the two ends of the wire together. It was possible to send a message that way, but no one not even he could tell whether it got through to general Evans or not, for the line might be cut in more than once one place. However the current did reach the spot, and in about ten minutes there came a full Brigade of the Fifteenth Infantry down the road on the double quik. quick. That howv however surprised the captian because for such a distance he had not expected results so soon. but the but the lieutenant had got his message through. Colonel Eldridge Rick sen of the Fifteenth, did not show ant sign of hal halting his men as Captian Brainer jumped out of his hiding place and ran down the road to meet him.The heavy bank of high grass was like a wall between them,and the river. Captian Brainer got behind it, stopped Colonel Ricksen and told him that the enemy was just acrosss the river in very strong force with artillery and machine guns noq now, and shooting very heavy.

and with murderous effect.He hulted the men, but he started to ou go out into the open with a pair of field glasses.The captian however said;
"Colonel don't for the love of Heaven go out there.Everybody but me has been hit---"but it was too late, for a bullet hit the colonel between the eyes before he could retreat from the open, and he dropped dead.

The Fifteenth after heavy losses scattered, and took cover in the bush opening a heavy fire.A few minutes Captian James Makebelieve came up with a battery of gatling guns. He started to walk on into the open to have a look(the gook), but the captian stopped him and told him the same thing he had told Colonel Ricksen, when both fell wounded at the same time. Col Lieutenant Eldridge Johns worked his way into the high grass.He brought the machine guns forward and opened up point blank on the Glandelinians across the river, but that failed to drive them off. for they only answered with a scathing fire, that near annihilated the christian gunners and killed the lieutenant. So severe was the fighting that no one could comprehend it, and at many spots the christian troops had been fighting bloody conflicts almost daily for five months to advance that far.
Along the river the enemy kept up the hottest fire.It was the most spectular conflict.But the christians reinforced, and supported by a teeming line of cannon, deployed out of their position, and in the face of that terrific fire swept across the river. At one christian captian did a fool and reckless stunt.He came down the road with a Regiment of the Thirteenth held in close formation, and he ran them right up to the muzzle of the Glandelinian cannon.The glandelinians touched the guns off.
Killed the captian and every one of the men at one discharge.A cloud of smoke swept over the whole christian line, and left a pile of dead and wounded.It was a hot battle, the christian were pr repulsed, and general Fernado Johnson was all shot to pieces, and carried away a prisoner by the enemy.

On October the Fifteenth all of the boy and girlscout regiments were requested by Violet and her sisters, to report to their own armies under general Vivian at Marco cino as fast as they could get there, as there had been two terr ific battles there recently and the situation made it so that their services werebadly needed.
They made the trip safily, arriving just after the battle of Marcocinio number two was recieving its finishing touch.

B THE BLOODY PANDORA CAMPAIGN

CHAPTER ONE STARTS WITH THE BLOODIEST CAMPAIGNS IN THE WHOLE WAR ENDING WITH DRIVE TWARD ARONBURG (CALVERNIA) AND THE FRIGHTFUL CARNAGE AT GLORINIA.

CHAPTER ONE

THE ADVANCE ON MARCOCINIA, AND BLOCKADE OF THE MC-CHIRTHERS MC-HOLMSTER AND ANGELINE RIVERS. FRIGHTFUL SLAUGHTER DURING T HE BATTLE OF ISLAND NUMBER TWENTY FIVE.

OCT

On ~~August~~ the twenty ninth general Vivian started a genral advance twardthe town of Marcocino ordering all the commanders to be on theiralmert in case of an attack.

It was coming on teard noon when general Vivian recieved a telegram from general Picknoll which had been brought in by one of picknolls swiftest mess engers. General Vivians face was seen to turn pale, when he read the note which ran as follows;

[redacted] Your excellency general Vivian.

We have had two desperate battles with the enemy un der Shoeman near Marcocnino and though I won the first I lost the second. Be on your guard for Shoeman is planning to advance monsterous divisions to strike your right flank. I'm doing the best I canbot have failed to stop them. Mdcnality has been torn by furious war and desolation.At the first of the second battle Shoemans right had been rolled up and displaced but suddenly the next morning he recieved reinforce ments and all my attacks only met with complete decimination. All of our battle flags has ben torn to shreds and are drenched in blood. The second battle had lasted four days the enemy cutt ing my right wing all to pieces and carrying all before them. My losses I cannot depect at as yet."

Your assistant. General Lemia Pik Picknell."

The right detail of this battle ran as follows;

"Picknell after his first victory against Shoe an in a desultory battle [redacted] advanced five miles southwest or of Purenish where these two conflicts had raged. Shoe Shoeman had recieved reinforcements, and suddenly made a desperate assault upon the center of Pik Picknells lines and while the Glandelinians captured the town of Horton other forces made a concentrationon Picknells ri t but was repulsed with tremenious slaughter. A furious counter charge was made in the afternoon and Shoemans left was rolled up. Aid however came under general Legf Legree and Picknell had all he could do to hold his own.

However as Shoeman could not regain the workeon his left he withdrew east ward. Picknell foll owed him but shoeman threatened Pi icknell and he had to a halt not far from Rosa and T opsynina. Here was the scene of frightful carnage.

Shoeman captured the town of T opsynina but lost five hundred and fifty six thousand three hundred and thirtyseven in that onslaught. The very plains was grey with the dea dead and wounded Glandelinians and nearly every battle flag was drenched in bloo d.

Picknell had repulsed the attack but a terrific concentration was made simultaneously on his right and center center and the batle raged all day with frighful fury. Whole divisions were crushed to fragments and brigades almost annihilated. Yet though he also repulsed this frightful on slaught with apall ing slaughter to the enemy Picknell had to withdraw from Rosa and T opsynina but the Angolinians burned these towns and set fire to the u jungles and prairies.

During the night Shoeman made a concentrating advance and on the next day engaged picknells whole line. All day until half past two picknell's line did not budge an inch but now all of Shoemans artillery was concentrated upon his lines and Picknell had to withdraw leaving millions of dead and wounded purple coats behind. The dead and wounded stretched away for scores of miles. The third day had ben a bloody one indeed and every tre in the vinicity was either pierced by millions of minnies of shattered frighful by a terrific shell fire. he fields seemed flaming red, charges went back and forth on both sides in titan throes, for hours column on crowding column, brigade shattering brigade, severly divisions and almostannihilating each other, and artillery on both sides roared with a deafen ing earsplitting warfare of hells titans The fury of the batle had started fires the joined the main one moving from Coderaine.

Shoeman was partly victorious on the third day until a turn happened which caused the annihilating of general Richard Tamerlines wing of one million men and of the wounding of their generals, Walter Jenson, Richard Tamerline, Shoeman hienze and the death of general Sanderlamendor and Angatommering serious loss for the Glandelinians and again shoeman was worsted with crushing losses on his center and right grand division. The next day Shoeman threatens picknell who made an attack himself but met o on thing repulse. Shoemans whole army toard three o'cloc O'Clock was attacking with might and main and Picknell repulsing every onnetted decimating every attacking force was about to drive Shoeman out of his position when shoemans left made a headlong attack and said the dreadful carnage crushed picknells right wing to fragments and drove the panic stricken survivors for miles capturing nearly a million prisoners, and many guns and lots of ammunition . JBicknells left and center was overwhelmed and hard pressed and general Legrow making a forced march t hrough Eva Burying decended upon general picknells flank driving the christians into indescribble confusion. The ot enemy in long lines fixed bayonet s and crushed into the demorilized and terror stricken masses and tard evening they were carrying all before themchanging the retreat into a total rout. At northern ruenink Picknell managed to set up a horrible chain of batteries and poured a regular hu hail of destruction upon the frenzied persuers cutting their whole line into fragments mowing tons of thousands per volley and checking them thus giving the christians time to rally and to repell the oncoming human waves, tearing one wave after another to pieces, capturings millions of prisoners and driving them back and holding them back untill night fall when Picknell man managed to retreat northward unhin dered by shoeman. Shoeman then exultant sent large force to make a flank movement upon general Vivian army a movement to which Pik Picknell had warned general Vivian.

WHAT FOLLOWED THE BATTLE OF PRUNIAH

The news had filled general Vivian with great anx anxiety indeed. He ordered general Henriquis St Clare to move with his forces toard the direction of t e adva ncing flanks and sent out a scouting party to watch out for Shoeman.The situation had become more critical than ever. Threatened on both sides, by the enemy and forests fires still burning general Vivian did not know what to do. He decided to Engage Manley again before any signs of the flankers came. All day there was hard pore marching many separate movements maneuvers, and petty battles by scores frightful forages, raids and desperate batt les with stubborn ground fires.

Toard the afternoon of August the last general Vivian fully directing the advance rode up to general Evans and said;

"General Evan's lead your forces through that large groove facing the southwest. I'm g oing to lay seige to Harmonsins as soon as I reach there for I'm bou bound to make this war shorter if possible. Put be on the alert for I fear Shoeman is Advancing."

"I'll do so s."Said Evans;"But ain't you going to send someboy somebody to meet Shoeman."?

"Yes I have as many men as I can spare so many men that I can spare hansons army. I have already given him orders to march , but I fear I'll never see him again for Shoeman is a terrible fighter and has a big army."And general vivian wiped his eyes.

"Well it is a blow to us."Said Evans;" Shoeman was ten to picknells one and overwhelmed him. But i I really believeit won'tbe pleasant for him to meet Hanson."

Int he mantime Hanson was making pra preparations to advance against hoemanand prevent him from turning vivians right. His leaving was a new sorrow to Violet and her as sisters but ge neral Vivian knowing their condition and the danger from the enemy in such a war refused under any circumstances to let them go. They bit bid Hanson goodbyewith many a tear and even feared within themselves that they would never se him no more. They reno realised thatthe war had assumed a seathing fury and that battles might rage in many places at once. Hanson started his march late at night the men advancing toard the direction of Pruniah. For general Vivian it was a long weary march toard Marcocin o and the weather was hot windy rainy and damp. The Angelinians had to advance through the swampy districts and to look out for the forest fires as well as the foe. Violet and her sisters were closely guarded by the men for man many feared that the Glandelinians would get them this time as they were so near. Violet and her sisters were drenched by the rain and suf'ered fsome from the hot atmosphere of the swamps . How they wished that the war was over. They remembered of the new horror which was starting. Christian children were being sold from one place to another, and they had foolishly forgotten to tell general Vivian. It was too late for they could not get to the him now. But general Vivian did know of it. For Eva had told him.

He knew that the child slave trade had been started to spite the Angelinian govern me nt and he considered these child slave trades worse than piracy. But the child slave trade was just assyst ematic in the country of Calverinia and its heart breaks and its horrors never can they be told corre ctly.Throughout al l t he all that rouble I have given only a faijt faint shadow, a dim picture of the anglish and dispair that were for the whole time the war began riving hundreds of thousands of hearts, shattering mulitudes of christan families and driving the helpless and sensoitive race of Calverinian in hibatants t o such frenzy of despair that all of the Calverinian rose up in rop rebellion and joined the christian armies to help drive the Glandelinian invaders out and revenge the missy caused to he mil millions of children. This accursed traffic had driven even thousands of mothers from frenzy and delirium to murder their children and themselves to seek in death a shelter from woes more dreaded than death. Nothing cd oftragedycan be written , can be spoken, can be conceived that qu equalled such frightful slavery of christian children/ whom Christ had loved so much, and not only because they were christians and declared enemies of Glandelinia, but because they were a nuisance to the world , as Glandelinia said.

CHAPTER XV

THE BATTLE OF [illegible] BAY.

Another attempt in the meantime was being made to capture the city of Vivin vivian Wickey by sea. Admeral Meldon and chief or rear Admeral Zimmermann decided to make this undertaking with one thousand of the biggest ships and within thre days the whole squadron was well under way. To the Starboard bow land the land baterias of the en emy.With all the guns well aimed and the decks cleared for action the leading ships carrying Meldon and Zimmermann began to show her real speed raising the foam on her weather low nearly as high as the on t's head and over her lee-bulwarks the froth rushing swiftly past.

In an en e encounter with a great Glandelinian sloop or frigate many of the Glandelinians managed to board the flagship and these graycoats with a torrent of profanity and vile wordsfrom their lips made a fierce attack but thechristian sailors finally drove them off, the sloop was set on fire and then the fleet proceeded on its way. James a disguised and furious Glandelinian was at work with the other sailors washing down and scrubbing the deksand a cabin boy a pale delicate little lad came by James order to bring a glass of grog. The deck was wet and slippery and as he approached the disguised landelinian with the glass of Oror grog on a tray the litt le lad slipped and the glass fell and broke upon the deck.

James flew u into a rage, the frightened cabin boy saying;

"I could not help it.The deck is slippery and I did not mean to break it."

"YOU will answer me back will you you spaun."Roared James an d dashed at the lad who screamedin fright and dealt him a terrible b blow on the temple with his great fist.The little boy fell like a log. Thernocal was about to kick the prostrate lad when a l large heavily built sailor sprang upon him.

"You brute you coward."He shouted seizing James by the throat and hurling him away. But instantly the bully came at him nt the sailor furiously bu but recieved a telling blow under the right ear. Down went James with a crash , but he sprng up again, and blinded by rage he rushed for the sailor like a mad bull and by a quick hard shove sent hi sprawling several feet acroos the decks.

But at this moment admiral Meldon and the first mate who had come on deck hurled themselves upon James. Then while he made a fierce struggle the sailor staggered to his feet and also attacked the Glandelinian who was thrown to his feet to the deck. Several of the crew who were also du disguised Glandelinians came rushing up, there being threteningmurmurs, all heads looking at a sailor whose name was boothead as if for orders, but he shook his head negatively and those very near him heard him whisper;

"The time to sti strike ain't qu quite come yet."

Admiral Meldon and the other christian crews drew their pistols as they saw the t hreatening atidue of the men and forwith made them prisoners before they knew it.

"Get back to your quarters while we will bind you hand and foot. T he whole lot of you are disguised Glandelinians and I knew it all the time and watched for this chance to take you all prisoners. Mr Jackson you will see that all of these rascals are put in ir irons and made an example of andpunished before the christian crew on the charge of spies on board ship. And this James will be executed for the murder of the helpless child." Cried the admiral.

James had recieved a blow which had stunned him and although he was a young giant inphysical strength the an sliors managed to hold him down till the boatswann whom the admiral ordered to do sobrought the handcuffs. The manacles were fastened upon his wrists and then he was allowed to get up on his fe t. The admiral sneered at him.

A little later James was thrown into a dark evil smelling apartement with the rest of his evil followers and the door waslocked upon them!

Meanwhile serios seriour trouble was brwwing which threatened soon t o tranf transform the scene on one of the worst conflicts between two squadron of ships ever seen and int o a scene of bloodshed and horror. T he disguised Glandelinians hated the Angelinians h and had come on board to prevent the christians from worsting the landelinian fleets at all costs..They also hated the admiral for justly punishing James and would have ben ripe open for mun mutney had they not be arrested with him.

It was during the night when the ships were passing throug through Wickey Bay a small inlet of water seventeen miles wide and fourt y miles long that the admiral heard the sound of queer whistles and four large black craft were glinding tward the Angelinian ships showing only a single light crowed with as villianious a looking set of Glandelinian sailors as if s ever scuttled a ship. They were the Glandelinin fleet moving forward to give battle. battle. Meldon sprang to the rail as he heard the sound of far distant firing , and shouted;

"Pipe all hands to the guns. Let every man stand ready to fight .

A sudden flash of guns shooted like lightning w from a clouded sj sky u illumined the shi sides of the Glandelinian ships followed by a terrille deafening roar and al the masts of three of the christian ships came down by the board, shells crashed upon the decks bursting, to tearing holes in the floor damaging the cabinsand blowing up one of the magizines of the ships.

All was confusion and alarm on the ships but on the flagship admiral Meldon shouted;

"We will have to fight for it now. God help us now for the enemyes ships v over whelm us. We will have to fight w for we can hop e hope no mercy if we do give in."A

A coldperspiration broke out all over him as he thought of the fate of giving in without a fight. One of the Angelinian frigate frigates had ben overtaken by a glandel Glandelinin frigate and all men there were com e compelled to p prepare to repel boarders, the glandelinians of the frigate numbering ninty odd men. The christian ors were out outnumbered for to one. Sheets of flame and smoke became to shoot along the bows of the ships of both sides shaping at tijes like fiery serpen ts. Heavy white clouds rose from the terrific gun fire and indeed any one could have been astonished at the growth of the battle coming on. And from the concussion og of the gunnery the water began to moan in a way never hard before. The crew of the Angelinian frigates fought desparately to repel the Glandelinian s but the Glandelinian sailors soon came swarming upon the decks. Even now guns began to open from the distant shoresand the Angalinian admiral realized that he was in a great fix. Terrific was t the strife that followed, a hand to hand battle with cutlasses boarding pikes and pistols. Many of the crew of the Angelinian frigates were beaten back and massacred ruthlessly. The captain of one of the frigates already burning was holding the head of the companionway along against half a dozen Glandelinians fighting with all the fury of despair mending to lay down his life before the wreches should ascend to the quarters and probably set fire to the ship or sink ther. Clash, clash, clash sounded the cling og steel on steel as Mr ple captian cut at one of the Glandelinian chiefs meeting the skillfully wailed blade of the other at each stroke. O All of a sudden another strange dull booming broke above the roar of other guns and then there came a rolling crahs of gunnery that was appalling, and before the combatants were aware all the mats and sails crashed to the deck killing and injuring many fire broke loose, the bow of the ships sank immediately a terrible storm of dangerous projectiles carrying all before it. The combatants all of them were swept overboard with tons of wreckage the captian being thrown into the companion way a deluge of water poring over him an d then another shell storm blew the ship t up.

The roar of battle itself had never been so terrific before at leastbetween two fiercely battling fleets. It was thrilling in comparison to the mighty roar of a hundred thousand Niagaras. The whole line of christian battle ships plunged forward a s through an ocean of snowy white foam every shi p being l outlined in a terrific fire of big gun s. Explsocions by the hundreds tore the shore line like flashes of volcanic eruptions and seven thousand A Glandelinians on the shorewere swept into iterninty interninty by one single explosign of a shell. Every moment shells dashed down everything on the ships of the Glandelinian fe fleet in avalanches of destruction masts went down cabins were broken gun turrets blown up an d ships sunk by tens every minute.

All seemed lost for the Glandelinian fleet for the gunnery of the Angelinian fleet was terrific. An hour of this drama or of horror passed and seven six hundred Glandelinian ships were su sunk, the shore lines seemed sheated in blazing fire reaching a thousand feet in the sky as it seemed wave after wave of flame pouring through immense cloud pilliars while the whole shoreline was in a volcano of flame an and din was th thou thousands of guns let loose their storm of shells.

The whole sea was covered with wreckage and dead fishes, some parts of the shoreline where fortifications were turning was hidden in undulating sheets sheets of flame, and now forts Gedernine and the others joined inwith a singsong clamor heard for hundreds of miles out to sea. The masts of many christian battle ships had went overboard with the tearing away of rigging, the carnage seemed to engulf everything around, the christian gun fire seeming to carry all before it.

The merciless storm of shells hovered over the thundering fortifications with a salvoes of horrible explosions redding the sky with their flashes, and in the midst of all the roaring storm of gunfire, the seething roari g sea of flames, the remaining fortificati s contin ued to respond and withi within eight hours of action the whole Angelinian fell fleet having practically annihilated one of the main Glandelinian fleets was so steaming in tward Forts Cedernine and St Phillip opposite thre thousand other ships having joined one thousand being Abbieannian warships. The combined fleets made a terrific assault, and so on the Abbieannian fleet be being un der a cross fire met complete annihilation, with all on board the ships lost but the surviving fleets continued the fierce bombardment, even w while a heavy sea was raging. The huge waves pounded against the sides of the ships making them tremble from stern to stern. Three other christian ships were floating delrelicts amid the tremendous roaring of the battle and heavy seas the ind having changed to the south. Other christian fleets however were also coming on and now large tran s port ships landed overwhelming numbers of Angelinians with the intention to attack general Mushheads Glandelinians who were opening fire with long lines of batteries whs whose roar seemed to bring down ruins in towns scores of miles away.

THE FIERCE FIGHTING FOR ISLAND NUMBER TWENTY FIVE.

General Mushhead s rang to his feet and suddenly to the sur surprise to of of his officers clapped a glass to his eyes, and in an instant later removed it wiped his eyes and the glasses and then looked through them in the same manner again and held it long and steadily.

"I believe its twenty divisions of christians. There is a string of t transport ships in the distance supported by the fire of the christian warships and they are als opening fire upon us."

The general ordering his cannons in action resolved to watch those twenty divisions which as they became more plainer to him proved to be Angelinians of the fiercest main. They were headed right for the stockades a mile in front of the main fortifications which were still thundering fiercely.

The cannons a thousand of them in number were opening upo n the advancing columns but though the storm of shells and canister tore and mangled them frightfully they could not stop the m. We thunder of other batteries could not be heard.

"They are those christian dogs trying once more to take Mc-Whirther or Vivian Wickey."Said the Glandelinian general;"T hey will throw themselves against our lines in full force, and so we will have to concentrate as much infantry as possible ."

Followed by the excited Glandelinian f infantry lines the general hastened down most of the gray lines at once concealing themselves for the purpose of open ing for fire upon them. Then general ushhead and his first divisions reached the unoccupied line of works the shouts of the Angelinians was simply appalling to hear while a the ships were stiell roaring in a to mpest of cannonading enough to tear the earth asunde to which Kuaffers batt eries were doinf doin g their best to respond he divisions were now within musket shot r nge.

"It won't do to let them run over me."Exclaimed Mushhead spring up followed by the rest and holding their double barrelled muskets ready for instant use."We will throw ourseves low and givethem a good hot volley."

The first column of Angelinians at the sudden sheet of flame darting along the Fre Mason line was torn to fragments the survivors recoiling in smal knots. The Glandelinian general quickly drew his revolver. Other divisions were still coming on with a yell. Again and again the chr Clandelinian infantry streamed with fire the general fired rounds of ammunition too great to be believed the noise of the firing being fairly earsplitting and vibrating back over the hills and one a entire divisi ion of Angelinians l melted away with on another advan ced part of Angelinians threw up theirr arms and fell prone to t the ground fairly riddled by buckshot canister musket balls and torn and mangled and even desenbowled by shells. Five thousand of the other divisions of Angelinians had went down mangled and bleeding simultaneously and two generals HenryDarger and Whillian Schloeder had been mortally wounded. The survivors yelled in rage and pain and Mushhead rising to give the Angelinians a few pistol shots had his head pierced by a bullet and he fell dead. With rage With yells of rage and confusion the surviving christian columns continued on paving their line of advan ce with dead and wounded. Other forces of Glandelinians un der Rowlan d advanced up the hills to oppose the christians assaulting with devilish fury at the left the Glandelinians no sooner occupying the hills when the christians surged upon them like a long and mighty wave in purple.A huge fierce looking christian general leading the assailants whose name was Logan Phelan fell severely wounded. Rowland was pierced by a bayonet while a tumult of bayonets ensued all along the line mingled with the ring of sabres and pikes and the crashes of musket butts against musket butts while shots by thousands were firedpoj point blank.

Rowlnd Henderson of the Glandelinians pointed his pistol at an Angelinian officer but lang went the christian officers gunand h Henderson rolled on the ground with a dozen shots in his breast at which the Angelinians yelled defiance and pressed on a perfect wall of bristling bayonets and pikes. The Glandelinians were in some confusion but their crippled and hard prr pressed lines were reinforced and ralli ed andon the christian side general Redlings, Appeal and Colonial leaped about screaming with pain each having recieved a shot or two. General Russel Henryson on the side of the landelinian fel' severely wounded and a withering fire was now poured upon them by the christians who was endeavoring to thi take this place called Island Twenty five . The glandelinians themselves unecillessly poured the fatal buckshot and canister into the christian lines crushing the line to fragments and soon the whole column mangled and shattered went back the attack being abandoned at this point.

A deafening earsplitting ro roar of musketry and cannon came from other seried lines of batt le, and here big christian forces had surged forward and terrific hand to hand fights ensued. The Angelinians met with great resistance but in less than twenty minutes only one ao quarter of the gray lin e was left while only ten thirds of the christians had been mowed down. The Angelinians poured upon the surviving columns of glandelinians endeavoring to fish finish the fight but the line gradually gave way after a sudden discharge of musketry, and thousands wereknocked on the heads with musket butts, or bayoneted through the heart as they turned in flight the Angelinians persuing bringing down scores at every second. Another glandelinian general by the name of Henry Rowland was in dager danger of being hem ed in and fired among the persuing Angelinians with both barrels of his gun creating something like a wholesale slaughter, but on they came fast and furious and he himself fell mortal y wounded.

General Rowslanding and his staff after emptying both o their guns in quick succession and following it up with six more, and movi mowing down half a hundred Angelinians, were shot down themselves simultaneuley by other christians. General Reeves Crowley another glandelinian officer fired at the Angelinians and continued to give them dosens of pistols shots untill he was also brought down the [illegible] continueing to fire in dismay. General Standard Remingtonia also leveled his gun at one of the Angelinian leaders and fired the entire charge intering his head and blowing off about half of it, but Remingt onia also felt a shell laying him low. The r rush of the ferocious avengers was something terrific the christians sweeping everything before them. When the glandelinians who wererein this confusion reached their seconf second line of works the Angelinians were there too so they could not get into their trenches in si sufficient numbers to do any more firing and terrific was the combat hand to hand thousands upon thousands being slain in one minute so fierce was the fighting. Hearing all the shoot ing and clatter of firearms so and confused booming of cannons by thousands more and more glandelinians swarmed to the rescued from the reserved lines to joj join in thr heavy fightinf. Thousands of landelinians of the line driven in confuio confusion had ran out of ammunition and h rled stones and sticks at the Angelinians.

General Golden threw fifty of his brigades into column formation an d marched them soldily against the ever increasing numbers of Angelinians who now now assembled twenty or thirtymillion strong to tryand check the overwhelming number if possible.

Whole lines of Fre Masons scores of miles long were wheeled in flame and smoke the Angelinians going down like grass officer and all, but the Angelinians did not break into confusion the christians pushing on with a steady pressure that showed plainly what admirable soldiers they were. They kept firing horrible storms of volleys which the glandelinians did their best to return and now the landelinian center began to give way leaving two hundred and ff fifty thousand dead and five times as many wou d wounded in two hours assa ult making a total of I,50[illegible],000 I,500,000.

The Angelinians charged during the worse of the conflic conflict and confusion and with unbroken lines sweeping the whole center and the other wings before them slaying thousands withtheir bayonets. Firing indeed seemed useless against a solid was wall of bayonets many miles long but the glandelinians being quickly reinforced steadily rallied and prepared to stand untill the main bat erdes of the forts could bring a stop to the christian advance.

A furious counter charge was made and though their gray lines were swept in and torn with a storm of minnies and five hundred officers lay prostrated in the tropical grass the ch rge was successful the Angelinians breaking into confusion and falling back on themain body spreading the confusion as they went.

"Charge ." Screamed general Bernard Pussel, and tg then his voice was silenced forever as he and generals Vocation, Bé Ryan Congregation and Gobbon s fell w killed simultaneously, as his onrushing glandelinian fo faced a storm of fir fire that r tore their lines frightfully. However the gray li es with bayonets and pikes bristling like a wall moved forward in an unbroken line and it was a terible sight to see as the two l lines unitgd on the summits of the hills in wi writhing twisting suring masses, but the landelinians were stil successful and with triumphant yells pushed on, though the christian center and right wing still remained firm, pouri ng fosrce fierce sheets of canister among the suring writhing lines in grat gray.

"Charge." ried general Tyckoff "Charge the chrisians t heir lines must be forced and those who fall back will be put to death."

The glandelinians tried to press forward in solid bodies with their bayonets , and such a w wall of bristling bayonets the Angelinins had never seen before but still they remained firm and yelled defiance.

The glandelininshaving lost millions since the fighting began loosing more than a million in his counter charge. The Angelinians had concentrated in stronger and stronger numbers six sixty thousand of them going down at once along one point presenting a solid line manyldeep wit with bristling walls of bayonets ten feet in front of them. Such a sight filled the glandelinians with dismay and now their right wing was swept back like chaff before the wind with the loss of four hundred and fifty thousand more Wyckoff bring i up bringing up the rear the panic stricken glandelinians.

The left wing of the glandelinians were unprepared for the bristling wall of bayonets that swept down upon them with such irresistible force, so they were compelled to retreat leaving six hundred and fifty six thousand dead and three times that many wounded behind, but untill they were rallied by the supporting new arivals. In the mountino the main bodies of the Angelinians had come upon other parts of the Pasonic lines under cover of a heavy fire from the ships forcing a crossing of the islandin the face of Dunlaps glandelinians infantry lines and storing batteries, the glandelinians occupying a strong line of defense on the high ground.

Seeing this danger and wounded himself Wyckoff was forced to withdrrr to withdraw. The Angelinians under general Rowland awson and Henry Jones succeeded in crossing but lost heavy in men and officers in making some heroci heroc heroic and desperate assaults while general Bantushere Angelinians prussed forward in their advance upon a stone wall and here desperate fighting occured.

Bayonets and sabres and pikes by hundreds of thousands were crossed in a tumultious mortal combat and it was aterrible scene for a few minutes. The surperior number of Angelinians soon over ocame the glandelinian defenders howeverthe bri held the their position with greattenacity. They had been able to load and discharge their firearms one hundred times into the advancing christian lines tearing them to pieces, the same being bbeing down done with the batt eries of artillery, the guns were fiefired a hundred times in awful scathing broadsides and even then though the surging surviving lined of christians managed to drive back the foe they could not under any conditions capture the guns which were withdrawn by the art illery men who fought with ramrods, weapons of every descripton and even bit and pulled the hair of their assailants and scratched thier eyes out,. As the mangled and torn remnants of christian lines swept f over the fortifications to the surprise of all an overwhelming force of glandelinians suddenly appeared to the right and the bat le battle of Island number twenty five was fought over by the troops chargingback and fo- forth presenting a spectacle of horror without a paral l parallel.

During all this time the glandelinian fire was so terrific that all the wood lands of the islands were shattered by the st storm of shells minnies and can ister thousands of palm trees were cut down per hour by minnie balls alone, and scores of solid oaks thirty two inches in diameter was cut down intirely by the enemy's fire during the fierce engagment. Scores of batteries attempting to get into action were disabled amid a storming volcano of flame and din and thrown into a disrdered mass by all the drivers and horses being killed and the bodies of the men who fell j killed or wounded on the rampard were riddled by hundreds of bullets and cut up by canister.

The ground was so completely covered by the dead and wounded that it was impossibleto walk over it without stepping on mens bodies and the sm ke of musketry and artillery was like a pall. The onset of the Angelinians w was so terrific that at last the glandelinians were forced to fall back across the valley while simultaneously a glandelinian battery of ten thousand guns posted on a hill of ridges on the other side of the valley opened on the charging or christians. It was indeed a complete surprise and several of the main columns badly mangled were broken and scattered by the concentrated art illery fire, and within twenty minutes eighteen hundred and ninty eight thousand Angelinians fell before the continuous blast of art illery. The very extensive forests of palm trees seemed likely to fall before the fire of the glandelinians a hundred thousand shots per hour being fired and as the massive lines of fresh Angelinian forces swarmed down the slopes they were cut and torn to shreds. Many thousands of the Angelinians were pinioned to the earth by falling trees or branches. For eighteen minutes the brave glandelinian infantry lines held their ground hoping to advance but the western hilld bristled with lines of moving bayonets.

The Angelinians however had no further thought to attack the glandelinians before such a terrific storm of musketry and artillery fire , but t their leaders stonly ordered them on. General Rowlandines fresh forces of b christians were the first to cross the valley the glandelinians having lost sixten hundred thousand in retreating from the last line in front of the valley. Rowlandine was quickly followed on the right by Groseon and Malvernine and allion in the center

Jones quickly reforming his divisions and joining in the charge which became more like a bloody persuit. The Glandelinian artillery had ceased firing and thechristians gave cheers and continued to dash forward firing volley after volley upon be fugitives who ral lied behind Jollines battaries and Heligons division brigades in the narrow skirt of palm timber. The christian lije advanced and took possessoion of the ground from which the hottest fire had ensued a few minutes before Jollion and Heligon being killed/ Rowlandine of the christian side being wounded with the deaths of Jones, wounding of Rowland Lawson and also of the wounding od of Pantusher.

Dunlap on the Glandelinian side was killed. As the Glandelinians broke and fled under the iron storm of the christian guns Baldwinsonia hat ery of Glandelinian cannon alone stood its ground in the deserted field. General Baldwinsonia was so intent on smashing his foes that he took no heed at all of thefact that the rest of the Glandelinian troops had retired under his orders, the guns a thousand in number and all machine guns being pushed forward by hand and again and again the battery poured a perfect sheet of canister into the christian lines tearing one lin e after another down in killed and wounded. While this handsome Landelinian general sat his horse and urged his men to keep their guns goinf goj going his young assistant general Glainsburg stuck to his own run va veliantly in loading and firing for further od orders and kept it up even when the christians were so close that he could see their contorted faces.

Suddenly general Baldwinsonia tumbled dead from his horse bur even after that his young assistanc assistant who was not far from his dead comrade continued t to serve his gun. Then as the christian lines lurched forward with fixed bayonets the slender Glandelinian general saw that he was alone almost in the field with his dead old comrade beside him. He fired three more charges with great effect and then mountih mounting his horse galloped away with the cheers f of the christians ringing in his ears. He was the last Landelinian to leave the field and when he had ridden fifty yards he looked back and saw the Angolinian flags already fastened on the guns one of the gl flags fastened on the carriage of his own gun.

The A gelinians in the meantime were driving to Glandelinians under Wayman Seamenn who was wounded in front of the lower line of rifle pits so rapidly following them that the Landelinian and christian troops went over the lines of works simultaneously, many Landelinians being captured and sent to the rear under the fire of their own comrades higher up on the sal sailents.

Those who were not captured retreated but were between friends and foe and persuers which caused the enemy to fire high to avoid killing their own men. On that occasion the christian soldiers nearest the enemy were in the saftest position. Without waiting for further od ordersor stopping to reform the christian troops pressed on dashing over the sec second line of works and making for the saiconf. The fire along the Masonic line was terrific, cannon ans musk musket balls filling theair. The pursuit continued untill the cest was gained and soo soon the brave christians were climbing over the Glandelinian barrier at fi different pointe, the retreat f the enemy being precipiatat precipitate and the panic so great that Hansen and has Landelinian officers lost contrl control of his men. Many were captured and thousands threw away their arms in their flight.

In the meantime during the batle of Marcocino w whihe which raged Violet and her sisters had an experience during th this battle that they never forgot. T hough they had not taken part in any of the scouting they had been closers to the scene that safeand F Eva who had been with them had a narrow escape from a shell. They had rec rescued her but Jennie had ben bruised by a bad fall caused by a shell con cussion.

When Violet and her sisters drew her out of range their attention was atracted to an an unusual number of Glandelinians who were pouring down the sides of a ridge right tward them.

"Look up there."Said Eva;"There is strange men coming down tward us. We had better get away before those graycoats get us again."

For about two minutes more and more torrents of Landelinians continued to pour down and they a all moved in the same direction right tward them. Many hundreds of big shells roared in explosions high above the big trees and they left large clouds of smoke he effe ct being the same as if millions of fireworks were in action. Eva wondered what they were going to do for this sight of so many men running down wes unusual to her. The volume of men in graybecame greater t e sight being alarming to Violet and her sisters. All t t he the time their numbers were becoming greater.

"I wonder what is going on there.?"Said Eva;"They seem to come right tward us."

Violet and her sisters did not answer for as they watched this scene they were becoming quite uneasy, for there was no telling tward where they were coming. In less time than it takes to tell Violet and her sisters soon discovered tht that these Landelinians were comingin divisions in an ate mpt to make a flank movement upon the apparent victorious christian forces. The suspence was awful.

The great mulitude of Glandelinians seemed to pause a while in their precipitate rush, a long line of white smoke appeared along their lines mingled with a crawling of musketry enough to blind you, and then swep on again heading directly for the little girls as the they came. ll of sudden scores of shells began to fall among them all at one time and all the trees in their direction seemed to dissolve into smoke n and fire and graycoats fell by thousands Eva was spellbound by this sight an and terrible was the roar of musketry in the distance mingled with the deep boom of cannons and shells went zizaging here and there among the graycoats making gaps as they exploded o quickly were the Glandelinians rushing forward that it was useles for violet and her sisters to run even in three directions in an effort to get away, and they could do nothing else but lay down in the high grass behin d a line of rocks and take their chances.

As the Glandelinians started to rush on in the formation of wedges Violet and her sisters heard a strange roaring sound far behind them, faint at first, but getting louder and louder.The Landelinians came nearer then all of a sudden their whole line seemed bathed in clouds of smoke followed by a thunderous roar of musketry which became one general discharge.

"Lie low."Whispered Violet to Eva who was about to rise to see what made the uproar ;" The Glandelinians are f firing now and you are liable to be shot."

Nearer and nearer rushed the Glandelinians now yelling like demons and Violet and her sisters held their breath in an agony of suspense. Suddenly there was a long line of earsplitting detonations among the Glandelinians and to Evas horror there were shrieks of pain an and terror thousands upon thousands going down mangled an f and bleeding.

"If any of those shells hit us we will be killed."Thought Violet in disp despair.

The assaulting Landelinians were now quite close and so terrible became the te mpest of bullets from their shot guns that it became utterly impossible for the little girls to move without being hit.

The terrible uproar along the line of graycoats graycoats anf in the far distance became so terrific that Eva was frigye frightened for the first time in her l f life. In one second the gray line had become like a moving wall and another storm of explosions tore and rent the line frightfully. One shell exploded on top of the rocks showering fragments in all directions, but fortunately fortunately Violet and her sisters were not hurt, but Eva was scared.

"Gracious "Gracious goodness they are packing themselves tward these rocks."Said Violet;"U

"Oh god a Almighty please save us."Pleaded Eva.

Violet and her sisters could scarcely make out her words above the din of the approaching peril. It indeed was awful to see them lying there seemingly helpless and feel that there was no chance to escape from the ferocious Free Masons. They all feared that they were doomed, and th they bowed their heads in their am arms and waited for the end. Nothing could check t the onrushing Glandelinians who were swarming tward the rocks in overwhelming numbers.

Shells were exploding everywhere and the air was filled with a deafening din such as the r roar of hundreds of cannon all at once while the hiss of canister showers terrified the little girls all the more and soon they found themselves e inveloped in thick clouds of powder smoke. There was a crash thatshook the groundand Violet and her sisters found themselves showered with grass dirt and branches of tre trees while black clouds of smoke almost stifled them. The upheavel was terrific and now there was sounds of rushing bodies, thousands of Glandelinians dropping across the top of the stone wall and lying still several dropping among violet and her sisters one almost falling on Eva .

THE BATTLE OF MANSFIELD ~~OCTOBER~~ 30TH

IT

There was the sound of terrific hand to hand fightingnear thelittle girls but nothing could hardlybe seen s the smoke inveloped everything. The little girls now belived that their peril was gonce gone believing that they had escaped ya narrow margin.

But bodies were dropping fast about themand all of asudden a man tippted over litle Eva and fell sprawling.He staggered to his feet and knowing that it was something soft that had tripped him the gray coat crept c,o e, close to investigate.Jennie saw him coming and she realized that she must shoot him or he might kill ker her and her sisters without mercy.

She waited untill he was within close rangwhen was surprised to see another graycoat standing overher ready to strike. Jumping aside she tripped over Violet and lurched against the landelinian tripping the rascal who tripped or fell with a crash. In falling Jennie saw a bayonet decending for her breast. She struck it aside with the but of he ps to pistol an and saw in the face of the man, that the Glandelinian was more cruel and treacherious than the worse snake for besides the frightfullness of his looks he was very ferocious in actions.

Her sisters went to Jennies aid and being held at bay the Glandelinians fought with arralling fury.

What made him still more to be dreaded was theextraordinary quickness of his movements for he dodgedevet every blow that Jennies sisters struk struck at him and struck back beforehis nearest enemy had time to recover , knocing n knocking Angeline to the ground."

Violet and Joice foundto their horror that they had forgotten to arm themselves and as the other Glandelinians rushed tward them they picked up rocks and sicks hurling them atthe Glandelinians in an evdeavor to stop them but this had only the effectof still further enraging the glandelinians and they now atacked the little girls relentlessly. Violet nd Joice managed to run behind a rock when their assailant was not looking but another glandelinian with a loud yell rushed atJennie trying to strike her down with thebutt of his musket. Jennie dodged and struck out widly to right and left with a long stick h she had pci pickedup, but she didnot ha m the Glandelinian except to rouse him to still greater fury. Violet and Joice could hear the rascal striking continously everywhereit seemed to them swearing wih rage meanwhile the thud of his blows sounding loud a ainst the hrd hard rocks....

Violet slashed about widlywith the branch of a tre expecting every moment to fe l a blow and the rascals hands on her neck. All the other Glandelinians were far from here y this time and the little girls realized theinention of their assailants and they were ab t about to scream for help when they heard a litle tree snap ly the roots... The glandelinian who was striking furiously at Jenie had landed his musket again at a small tree the force of the blow sending it crashing ow down.

The nnoise of the snapping tree caused Violet to know where the awful Glandelinian was,, and jumping on top of the rock, she took a flying leap on the other side only to be face to face wit h the glandelinian. She gace gave a ter ified scream but as he grabbed VioletJennie mn managed to creep up behind him and struck him on the head withher psitols butt. He went down with a thud and seeing thir chance they helped Angeline to rise to her feet and all seven hurried for the christian lines and reached it in the i nick of time for a hundred glandelinians appeared and opened fire upon hem.

K In the meantime the assaults of the Glandelinians was something terrific. Every now and thn then though a wave of men hh higher than its fellow wave would sweep u againstthe chi's christian lines with a mighty rush so terrible that it se med im possible for any man to stand againstthey would be river to pieces mangled and hurled back by the furious christina christian cannon fire.

The little girls had no socner went behind the breastworks of the christi christian line when a big screaming shouting wave of men ten miles long poured avoe the works there was a terrific clatter of musket butts tumult of bayonets and 5thousands went sprawling. Column after column of the christian were cut down before the seemingly irrestible rush of Glandelinians and the little girls were indeed terrified for thousands of glandelinians were swarming tward them,. The little girls staggered to their feet while a monsterous wave of men poured over the other lines of works amid a terific blinding crash of firearms and cannon which stunned them, while another point of this wave came smo smoking and roaring tward the retreating christians a wall of men nearly eighteen miles long, thousands of the Angelinians going down helpless with their wounds, the christians being helpless to withstand the rush of gray, and fearful losses occured.

Thousands of Glandelinians and even Angelinians rolled rolled over and over in death struggles, gasping , swearing, cursing and uttering shouts , gasping and sputtering. The right grand divis division of this line had been turned by the terrific Glandelinian assault the Glandelinians being victorious, the christian line being well night exhausted and out of am unition the christians being ingulfed by the assaulting columns . The two battle lies inded were terribly agaid, and the onslaught had now become so so fierce that the whole christian line a' this point had given way, the whole batle lie being strown by falling tranches and leaves torn off by the storm of bullets.

The weather it itself was terribly rough the high wind df driving the smoke of musketry away and so ain was quite certin for every man the slaughter thus being terrible v Viole and her sisters who had escaped the maelstome of human beings glanced suspiciously around them feeling anxious and feverish. The roar of distant cannon was tremendous now, and one line of christians being hard pressed by monsterous waves of men almost shaped like a figure i eight. She and her sisters kept on goinf going through a smouldering stretch of woods for quite a long time after the retreating christian lines and it seemed to them that it was merely a part of an interrupted dream that they heard despite the roaring of the wind the crash of battle, and the Bighoong of burst ing shells, a muffled but regular sound in the direction of the overhanging vegetation which boraded the wood woodland and a large shell swept phin. Gradually the lil little girls understood that it was the noise of advancing batteries of artillery to their right, probably for the christian lines still holding their ground. They realized their danger instantly for they were in front of these guns coming up and now at any moment a storm of canister aimed at the enemy far behind them would kill them outright. S The little girls quickly sprang across a large spr bridgeand seing christian forces appeared throu h a lne of woods whisled to the general in the lead, and the little girls were immediately taken out of the way just at the mem moment that the guns let loose with a hollish roar.

Everyone of theinfnty men kept perfectly still or crouching behind the high breastworks, and by their own guns ready to open broadsides at a single command. As the Angelinians made these preparations the advancing wave of men were advancing nearer and nearer, general Meldon Zimmermann hi being behin d a long stone wall withhis Abyyssinkilians and soon he saw one after another four monsterous waves of grayfo greycoats shoot out from behind the stretch of forest and overhanging trees and move furiously and with tremendous noise and fury tward his own lines directly.

Then all at oncehe saw the swift waves of more than a dozen other great column s of Glandelinians coming tward other points of the christian lines, and from their advanc ing lines sheets of flame and smoke suddenly appeared followed by the roll of heavy musketry fire. Meldon Zimmermann indeed feared that his lines could not withstand such a tidal wave of humanity but just then the same he had brought up all his available p parks of gatlling guns,and these were played in rw readiness to mow down th the heavy swells of men as soon as the came within rag range, and soon from all of thesegathling gunsthere came a storm of canisterand three of the mos monsterous waves of men creened into dead and wounded. The surviving Glandelinians being h all Zimmanians yelli yelled like demons and Meldon recognised them by their familiar voices. The Angelinian infantry now let loose their hell of musketry fire pouring broadside after broadside miles long at once tearing fourteen of the monsterous waves to mre fragments, but all this horrible execution did litle good and soon the surviving columns united intp t into one long wave and came surin surging on with yells wi which rose above the roar of musketry and cannon Violet and her sisters being appal appalled by the din.

Meanwhile one of the the wings of this large heavy line in gray came on McMeldons line of batteries with a rush like a tidal wave, the guns let loose a dic discharge which made a wall of smoke despite the blustering in wind but before the guns could be discharged again ,the Glandelinin troops rushed among them cutting down the gunners and capturing the artillery turned the guns on their solid an enemys lines cutting them to pieces with a frightful storm of solid shot canister and grape.

The rest of the line still holding were now firing better with their canno cannos cannons and musketry but against such odds they seemed to have little chance and general Meldon being killed they were thrown into confusion. Gen eral Feidlingson also had his hands full . He watched the approach of the monsterous waves of Glandelinians coming to assault his lines with anxious eyes. The shock soon came with three simultaneous discharges of musketry and cannon as to tear the Glandelinian wave to pieces followed by a tremendous tumult of bayonets, the Glandelinians forcingtheir way through a part of the line before they cloud close the gaps made by the storm of fire poink point blank.

O A score of the waves of Glandelinians w which was headed straight for the big est batteries of christians alongfieldingsons line were blown to fragments by a storm of shells two of their generals Sandershien e and Medso being killed. The christian line now saw their peril but they had no time at all to escape the blow of the charging columns of the enemy sticking the christian lines cutting them to pieces with a earthrending crash of murketry and leaving thousan thousands of their own dead and wounded lyingacross the works. The other lines which still held their lines began to fight with the energy of despair against the brave clandelinians who cut them down with their pikes, or ran them through with the bayone' bayonet until the last of the christians fell back. Meanwhile general Callens christian line were doing their best ot to prevent the clandelinian Ossian'Curdes from surging above the breastworks. They had got an over however despite the brist ling wall of bayonets and were now shooting, and throwing grenades and hacking and stabbing at the gallent Angelinians, who replied with rifle shots, bayonet and sabre and pike thrusts....

The general with a revolver in both hands was fighting like a mad demonman demon, even the Angelinians used white hot slicers, poking and stalking wildly into the mass of writhing clandelinianes who were trying to climb and force a for footing on the redoubts. But thoughthey all did their bestthe pressure of numbe numbers began to tell and the clandelinians succeededin crossing the works the Angelinians being carried forward by the writhing vortex of men, most of the christ ianns being killed or wounded, thirty hundred cannon of the christians were rendered useless and the battle was won by the clandelinians who had has lost over three hundred thousand in killed and wounded, o that of the christians one hundred th thousand.

The Vivian girls had learned in a certain or rather heard of in a certain yarn, about the boy Boy-King Island's that the little boys were at war with the men, ot or had be been after conquering their parents and other grown ups, and had placed a boy king to rule over the 7 islands.. . .. Violet and her sisters did not believe that there were such queer happenings, and put the question to Calton Maldonon after the three hourbattle was over.!

''Are the boys really superio superiors in the Boy-King Island's?''

'No.''Answered Maldonons.''Amused;'' What in the name of heaven made you ask such a silly question' Those islands are really full of childrenmen children but they are slaves under the clandelinians these islands being situated near the seaport of Vivian wicker. These children are bru brutally treated by the clandelinians these being called the islands prisons.

They tried to make some sort of a rebellion one time but the clandelinians was were too many and succeeded in cutting to pieces all those who rebelled .....

The clandelinian fortifications are so powerful there, there , there that many nations feared those islands islands an and not the strongests fleets have as yet dared go near them.

The name is with the Blangiglomenean Islands. At the Boy) Bow ing islands the Clandelinians use very dangerous mines, and the ter ibliest cannon they could man..... It is dangerous for hostile ships to approach within their midst , and on the shores of fields in front of their redoubts they make very large and oblong holes 1 miles long, one third wide and from twelve to fourteen feet deep.... The bottom is made much broader than the upper part and bristles with black shining sticks three fe t long, with points as sharp as needles . Any runaway children would surely be trapped by these holes and if they fell on these sticks they would be killed instantly. Similar pit have also been dug by the Clandelinians in front of their fortifications for the purpose of trapping any charging column of christians who would as dare to at attack them.

The children have ben butchered one by one to be studied on, and many are studied on alive. The Angelinian governments have ben intending to collect large fleets to be sent out to attack those islands and rescue the children if possible and take all the clandelinians prisoners prison ers....."

''How far is the Boy-King islands?''Asked voice.

''Its only twenty miles off from the Calverinian coast and not far from vivian wicker.''Answered the general;'' The il islands have many volcanoes which the clandelinians take advantage of to torture children, and no greater horrors are going on anywhere else. Those islands are regular hells of torture which is arousing all the christian nations throughtout....And the sea in that vinicity is always rough. All day the seas are heavy the wind hot and sultry. The wind blows almost like a hurricane every day and there is no fugitive who could escape by sea, and those who do escape the horrors of the great death pits are trailed over the islands by scores of bloodhounds.....

IN PERIL FROM A SWIFTLY ADVANCINGFOREST FIRE....'

It was tward the evening that Violetand her sisters had found their way back to general vivian's lines and they told him off all their experiences.....

It was that night when Violet saw a faint lurid glow in to the south and looked in that direction with her glasses.She gave a sudden gasp, and after wiping it took a second look.

''Gracious .''She gap gasped;''I think it is the very forestid fires we had escaped when Evans rescued us from the clandelinians.''

''The forest?''

''The forest fire?''Exclaimed Joice,feeling a little uneasy;''B Nonsense. Maybe it is only a blazing villiage.''

''Here see for yourselve Joice.It looks like the forest fire to me.''''

Joice took the glasses, and looked in the same direction after wiping them off and after taking a second look she gave a start.

''Violet you are right.''She cried;''It looks to me as if miles of forests were on fire, and it seems to advance tward us.''

She looked again and as Jenniesked for te the glass Joice said;

''Here it is Jennie.Look in the southeast. I believe that there is a city afire in that direction.''

Jennine did so and saw many flashes of all colors while her sisters heard queer far ff sounds.

' They are explosions.''Said Jennie;''I could see the flashes. We had better tell papa.''

The little girls proceeded tward general vivins headquarters.General Greatheart who was consulting general about something had noticed a reddening color in the room. All went tward the window and saw a brilliant ruddy glowin the sky. Columns of flames lit up smoke thick and rolling extnded into the air, shaping like several tremendous pillars which were lit up by the seething expanse of fire below. The columns of smoke was rising steadily and a vast black cloud like some colossal umbrellabegan to spread far above the conflargration.

At times the awesome pillar would be alm almost crimson and then again in a second or so it would at the lower extremitity turn bright gl golden and later to a deep crimson again. Clouds of variojs varicus colors would rise where the glow was brightest and from one of the far distant hills they could faintly see a tre mendcus sea of fire advancing up the sides soon giving forth a dazzling glare

The great generals left the house and and mounting their horses rode forward to investigate. After two hours of traveling they mounted a high rise of ground and saw that the advancing destruction had reached the main roar to Marcocellio and incrossing the road it had put the telephone system ot out of existance completely, burning the poles and melting the wires. General vanson Vivian mand Greathreat watched enthralled the two advancing seas of fire which extended as far as eye could reach and the glare could be seen for two hundredmiles or less.The height of theadvancing wall of fire seemed to be betwen twelve hundred and fifteen feet . It came on in a curious foshion, literally expanding itself away from Marcocellio but a part was overlapping a part of General Evans left wing, all the christians who did not retreat fighting the flames with all things they could procure, by making large clearings, and beating down the fire with wet sacks.

Many blazing seas of fire appeared on the center, of the conflargrations main advancing line of fire and advanced with great speed, rushing through valleys in regular fire oceans, across ravinesand up and down the sides of hills. The tutulent flames rose here and there in mighty tongues filling the air with sullen redness. The whole main army under general Evans was in the path of the advancing conflargration. The fleeing Angelinians had traveled only a few miles when call of a sudden they came upon a town where hundreds of thousands of children, man the prettiest ever seen were about to be sold at auction .

The Angelinians made a rush through the town the children shrinking from the new comers, thinking they were also clandelinians but they were awed when they saw the Angelinian flags fluttering, and realizing that at last they were christians begged them to protect them which of course there was no need of the them to do.

Seeing the appalling number of christians, the clandelinians about five million million of them surrendered without a battle, and the prisoners were taken into costudy by the Angelinians. The christians were soon marching over a long bridge fifteen of the sweetest little girls and boys being beside general Evans.

''My but the air is smelly.''Said one of his staff;''I believe the forest fire is gaining on us.''

''I don't care.''Said general Evans su, sullenly;''Let it be great or small ,I'm not going to turn off my course and let general Degree flank general Vivian. My force of 19,000,000 are well and we must meet him at Marcocellio where he is advancing for.''

''Nix on that diconary talk talk.''Said one of the generals;'' We will be committing sucd sucide if we let the forest fires overthem us.''

''We can't overwhelm us.''Said general Evans impatiently;'' Degree has 30,000,000 men''

After a crossing the bridge the clandelinian generals came to a river where all kinds of clandelinian ships were at anchor and many of the Angelinians set these on fire. Railroad tracks were torn up and even long lines of frieght cars were raided , wrecked and set on fire fire, great railroad bridges were burned and lots of damage was done. Twat Tward the afternoon general Phel came unexpectedly upon a large force of Clandelinians who opened a simultaneous fire, and advanced to charge the christians. They en countered overwhelming numbers however and retreated in confusion the christians pressing on defiantly. Three Clandelinian captians appeared, with over three hundred soldiers, and oneof the advancing christian captians sent one of the Clandelinians flying and upsetsanother and causing one armed with a sabre to fall a against his comrade and create a lot of confusion. Then with a rush the advancing christians began attacking the Clandelinians dire discharging their pistols and using their muskets as clubs while many others bayonetedthe Clandelinians who dared to oppose them.

There was a tremendous tumultious din of bayonets and sabre, great battle rattle and clatter, plenty of smokeanddust and then as cheer as the Clandelinians continued to fall back with out a serious resistance, delivering only a slight clattering fire. The Angelinians continued to rush forward presenting a formidable line of bayonets against a small Clandelinian force who were forming an offensive line. A large force of Clandelinians now appeared, whole lin es now starting to blaze with a severe firesand at least hundreds of saddles among the Angelinian horsement were emptied.

The Clandelinian leader who was a colonel was a brave man however and he quickly ordered his own stalwart men to dismount and hide behind their horses and fight the onrushing christians., the Clandelinians stop ing their horses and doing as they were told.

From behind theor horses the enemy opened a heavy fire mowing the advancing christians down like grass but the survivors rushe on opening fire with their double barrelled shot guns. Realizing that they could not fault halt the christians, the Clandelinians were compelled to mount and rideaway, the men being only too glad to do this leaping into their saddles and riding away toward their main body leaving their dead and wounded behind in the power of the christians.

General Legine however saw the approaching christians and large forces of Clandelinians were forming in the pa, plain groves and opening fire with all the cannons they could get into action. These first divisions of Clandelinians were greatly outnumbered but they made a defense that was almost like a stone wall to the christians, but outnumbering the Clandelinians as they did the christians presently began to push the Clandelinian forces back slowly but surely, though a losing a storming fire.

The Clandelinians however were not retreating completely. They contested every foot of the way, keeping up an insedious fire that dealt frightful havoc among the christian ranks, and keping in good order all the time. It was more merely a case of the larger force shoveing the smaller forces back.

Legion learning of the facts at once ordered general Chester lollie to retreat toward Marcuellie and order up the main body to check the impetious advance of the chris christians. This mum movement was obeyed, and as soon as Evans learned of it he ordered up general Meroes division s who all being cavarly n and dragoons made a dash across tuans creek marching around Helplessvine and attacking Bellies Goesdivisions of cavarly forces w with desperate fury, a furious and bloody fight raging for several mun minutes and ten Bellie dives having fallen wounded the Clandelinian cavary forces fell back, the Angelinians following the Chesr ychesterlollies forces and catching up with it just beyond beyond Marcuellie. The Angelinians charged these divisions as fast as they could get the horses to gallop but met a tremendous fire at close range which put the horses and men in a terrific confused mixup. However the next moment the survivors having controlled themselves were upon the Clandelinians knocking them right and left with their lances carbines of sabres, and using their lances with thrilling effect sending them flying while the other christian divisions bore down upon Bellies panic stricken hordes with a rush and a roar causing a tremendous fracas, and sending them flesing for their lives.

The Angelinianshad been advancing forc several minuteswhen they suddenly heard fierce yellsand the rush of many feet while the thundering reports of several musket volleys, sounded and above the hedious din they heard the voice of some general as he screamed in awful despairing tones;

"Oh I'm shot and done for."

Then came heavy and terrible volleys miles , ,long at once which made the smoke filled woods echoe and reechoe and Evans saw a long line of grayeoats rushing toward the Angelinians. Their intention could not be realised as the smoke from the advancing forest fires almost hid them but the christians halted and started blazing away in a manner beyond describing.The Clandelinians however came on steadily and suddenly amid a fierce pandemonium of fierce yells, came a general and fearful discharge of musketry from both both sides. It seemed asif the intire force of Legions men were advancing and the air became filled with smoke, bullets and minnies, hundreds of men falling per second second and pitching headlong on the ground and thereceme crash after crash of musketry as the Clandelinians closed in with the Angelinians. The forces met in a terrible collisionand men on both sides fought hand to hand, with desperate fury many thousands clutched in frightful deathstruggles. It seemed as if the Clandelinians wished to cut off and surround Evans and the conflict raged most desperately in the center of the first division . It soon appeared that the Clandelinians had concentrated their large masses around Evans for the line around him was broken at that point the enemy nemming him in. The carnage became frightful then, the christians forming Evans body guard battling like demons and displaying a blast of rifles and walls of bayones. Evans was in awful peril indeed. Despairing cries came from the other troops who sought with the fury of desperation to force themselves through the enemys lines and rescue general Evans.

THE BATTLE OF MARCOELLIO WON?

The struggle was now more fearful but the last rush of the christians was terrific and the enemy surrounding Evans was compelled to retire, the christians re persueing them swiftly. The main portions of h Evans batle line battle line were forming for action asoverwhelming forces of the Clandelinians were coming on at a fierce headlong charge.

The persueing christians saw this advance and began to fall back steadily, firing at every step. The enemy pressed on furiously and determinedly though they began to face a heavy fire of musketry and artillery. On they pressed swiftly and now tremendous firing broke out all along the line. Bullets whistled in terrific hur icane like sounds, sabres sang, shel s flew screaming through the air, brave men shouted, and to the din there semed no end. Myriads of the Clandelinians were laid low by the muskets of the brave christians but the survivors came on relentlessly, and a large body of Clandelinians rushing right in front of the christian line and among their field pieces melted entirely away. The main force of theenemy came on in a tremendous rush under a discharge s of terrible and heavier volleys than before, the gallant christians keeping their line unbroken, and then more and more christians come swarming to the support , and the Angelinian fire became terrific the thunders of the cannon echoeing and echoeing again and again through the woods and from hill to dale, and as the enemy came on the firealong the christian line incre increased to tenfold violence and the slaughter was awful.

General Lieton now came up with his brigades and formed in line behind a long brier hedge, and soon blazing storms of volleys broke from this line simultaneously, the reports of hundreds of thousands of muskets seeming like one continuous roar and the Clandelinians went down in frightful numbers. General Lehnot one Clandelinians close closed in near the brier hedge but suddenly found themselves attacked on the sides at once for a large force of Angelinians suddenly descended upon their flanks and the roar of musketry was even louder than their hedious yelling.

The attack came on three sides almost simultaneously and a fierce encounter ensued. The Clandelinians fo finding themselves almost surrounded clubbed away with the butts of their muskets, using their bayonets like fiends, cracking many of the purple coats on their heads, and dashing their weapons out of their hands and mowing down thousands with their pistols. Muskets by the score of thousands seemed to roar in every direction and more cannons added to the din.

The Clandelinians however were utterly overpowered overpowered and as a great cannonading opened upon them they were forced to retreat through the remaining gaps . Along ot herparts of the line the enemy continued to advancethe fury of the christian fire increasing every minute !) ---the enemy comingon with a rush, but more and more of the christians came to reinforce the line and opened a dadl deadly fk fire upon the enemy many of whom were trying to sav the hedge on fire . The Clandelinians drew nearer to the hedge however, and soon showers of shells and solid shot plowed fo fur ows in the advan cling lines in grave .. On they came however many with flaming torches and started to fire it while the Angelinians clubbed away at them and used their bayonets.However they managed to start a pretty brisk fire though fire arms and cannon began roaring incessantly all along the christian line. The Angelinians tried in vain to check the flames, but contending with two insedious foew foes was a difficult thing indeed and the infantry fell back from the blazing hedge whi which began to ignite everything in its path...

The cr christian artillery men struck sto stubornly to their guns sending bra broadside after broadside among the Clandelinians and the slaughter became awful.

The surviving Clandelinians however closed the large h gaps and came on cutting ther their way throught the burning hedge, and swarmed about the guns, and there was now a furious mix mix mixture of purple and grayecoats,, the gunners determined to fight to the last man. The attack of the assailents was teri terrific both Clandelinians and Angelinians fighting like cannibals, the gunners using ramrods, pistols staves and daggers. The Clandelinians however were pressing upon themin heavy numbers and nearly every artillery man had fallen. Put they were not to getthe guns however.

Seing that the Clandelinians had pressed b beyond the hedge the Angelinian bridgd brigades came back in a rushing counter charge, raising a tremendous din, and stacking the Clandelinians furiously, everywhere muskets blazing, rattling and volleys followed one after another in q quick succession, but the Angelinians forced forced the Clandelinians back step by step..... Thousands of trees were even now on fire and despite the threateningforest fires and the already smouldering debris on the ground the battle still raged... Though the Clandelinians fell back at this point,they still advanced at other points, and came on with a rush... They advanced in a compact wallll wall forming well regulated columns. They were coming on in such overwhelming numbers,,, that the christiansunder generalAugustine St Clare, fell back but in good god good order,1. Adolphs divisionsstill resisted the enemy; and piled the ground outside their workswith dead and wounded Clandelinians...

General Wenthworths, brigade which was in charge of the bridge had been overwhelmed , but in retreating, went in good order and at aswift pace, with no confusion, no extra noise, and no fear.....

The main body under general Wilkerson a/s also fell back slowly in good order, and keeping up a long steady line of firing which dealt awful havoc among the foes.....

The Clandelinians commanded by general Jennings, pushed forward under heavy fire from along the front of Alfreds brigades,, who also still made a stand resolving to hold their ground untill reinforcements, came up..... The Clandelinians though tormented by the smouldering fires, made on one terrific onlaught after another, and when it seemed as if Alfreds bridges brigades could no l longer hold their burning wooden barricades against the tremendous onsets help arrived. General Horten came up with new rush and joined Alfreds brigades harassing the enemy with their murderous fire,,. Jennings however was reinforced by more Clandelinians under Burlington, and Washington, who pleated four hundred cannon on a n eminen ce near Alfreds lines who being under a heavy fire and harressed by the burning works an and trees around them was forced to retire, and they withdrew across two streams a c covering party of seventy hundred th sand men following.

These were attacked by Jenningswithsix million Clandelinians and a part of Toney Cntens cavarly. The Angelinians covering Alfreds retreat after a fierce and bloody fight recoiled, the Clandelinian infantry following them across the stream, but being severely resisted by Alfreds men..... The artillery fire and the smoke from the approaching conflargration caused great dismay to the christians and general Horten discovering this ordered them to retire the fighting being continued by the divisions under general Thompson who were holding a position behind a log barricade.

The firing was rapid all along the line as the other christian forces retiring behind the log barricades and even behind trees and rocks poured in a most terrific withering storm of fire with rachind guns and rifles,. The contest now became a hotter one than it was half before. The Clandelinians made determined attacks to canture this position and the struggle was fearful beyond description.

The Angelinian forces burst into loud cheerses they met the charge of the Clandelinians and hurled it back with terrible carnage.One of the generals found himself in the thickest of the fighting. Shellsand shrapnell were flying about like hail and the christians were now beating back the Clandelinians with seemingly bloodthirsty fury,. The general was grappling with a wiry built Clandelinian and struggled to get his gun from his him. His strengthseemed prodigious and he finally wrenched the weapon away and with it gave theman such a terrific crack on the head that his brains were bespattered all around.

The christians were excited with their success as the Clandelinians under Jennings had been scattered like Autumn leaves in a hurricane. The christians now advanced again upon Negroes lines and the noise was deafening, the air being filled with smoke to such an extent that nothing could hardly be seen . The thunder of six hundred cannon cannon made the ground tremble and the hills seemed to delight in rolling back the sound a again and again. At terrific speed general Evans galloped forward, recklessly urging on his men while bullets whistled around himand a shell exploded so close to him that a fragment furrowed through the skin of his steed. But the steed unhurt galloped on ,Evans shouting to his men to charge. The Clandelinians met the onslaught of the christian infantry and cavarly bravely, muskets being discharged by the hundred thousand at once, the Clandelinians firing with desperation. On dashed the christians, the thunder of the christian and Clandelinian artilleryincreasing in fury as more and more were broughtinto action. The gallant bridgades under Evans were fairly rushing into the very jaws of death. In the midst of the strife wherever the fight raged the hottest general Evans could be seen fighting with all the courage and heroism of his nation. With the greatest fury millions of Clandelinians dashed themselves against the seried blazing columns of the enemy, with as little fear as if they were playing battle.

The struggle was deadly and the christians were soon forced back with the loss of hundreds of thousands. The gallant Angelinians had been fighting against two times their number, but though theywere forced back and instead of discouraging themthe Angelinian forces reformed, and went at it again, making a terrific thunderous rushand attacking with irresistible fury, the encounter being more bloody and savage than before. But part of the enemy's lines were forced back by the impetious charge of the chtisians, but they kept fighting with savage fury as thy slowly gave way. Through the ranks of the enemy the christians charged spreading death and destruction as they went.....

The Clandelinians fought still more furiously, but were continually forced back with frightful loss... General Evans finally turned out to be victorious the whole of Jennings Clandelinian army fleeing before his advance, Washingtons intentions of attacking having been made because he wanted to hem Evans in and capture his whole command so that the flanking movement made tward general Vivians lines could not be frustrated. In the whole battle of MAC MARGOMELLY the christian losses were 1,899,888 in killed wounded and prisoners, and out of all there the losses in killed and wounded were 234,666.

The losses of the Clandelinians was 2,345,778 in killed and wounded alone and five millions were taken prisoners making 7,345,778 in all'

In the meantime general Vivian was withdrawing several parts of his army for the advancing forests fires and the furiously attacking enemy was threatening to hem himin. Tward evening general Greathearts divisions were endagered by the forest fires and were forced to break camp and retreat tard tward Negroes woods.

The christian soldiers looked beautiful in their purple uniforms and their flags were prettier still. First Greatheans batalions marched, then came Great hearts cavarly and infantry forces, and the other divisions following.

They continued marching untill they reached Negroes woodlands and here for four hours a terrible drama of horror ensued, fifteen assaults of the most frightful description being made by the Clandelinians whol which tore while whole infantry columns to pieces and made the battle mitten woods like an inferno in itself'

Violet and her sisters in the meantime had not taken any more notice of the forest fires but had decided to lie down for a while as they felt tired and langi languid.They had no sooner laid down when the floor shook under them with a rapid and convulsive throe, and far and wide along the far distant horizon went a hoarse and continuous boming sound, the cutitians of the chambers shook as if in the blast of a hurricane the wradrobes rocked and crashed to the floor, the tipi ti tripods raled tottered and fell, and the building now waved from side to side while hundreds of thousands of horible detonations far in the distance followed in endless succession . The little girls realizing it to be series of parks of artillery in action ran to the windows and saw already cauliflower clouds mixed with all kinds of debris rise into the air continuously followed by reports that sounded like the continual cannonding of many volcanos in action and the ground shook now so terribly that the little girls were compelled to cling to the window sills to keep from being thrown down. The trembling never seemed to cease a moment and now Jennie noticed with horror that a seething roaring wall of flame was advancing tward their dwelling.

It looked as if if it rose a thousand feet high, and she told her sisters who made haste to flee and warn the Angelinians who were in its path.

They sped down the the stairs as fast as they could and geting outside heard the roar of distant battle more plainly, added by the roar of the advancing conflargration and they saw that it would catch the building and its surrounding region in short order. Indeed it was aful, appalling , and inexcesdingly awesome.

The wall of fir seemed to bea be advancing fabout about twenty miles an hour, coming nearer and narer and increasing steadilyin height.

'Come. "Said Violet as she saw it advancing across a creek with the roar of artillery, catching trees on the other side by the thousands and melting heavy rocks..... Her sisters mounted their races and set off at break neck speed Every time they glanced back they saw that it was still higher and more furicus, and advance with great speed..... The house they left was already on fire, and even where the little girls were the ground was deluged by glowing sparks which flew at some places almost as thick as spray. The so advancing conflargration to make it worse seemed to sweep in a fire sea perpendicularily across the sky, catching tree tops far ahead of the little girls. The advancing conflargration seemed like a mountnian of fire the sight being terrific as all the trees across the wide creek became one mass of fire, the very sky as ming to be a very canopy of flames.

"My but we are in for it now.''Said Violet;''Ttis too bad we did not see this fire before it came so near. I fear we are lost.''

They urged their horses on as fastas they could noticing that they were roofted in flamethat was sweping clear across the skies high above them with a roar that put terror into their little hearts. They even did not need to warn any of the christians in its path for they had discovered its approach an hour before the little girls did and were wail well under way.. .. ..

The adventure of the little girls almost proved fatal as we shall soon read. Clouds of white smoke was pouring everywhere for the conflargration was advancing in full away.....

"I hele believe we are in a dangerous siti uation situation."Said Violet with a look of despair and wit h t with tr tears in her eyes;' I wish we had seen it sooner."'''

"Remember the Guardian Angels."Said Jennie;"They are with us in all perils."

"It certai ly is a forest fire ."Said Evangelin e ..iviani;"''I wonder if that house has collasped or burned up yet."'

They glanced back and saw that the fire passing a n large clearing was advancing a little slower. As they raced on the little girls encountered Starring whose companions were with him. Fredrick and starring scowled at the little girls and grinned fiendishly as they saw the advancing storm of fire.

Violet saw Starring gi grin n and turned her horse swiftly tward him and cried out;

"Make room you boob, or I'll ride you down without mercy, you ungrateful wretch to act like this after we forgave you."

The boys were dismayed for they could not successfully cope with their fair enemies who were armed to the teeth. However they had their sabres with them, and Starring drw draw it and said;

"If you don't change your course I'll kill your steed my fair sissy, and brain you with this sabre."

Violet knw that in fact the boys though Glandelinians were throughout Catholics and perfect christians, and so feared no one, and so was compelled to draw her revolver and fired two shots knocing the sabre out of his hand, and clipping alarge lock of hair from his head.

"You impudent dog ."Hissed Starring his face flushing crimson;" If I was on that horse b beside you, I'd lkill you like a dog. We will not budge from here even if you shoot us down. We came to find you and mean to take you and your sisters prisonors."

"We ''Well try it then."Retorted Violet, her eyes flashing;"It will take more than a hundred of you boys to do it."

He made a rush at her at this, and with a heavy club p poi sed over his head, but Violet again leveled her paitol and fired point blank at Starring. The bullet grazed the boys ear which made him more angerier than ever and he rushed at Violet striking the horse on the back as he missed Violet.

Her sisters were horrified when they saw the act of the enraged boyscout general, and the whole five of the little girls fired athim simultaneously but he dodged behind the horse and the horse got so shot dead downone of the bullets hitting Violet in the arm.

The other two boys rushed forward, but Violets sisters fired again, the shots this time bringing them down simultaneou su simultaneously, Fredrick being sve severely wounded. Starring saw his two chu me drop and became horrified. And at once he found himself surrounded.

"Give up."Screamed Angeline;"Or I'll kill you."

Starring could not help wincing under her fierce glare. She seemed to him like some enraged baby angel punishing a lost soul. He saw nothing wiser than to give fo up for he realized that if he showered further resistance she would keep her word, and his hands were bound behind him. To escape from the little girls was nigh impossibleand Starring sullenly followed where t y went after the two other lands after being bound had been thrown across the horses of violet an d Eva. The little girls had not stopped to examine theothers ,an d even had an opinion that such ungrateful wretches did not derseve to have their wounds treated or bandaged m not eso especially as they themselves were in danger from the fire and in worse danger from he delay during the encounter with the three boys.

"You will get it good."Said Jennie to Starring with a serious lo k/ half of anger and half of reproach."And it i your fault that your foolish companions were seriously and proba bly mortally wounded."

Starring said nothing but the look on his face made her realise that she and her sisters would be in great danger, if he managed to break his bon ds , for he would revenge the injury of his chums, so she went and saw thatthe bonds were tied in knots that nothing could unfasten but a veey sharp knife.

A low and distant booming told them that the advnaicing forest fire had passed the clearing, and was coming on again. The flames pas s ed through the dark ranks of the seried clouums of smoke clouds and large storms of burning embers embers broke heavily among the swaying trees, that half overhun g ther their path while swift and intolerably bright the tongues of flame darted again across the sky while the little girls seemed to be swallowed up by smoke. The clouds were thickening with aston ishing q quickness, the little girls fdrly gasping and choke chocking. A roar like artillery broke upon them, the air seemed to become hot like the blasts from a giant furnace and a screaming gale hol howling like millions of wolvesscourching and at that arose a making the trees writheand twist as in a hurricane.

Fast rushed the da dashing clouds of sparks and embers w which increased fast and fiercely. T he heat was not parching and the little girls believed they ost .

his dismay what pe peril they were in."

"Goodness gracious , we are lost."We screamed;" That stream of fire is rushing down with the rate of an av lanche . Run , run or it will be to late."

They sent heir horses on at terrific speed but the stream of flames was rushing down with the spe d of a train, andthe little girls saw hat they were in awful peril indeed. Down, down, down, rushed that awful stream of flames, with a roar like commomingling with the awful steam lke hissing of burning moss and it was gaining on the imperiled ones everymoment. The fire was almost upon them. Suddenly Jennie's horse tripped over a r c rock, and she screamed as he was thrown and rolled over tward a large ravine. She fell down and lay there in a pool of blood. Violet's horse had also slipped and she and Fredrik stumbled into the ravine. As her sisters scream ed to be enveloped in smoke and flame Voice recklessly snatched Sta ring up as he a ha fallon from his horse, but by the time they reached the ravine, Jennie and Angeline had fallen into Angoline was almost overtaken by the awful conflargration, which though rushing still slower was still moving in great s ee speed.

Angeline was rescued by Joice and her other sisters Catherine Daisy and Nettie, and they all scrambled down into the ravine just as the fire swept where they had stood just a few moments beofre. Jennie had recovered but was who had also fallon into the ravine was crying bitterly. Angelines feet were badly burned and blisters covered her whole body and face.The poor children soon found themselves in a sea of fire which roared and boomed in a frightful manner. Violet and her sisters were now half naked from their cloth es had ben almost burned off by the intense heat.

They also saw that they had to look for some bett er refuge for the fire started toicnite hings in the ravine. Three more seas of fire were coming from the south and the ground seemed to tremble slightly.

"Gracious but that was a narrow escape."Gasped Violet; "We were a little redl reckless in standing on that hill."

As they left they saw that the ravine was a aflame and that another wall of fire was advancing seemingly with the sped of a fast express train. They ran down the wooded ridge as fast as they couldand reachingthe base Jennie sudden ly disappeared as if she had sunk into the earth Jennie had sank into some hole which though not very deep was completely suffocating with gaseous fumes. Starring had to be unbounband Voice throwing it over a high projecting rock, and taking one end of it hastily tired it to a thick tree trunk. Then she tied the other end around her waist and said to Angeline;

"We cannot stand to see our sister die in such a helpless way.I'll descend into that hole andwhen you see the rop rob rope tugging pull me up."

Then without the slightest hesitation she jumped down into it. Jennie in the meantime was suffering for want of air, and it was worse for her becau because she had losther breath in running. She could not breathe at all for the f mes were stronger than the strongest ammonia, though its stench was very much like it. She clutched upward trying to get out but it was too step and of considerable depth. Her lungs pained as if they were on fireand her gaping mouth was filled with the choeking gases. The main peril was of an explosion for the flames would soon reac reach it. Jennie could not bear it and she invoked St Anthony to save her. The hole being five hundred feet deep Voicefeared she would never reach her. She deen descended swiftly however the gases taking no effect on her as she had a wet handkerchief over her face. H She soon however landed on something thatmoved under her feet . She could not see in the inten intense darkness but clutch clutched around and managed to grap grab her by the shoulder.She quiekly took off the rag and tied it around Jennies nose and m mouth. Then throwing her against her chest and clasping her tight ly she made the per peculiar movement of thr the resp and were soon safe on the firm ground again. To their surprise they discovered that the fire had chanc changed its ocurse, dividing into many branches . The main line of fire had also changedits co rse and the fugitives saw that the danger was over for the time being. And if it had not divided it would have been all up with t e them for the fire were far ahead by thi this i time but far on both sides .

Jennie had soon recovered and now they again went on their way. A few moments had pas sed when coming out in a clearing they were sur prised by hlaf a dose n Glandelinians who leaped at the fugitives their aim being to rescue Starring an d his tow companions. Violet picked up a branch of a tre already half smouldering at one point and thrw threw it at the nearest Glandelinians striking him on the chin and causing him to howl and swear . Then she and her sisters fired two shots at the swarm of glandelinians c coming after, each little girl sho shooting down two at once, and causing the others the to others to halt many of those in the rear falling over those in front.

The little girls t then raced away the Glandelinians immmtly giving chase yelling like demons. On came the merciless Glandelinians with a rush but Violet and her sisters suddenly dashed around a turn in the road an d when the Glandelinians reached it the children were nowshere in sight . The glandelinians who had chased Violet and her sisters did not go w ve veryfar fpr thefire had sheilded the litt le girls from their view. The little girls with their forse

"Let's make for the river." "Said Violet;" "We got to go as fast as our horses will take us. We must do so for this fire storm is almost upon us."'

"Mu such luck." "Odd Starring o to himself;" "And I hoped they would perish."

The rain of sparks and embers now poured with a fury that broke through all puny obstacles and suddenly the wide rose likea hurricane hurling thousands of tre s down at one single breath and the little girls and their horses were bombar ded by a storm of stones and blazing embers. On and on they went as fast as they coul could but faster faster and fiercer, came the rain of sparks and embers the adn advancing wall of fire assuming its most blasting and deadly form.

It seemed as if they would never reach the wide river which could hardly be seen now from the thickness of the smoke. The showers of sparks had seemed to cease suddenly but the wall of fire was almost upon them. Precipitious and rou h crags of scourched ground frowned before them rendered more fearful b the inten se glow of the flames that illuminedthe dark and dangerous soil.

Countless the blazing glow over the iron gray heap of ashes wo covered in parts with ancient moss lingered in a manneras to turn it of a blo o blood hue. And sometimes the whole part of the scene was obscured by the smoke. The searing flames swept in crimson tongue across the skies and everywhere seemed to turn the co, color of fire and so intense was the glare of the blaze that it brought vividly into view even the sharp outlines of the most distant windings of the gi giant hills in from front many miles away. The little girls with their prisoners had howe however reached the river and had started across thoughthe fire hurricane was roaring in deafening clamor. For a time the wind was so strong that the strongest trees writhed and twisted and were borne to the ground . Thousand trees near the little girls fell to the ground all in one time with thunderous crashes while the little girls looking up saw that they were roofted in flame.

Just then a gust of wind arose which threw down many a tre everywhere and even into the river which to Violets dismay was getting quite hot. The fire advance with the roar of gunpowder exploding in thousands of tons and the little girls believedthat the stream itself would not save them.

The hurricane of hot wind was sweeping down retrens here and there for many yards and thenoise of the snappingof the burning trees file filled the air continually and the gale at every full squa squalllll cau ht caught the tall trees and broke them off with a roar and laid them low upon the ground scattering sparks. The incessant blaze made an intesnse glare , and advanced tward te the river with a deafening ro roar unlgled with the shrill screeming of the hurricane.....From the consum ion of falling trees and distant explosions the ground to trembled and quivered like the timbers of a great shi ship in a storm and as the little girls got half way across the r rivr torrents of spark fe, fell line fiery rain dashing in great sheets and threatening to set the childrens cloths on fire as it started to leap across, making sounds like mill'ion s of snakes hissing atone time above the crashing of snapping burning trees.

But throughout all this storm of fiery sparks the little girls got a safly across the river with their thre prisoners The very confinrgrat ion seemed like an ocean of leaping seething flameswhich seemed to sear the very heavens. The woods beyond was filled with steam from the now boiling river and dead deadly gases seemed to pour in bick volumes..... The little girls saw the flames literlly leap across the river fil ing the atmosphere with an intense heat. The little girls raced onward avoiding many steep ravvines where hot blasting fumes arose from... The Vivian girls mounted a high but gent ly rising hill/ and reac ing the summit were appalled at what they saw. A wide expanse of trees on their side of the river asfar as eye could reach were be becoming ablaze the scene being like an ocan of fire.

"It has gotten across said Violet;" "We will have to look out now."

To their right and left they also saw five seperate oceans of fire and smoke clouds rolling high in walls tward the sky..... The flames pierced through the rolling clouds of smoke with a roar ad and of course the hissing og of the white hot flames nearest ti to them was deafening.

The intense heat could be felt where they were and time and again they heard series of loud explosions. The very scene was worse than Dant's Inferno for I cannot and fully ad correctly describe it. Fiery fountians could be seen at intervals while the main line of conflargration leaping in gigantic seas of firex across the river below was already ascending the hill at certain points and the little girls fearing that it would certainly overtake them prayed as they never never prayed before.

They ascended this hill as fast as theycould but in reac ing the lowlands were confronted by a long stream of fire , the smoke of which poured tward them in chocking clouds. They had to find another way for they could not, pass this awful wall of fire. At this moment there was an awful roar from the summit of the wooded hill and to thier dismay they saw large streams of fire rushing down along the tree tops with frightful speed driven down by the mighty wind which had grown so strong as to roll down the biggest boulders. boulders.

Starringdid not know of the fire swiftvapproach until he heard the hissing of the awful conflargration, and when he glanced back he saw to of Angelinian boyscouts had their camp in a little little wood beyond the fire zone with a little wet swamp on one side and a swiftly running river on the other thai there being a well concealed ford not far distant so thatthey could either retreat to the swmup, or ford the creek in haste if attacked by the foe or the overwhelming forest fires. To this the little girls had sped determined to find their fathershead quarters and tell him of the dangers all around and to hand over their boy prisoners.

As they proceeded on t they encountered Evans and his little forces of scouts. As they rode on they again encountered Glandelinians whose powerful shapes showed that these glandelinians had strength. Evans eye f course had not been idle and he at n once saw how he could escape with the rest although they would have to do good r d riding and have firm nerves. At one side of the road was a thirty foor foot ditch with a ir briar hedge on the farther side, Evans being able to look over this and see thatthe groundbeyond was hard.

For along run in the road there was not much ru room. But But Evans thought that if he had the largest part of the road he could make the jump with the rest. But sh suddenly they changed thi their minds and charged right at the enemy and broke through, and went on tward their camp at a lively rate the glande linians cursing and swearing at the daring escapage.

A new rain of sparks was commencing at intervals and the little girls believed that the fire was so exensive that no one could escape it.

General Vivian saw the danger himself and wasemployed by the contu continual quest ioning of his officers.

General Greatheart was told to watch the raging forest fires care fully. Morning was already approaching and the rising sun looked red as blood through the misty clouds of smoke. Greatheart noticed which was the advancing fire was moving and had to move his troops, after a hard battle against the flames with his whole force asecond time.

His divisions fell back a considerable distance christian scouts coming in and reporting that the enemy were on the o o move tward the nort h as the fires were threatening wrecoino. Also they reported thatthis forces were endangered by area of fire advancing from the direction of Evangeline St lare.

General Greatheart had expected t this and no time was lost in moving the cap camp and joining general Vivians forces which were operating at some distance readi ready to go to rare-not -lies aid as soon as they shouldbe needed.

Even hundreds of thousands of men were doing their best to check the fire but all their efforts were futile and many ti lost t their lives. Since the war began over five hundred thousand soldiers of both sides had lost their lives on account of the forest fires, andover 100,000 because of the city conflargrations, and over 10,000 from fierce explosions, making a 100000 a 10,000 altogether if I'm right.

Terrific and mortal carnage at Cobbletowne August 28

Shoeman being puressed by the same fire had retreated northwards His armyof about sixty five million men and ten thousand general officers which was then in splendid condition he divided into three grand divisions under gannal Hatchild to consist of the most norne, the central grand divisions under gonsomo to in sist of the brigade, infantry, and dragoons, the left grand division under general Killshild to consist of the bestablest veterans. On the twenty eight of September Hanson's force being betwen forest fires, arised at Elsie river where shoe shoeman had taken lines of batle on a parrellal ridge of hills, with batteries in position on the comm commanding crests, long lines on infantry with reserves and su supports, and in advance of long lines of pickets chiefly in the on open field and in plain view of all.

The terrible battle was opened in the midst of terrific forest fires by the advance of the christian right wing tward Shoemans left. For three hours the batle raged desperately and the Elsies plai ns presented one of the mosthorrible scenes Shoeman had ever witnessed. It was practically filled with dead and wounded, while theground in front and rear of the redoubts was strewn wih the bodies of the men engaged on both sides.

The onset of the christians had ben repulsed and after a fierce irresistible counter charge general Moscows works were recaptured, and strongly fortified by the glandelinians both sides having lost fourteen million in prisoners and sailn slain in thisfierce encounter. During the rest of the day there had been no more infantry charges on either side the batle seeming to have been stopped.

Butat fifteen minutes to eight the next morning general Gonsomo Moosesi ordered his forse of glandelinians to attack Evangelinis, Francimlo and Glorinia's heights Hansons fortified position. It took the Glandelinians columns through mis understanding of officers in co commands recieved by the main comma der all morning to concentrate tward this direction under the heaviest shell fire ever seen in mutual warfare, four hundred thousand guns storming with fire and turning the wh whole region all around for the distance of fourty miles like a regular rain of Hades. It was not untill nearly half past three in the afternoon before the Glandelinians finally charged forward in monstrous waves of men, while during all this time the guns had kept up their horrible scarcenading thunders, never beating upon the heavens mingled with hundreds of thousands of terrific explosions hundreds of [illegible] were borne to earth by the shell blastshewiden are sh wreakage of all sorts/ [illegible] strewal by the hundreds of thousands in the death strewn plains.

A DRAMA OF HORROR AND MASSACRE.

The Glandelinians advanced with great enthusiasm, and now a fearful continuous fire of musketry and artillery was concentrated upon them, tearing their whole lines to pieces. It would be also most a lie to to ll how they fell, but the survivors only stopped for amoment and then again plunged forward. The Glandelinians fell in many regiments thousands of bodies doting the ground in a moments time along the whole line of battle and the scene of conflict had the appearance of the forest fires itself. As they approached Hannons intire position , sheet after sheet of flame and smoke fourty miles long shot from the heights, tearing whole lines of the main column of advancing Glandelinians to pieces, and also tearing down whole lines seven miles long simultaneously, while the roar of firing sounded like t hrillions of cannons going off in one continous roare

It indeed was a terrible massacre of the poor Glandelinians but there was no running back of M Moonsoos men just now. The survivors sometimes stopped, recoiled, only a little distance, but they dogredly resumed the advance pouring a well directed withering fire upon the intrenched christians mowing them down as fast as they showed themselves above the works. Many large waves of the Glandelinians mil l ions strong ri rushing forward with fixed bayonets almost reached the ramparts of the christians, but then seemed to slowly melt away into scattered fragments and then to hide completely away in a sea of smoke.

Here and there, large brigades of the reckless waves of Glandelinians already torn torn to fragments and scattered in groups of a thousand men each within reach of the christian musketry would suddenly melt away in a scathing earsplitting storm of explosions and crashes of musketry,. /like snowbanks before a blasting heat, while many of the survivors of the other lines which were shattered and torn threw themselves upon the ground to let the fearful storm of bullets pass over them, and under it to continue to fire deadly and storming volleys.

Yet it was all in vain for the Glandelinians. The christian lines was so wel posted and protected by a canal, and many sunken walls and stone walls, and intrenchments thrown up and so well defended that it could not be carried by Moonsoos men alone.

The Glandelinians i aided by the thick smoke of battle and from the forewt fires retreated and started to cross Elsins rivers but the Angelinians followed up their success in repelling the attack of the Glandelinians with a prompt and vigorious dash upon Giacomo moones men or what remained shattered army in immediately in front of him, right under his guns at that, threw their retreat into utterl confusion and drove the large part of his forces across the river in panic stricken multitudes. It was a terrible catastrophie and fright ful numbers of the panic stricken Glandelinians were massacred during that final dash of the christians upon their flank during the commencement of their reatreat.

The Angelinian columns in monsterous waves charged across plians miles long, growing full of daisys and Ferns and out of 3,360,000 Glandelinians at this point only three hundred thousand survived the great and terrible catastrophie and five thousand guns of small pieces were captured in the field of Daisys and Ferns after terrible slaughter by to the Angelinians, and fourteen generals on the side of the Glandelinians fell. They were generals Main, Hickenbotto on, Cat inia, Bernardine Sandeline, Revenginia, Calinfornia, Patience,, Jones Ao Aurand, Bernard, Sandonia, Callentonia, Mc-Whirther Rosinia, Mildinia Lwis, Henryinia. All these were killed,. Not a single general fell though lower officers had been killed and wounded on the christian side by scores during the charge across the plan plains. So fierce was the firing that the enemy had seemed to be retreating before a smoking fire on the plains, and shells threw terrific columns of smoke in the air for hundreds of feet, the whole field seeminons flaming red as the distant conflirreption itself.

The river of Glorindarun was a more horrible spectacle. General Shoe man was determined to revenge this massacre. General Jones who led the terrible counter charge which crushed the whole of Goncenons line of ten million to me more fragments discovered practically overwhelming forces of Glandelinians advancing to storm his lines and throw him back if possible. He hastened ward the christian center with his forces his lines all the way being sheeted in clouds of smoke thicker than that from the conflargration, and the advan cing ffow crossing those beautiful flower plains , mingled with Millions of Dinsys fell almost as thickly as the flowers grew themselves and horrified at the slaugh ter part of the line followed the others halting and stormidr with as fierce a reture fire. General Jones reported of the terrible advance.

"You may that the enemy are coming in overwhelming forces!" "Ankor general Patience.

"Yes they are in great forces."

"Hanton to the left of our wing, and ordered general Baldwin to stop them withall his artillery." Said general Patience; to one of his generals;" Make haste general Jons and thrown your whole force in ambushe Those Glandelinians must be stopped."

Jones hurried on to do his bidding, but in a few minutes there was the sound of the most tremendous firing ever heard, and which increased with a terrible fury many hundreds of cannon adding to the din at once. As Jones hurried on he met some of the men of his command under general Gross who had advanced their artillery in hearing the tremendous heavy firing. Others of Jones divisions were soon rushing to the scene, the soundof the firing growing more louder and more incessante He then suddenly came upon a immense force of Concentinian cavarly and dragoons hurrying to the place where the heaviest firing was going on the din now being greater than before. The firing continued to grow louder and louderand at last the havy rush of many hundreds of thousands of men were plainly heard and at lastforce of the enemy appeared through the wall of smoke along Jones central front coming at good speed.

Then the sudden roar of musketry and parks of artillery along Jones centerwas like a million cannons. Startled exclamations, and hundreds of thousands of shrieks and moans rent the air but the survivors came on at a rush. There was a series of resounding crashes then a general uprour broke loose suddenly added by thousands of fierce and fiery explosions, a terrific conflargration seemed to have broken out , the Glandelinians maintaining solid linesm though they dropped in hundreds of regiments, and pe pushed on vigoriously, forcing Jones line step by stepfrom his first line of works. Jones took defense behind the second line which the Glandelinians at nebed fiercely.

Simultaneously the Glandelinian riflemen knelt down and kpt up a rolling fire while others under an infilade boldly leaped the trenches while the Angelinians vailly vainly tried to check them. Sand bags were pulled down by thousands from the higher parapets, which fairly bristled with pikes and bayonets, and hurled upon the swarms of Glandelinians as fast as the pulp urple coats could throw them, men in gray were bayoneted l in lines simultaneously, miles long at that, thousands of Angelinians also being impaled the reckless Glandelinians leaping among the christians as fast as they could swarm over theworks all the sand bag bags rapidly disappearing and being used asclubs by the strongest arms Angelinians. Asm assailants on all sides the christians fought desperately.

Hundreds of thousands at once again crossed with ring of steel on st eel, swords clashed, pistols cracked and the slaughter became terrific. The Angelinians under Jons seemed to be the most desperate fighters the Glandelinians had ever faced though they themselves were Guarian Gurdes and Mc-Hollestinians.

F General Jones had fallen mortally wounded and so had hedone of his staff general Henry Jammillin..... The divisions storming the left wing of general Jones line was even more unsuccessful, the Angelinians driving back every vigoru vog vigou vigorious assaultwith the point of the bayonet...

Along the center where the christian general had fallen the Glandelinins p poured through one of the inclosures James Gal Gannon ordering general Delaion of the Glandelinian infantry to charge the thri third line of works on the rear these being held by Galmans Angeljins Angelinians. Solid lines of purple coats were seen behind these breastworks which seemed to be made of loosely piled up earth and limbs of trees. The gallant Glandelinian infantry dashed forwad expecting to carry these breastworks in a few minutes and flank the second line holding out so stutlornly. It was a fatal charge for the Glandelinians, for in a swift momen t they found themselves run ing into the very jaws of death. The apparently simply made breastworks was a trap for instead of mere lo se surth and branches the Glandelinians suddenly found themselves rushing upon a concealted batt barrier which offered to the greatest obstacle for an assailing party.

It was a , , long abatis made of long sharpenedon the ends and driven intothe earth at such close spaces that they formed a bristling fence upon the sharp pickets of which there was every danger of all the Glandelinians being impaled.

To late did Dalaion discover the trap, into which he and his infantry of two million men had fallen. It had been a fatal charge, but courage and determination might yet take them out of the jaws of death into which they had intered. The purple coats at the top of the little hill were beginning to pour a withering fire upon the cursising and swe swearin Glandelinians, and Dalaion saw that he must make a desperate effort or suffer a terille defeat and perhaps have his command wiped out of exisitance.....

"Charre mens." Fairly screamed Dalac Dalaion; "We must take the works if it is our only hope of escaping from the kjaws of death."

The glandelinians raised such a yell that would have set ter or to the fro hrowent man and chevered. Now while hundreds of thousands of the glandelinians u opened a murderous fire upon the Angelinians tothere feet down the long the ends of which were not embedded in the ground so that instead of forming bristling fence the barrier would serve as a ladder for the enemy to ascend to the christians ove r.

Bending down be bristling logs which had formed an insurmountable barrier at the start the glandelininsclimbed upon them them, made steps of the very objects which had so threatened them and began rapidly making their way th tward the christiens. On they rushed cleared the barrier with a shout and rushed pel'mell upon the purple coats and like been they swarmed over the breastowrks, but next met a bristling hedge of p pikes and bayonets. The glandelinians were not dismayed at this sight and opened fire all along the line seeming to mow down all the purple coats. Delsion urged on his men with great vigor, and terrific and frightful became thera'tling of musket butts against musket butts the clash of mulitudes of bayonets, and the thundering of cannons The christian line at this point extended for thirty miles and along this whole line the fire or bayonet tumulte never ceased as more and more were fortunately coming to the aid of the christians.

In the meantime general Clyde worten was moving along Gertrude's Creek with his forces when he was aroused by general Calvine, with the air stirring news that Jone's lines was being attacked with unabated fury and that their commander was mortally wounded..... General Calvine had rode across the field for a mile to inform the commander, and told him that the danger was lurko lurking everywhere,, from the enemy and the forest fires....

Mor horten expressed no surprise and playfully said to Calvine;

"Well I thought thatit was heavy firing that I heard and was thinking that it was t time that some of you generals wer were coming to tell me what it was all about. I'll go to their aid rightaway."

He immediately ordered general Canton to rush totheir aid immediately, while he would follow in a few minutes. The glandelinians as he could see by his glasses were charging again and again in great waves of men while he also saw a large force moving against another line with the purpose of turning the left flank of the christians and cuting off their retreat....

The glandelinians were advancing in splid splinddi splindid style thouch short after shoot of 9. Flame burst from the ramparts for miles and miles with a horrible and stupendous roar tearing whole lines of theenemy down, mowing down whole columns, with their raking artillery fire and mangling the whole of the enemys main assaulting line with a terific storm of musketry...

The firing a long the christian line was appalling, yet their own linas seemed in danger of being overwhelmed. General Zoe Rass glandelinian division, h had been threatened with annihilation their leader was mortally wounded, general Belguimsinin left grand division was annihilatednad along Jones line of vertible hail fire and tumult of bayonets there was in its ake a terrible tale of suffering and horrore. In a grea f few minutes the greating f fighting force of two million men on the side of the enemy under Delsion extending for twenty five miles across the plains of the Daisy's and the Ferns were almost a' cut down , and though the supl supply of ammunition along Jones line was giving out, they were fully armed and the bayonets pikes lances and ca sabres and clubbed muskets did almost better work than all the firing combined. The extnt of the losses on both sides was just now unkown but it semed as if the intire glandelinian front would be wiped out if they did not retire or give up the assault before long.

Delsion was killed, Mc-Hollester miriam was wounded n and d scores of other Glandelinian generals not named were killed and wounded. Thousands of mines and gang-jang-shells were used in the mad fight to check the assailants, but this was too effective than believe d fifteen thousand dead being seen on the first line of works within the small space of works of about two thousand yards.

Untold hor ors had come inin the wake of this terrible calmni ty.

Hundreds of officers had gone mad, driven insane from the excessive roar of battle, terrible explosions, of such vol violence as to make the very plains seems to break into violent eruption a score of times at one moment , and also from the excitement. It was even almost impossible for the millions and millions of foolish Glandelinians to pass the bayonets of the Angelinians, a Abyssinkilians and Concentinians, though they were Omarian, Curdes, Mc-Hollestinians and Curdes plain, the Concentinian clc columns themselves doing the seemingly impossible task of really passing through the wedge of Glandelinian pikes and bayonets amid dumenating slaughter, and hell fire of musketry and cannon, the ground seeming to be diminited constantly, the Glandelinians not being able to do anything on account of the savage chr christian fighters called the Concentrinns.

The suffering was greater than the Calverinian fighting at Mc-Hol'ester Run, the carnage being ore terrific and there was now no avide ce that the christians themselves could now be checked as they pressed forward instead of the enemy. The diminters were t oppling over trees by scores of thousands but their e fforts were of no avail as the Angelinians swept mercile over the abysses made by the dynamiters and continued their progress of terrible slaughter.

Meanwhile Horten saw these signs signs of great activity and having been informed of what was going on resolved to seize whatever advantage might be gained. His men were aroused and swept forward in an counter charge, striking gosconce divisions right on the flank driving them pe'lmell over the first line of w works throwing them back with heavy loss. Jone's line was saved not notwithstanding all this Gosconce soon reformed his divisio n and after an hours lull the whole line in gray again came rushing forward with tremendous fury. The battle at once became generals One of the f mostfearful struggles of the second day's battle ensued. A heavy artillery of one ten thousand cannon was at once opened on the advancing e e enemy, the storm of lead canister and shell tearing the after line to fragments , but the survivors not only held their formation, but charged again and again on the christian lines with tremendousalacrity. Wve Waves after waves of glandelinians came forward, went back mangled and shat ered again and again only t o reform, stand their ground and then rush forward once more only to be repulsed with the loss of six hundred thousand per minutes.

The slaughter was terrific and now eight thousand glandelinian can on of the bi est material were brought up and hemmered away terific broadsides upon the christian lines. The air became clouded with dust and grome and seething storms of flame, the heat became almost intlerable but still the battle raged furiously. Thousands of shells fell among the christian lines, guns were blown up by scores, eve everything seemed on fire, hell seemed to break loose, and indeed the very ride of hell itself seemed to fall upon the christian infantry lines.

Horses and men were in a terrible mixture and most of the christian guns had to be withdrawn.

Scores of the christian general were at a lo loss of what to do, for though though they had ten thousand cannon to the enemys eight, the enemys guns being better were almost as destructive as a hundred thousand cannon, the glandelinian fire of artillery carrying all before it.

General Hanson seeing this scene rode up to general Stanislaw Mc-Hol ester the chief commanding general of all the Concentinian forces, and ordered him to assent forward his largestcavalry forces. At first he felt like refusing for it seemed like a sucidal intent, but Hanson said;

"Well then something has got to be done. No infantry could face that annihilat ing fire a minute and your forces are such swift racers that you could get across th those flower strewn plains in a few minutes. If you hold them back you will be responsible for the loss of the battle and of the useless slaughter that would follow, and be disgraced for disobedience."

At this Mc-Hollester accepted the initative and soon the forces were ready.

Then suddenly there was a fierce yell from thre million angered Concentinian forcesand the Concentinians having rathered up their full strength for a fierce and final effort came rushing forward wit with themost fierce sublime and tremendous fury ever seen in caverly charges, the pounding of many millions of horses hoofs fairly shaking the grounds.

The artillery man of the glandelinian batteries knew that they alone could not check such a violent avalanch of men though every man in the infantrlry lines upon to their feet and poured upon the cavarly forces a deber deliberate withering storm of fire. Whole divisions of the cavarly forces, were discomfited, enraged torn and bleeding, their dead and wounded companions with horses and all piled in disembowled heaps where they fe ll, but the survivors pressed on defiantly, and a large cavarly force sent against the glandelinians after a tremendous slaughter hand to hand, drew back toward the wor w rds twerd Jennie's Creek fighting with the stubborn fury of lions as they retired, and with a courage which filled the Angelinians with admiration.

The remaining cavarly forces made a hadlong rush among the guns of thelatt nies, the gunners were lanced or shot down, and the infantry forces behind the guns cut up and thrown back in the greatest confusion, the cavery pressing on for a mile carrying all before them wining a complete victory, for Hanson on e of the greatest victories of the war.

The ground after this great cavarly charge was red with gore, and thickly covered with hundreds of thousands of the bodies of slain men and horses. The gray and purple uniformed men were on long windrows on top of the works , and many thousands of poor cavarly men after hours of terrible suffering and almost bled to death were found writhing in mortal an agony. The burning woods in which the terrible batle had raged was torn and rent like one of the battle fields at Osternine by the storm of exploding shellsand solid shotand pierced with innumerable minnie balls. Many of the hundreds of bodies of men and horses on both sides had been blown to and for by exploding shells, here being fourds hundreds of arms and legs, feet heads and intestines everywhere, and t in in thousands of places there were vertible mangled massesof what were once human beings. New fires had been started by this battle yet neither side even after the last charge which had been made by the Concentinians did not abandon their main positions. It was late in the morning when suddenly a all of the ridge of hills as and as if swept away by a fierce conflargration, followed by the loud thundering roar of glandelinian artillery and sixty thousand six hundred and fifty guns neural a rattling rain of death and lead [illegible] Lines. The christian commanders were soon killed to order their men to lie flat on the ground and to take every advant ge of objects of protection. All this was done. But notwithstanding every precaution to lessen the destruction of life and property as something terrible indeed to behold is the [illegible] generals generals who witnessed this terrible artillery firing. A storm of solid shot, chainshot, shrapnell-shellsand high explosives, tore down all the woods on the christian front made the plains an endless scene of shell holes, hundreds of thousands of men and horses were cut up, hundreds of cassions filled with ammunition were exploded, and gun carriages and other pieces of war material were shattered to pieces.

Hanson himself consulting his officers of what the next move was to be found shells and solid shot crashing throughthewindows dor doorways and walls of he his mansion, and he was compelled to leave for fear of the house falling down from the concussion of the sursplitting explosions. The roof was rip ed off by a shell as they left the building men and horses around the place were being kil ' killed, and the pillars and verandas were blown away by a high explosive which wrecked the whole front of the building.

General Dare-not-lie was riding back and forth among his lines his infantry withdrawing in a great mixed up mass of men and horses, but he had his great batteries of artillery ready for action and instantly the whole ridge in possession of the christians armed ablaze, the din being fricfulthe thunder of eighty thousand cannon rivalling in fiercer eruduction the emotions of Mt Catherine, the leaden hails form of the Glandelinian artillery inar ousing in redoubled fury, while simultaneously the columns of glandellinians were seen forming on the very ends of shell swept woods.

When these lines were coming forward their front was about fifteight miles in extent, and it swiftly wrapped from the woods moving steadily and formly toward the christian lines, a thrill of admiration passing through the christian generals. It was indeed a splendid sight. The fre fresh divisions of Gomotze were composed mostly of Glandelinian s such as Zimmermantann, Gmerlan, Gurdan, Mc-Hollantinian and Gurdan, being formed and arranged in double line of battle . As the whole long waves of men advanced the christian batteries fairly hurs ered away a cur terrific cutting of artillery fire, the enemy indeed seeming to be rushing into the very jaws of death, for divisions after division was mangled and cut to pieces. In the face of the withering tempest of shell a nd high explosives the Glandellinians under Goncomo and Gomotze continued on their firm and steady step not being effected. On and on they came though the first line was already almost torn to fragments.

" I don'tbelieve that my lines can resist this fierce onset." Thought Hanson to himself; "Those Glandellinians fear no storm of shells nor dread no foes."

Dare-not lies positions were attheleft of the Glorinin River banks with Great Hearts lines well advanced in a long plain on his own right and at an angle of the main line and now their batteries let loose with all the fight and vain that could be thrown into them and the monsterous glandellinian brigade brigades were fairly river to pieces. Hansons divisions which were more to the right, and with general Michael in front were still silent. A severe artillery fire Angelinians e ridge caused one of the gray waves to make a bend toward their own right , the glandellinians moving on in their line of charges. Hansons divisions being directly in front of these very monsterous waves of men.

Now came the opportunity for Hansons brave veterans, who were not in such a haste to waiste their ammunition like the other com manders had been firing upon the enemy before they were well within range. The glandelinian waves were even allowed to come well forward. On they came and Hansons line still was silent.

The glandellinians believed that there was no one in these works at all and made a swift rush forward and were about upon the christians. There were then several sheep signals, were like the chirping of crickits, and a dazzling sheet of flame undulated along the whole of Hansons positions, other fearful sheets of flame succed suce succeeding in nearly endless an ant rueful succession, and the whole linethat moved over the paramants just before this tremendous discharge of cannon and musketry occurred went down, whole other great waves of men were horribly torn tot'ard, mangled and bleeding, and under the oblique fire of ten batteries of a thousand guns each of Gortrudes ridge, were also decimated in whole brigades/ and the second main line of assault or the rest of the waves of men coming on went to pieces there being a terrible panic momentum of confusion, and hundreds of thousands of glandellinians not able to endure this terrific withering fire were compelled to surre nder. General William S Bill was killed, and Sandy was also killed and General Robert Fre nell? Hin denberg, Horlicks and Invalidine were wounded. The main bot of the enemy however continued to press on Goncomo moving straight on theflelicians of Michael and general Christian. When the hostile lines were within ninety feet of the christian front the Angelinian leaders ordered their men to still hold their fire saying that they were not near enough, and his was done until the enemy were within a hundred feetand the main fire was let loose. That tore all the enemy advancing waves of men to fragments. Swift and terrific Swift and terrific was the response of the glandelininanswho now used their muskets for the first time since they began to face this terrible storm of artillery and musketry all at once the battlebecaming in full away. A great swing was made by the advancing columns to their own left after this terrific blow recieved from them by Michael and Hatchild who commands Killchilds divisions of seventh corps came swarming upon Dare-not-lies front like a pack of angry demons. Hiswhole line opened a simultaneous fire on Killchilds troops with his right front and rear . Hortens batteries being also in position, and the destructive effects of a very shot of bullets was added by a curtian of artillery fire the tempest of canister and grape falling all at once upon the already torn and decimited lines of Hatchilds whole commans the whole line being torne to fragments, and before stric on Hatchilds surviving survivors broj broke into utter confusion large numbers of them flinging down their weapons and retreating in panic. General Killchild was slain and mangled by a bursting shell and general Hatchid himself was probably mortally wounded but for a time was able to rally retain command and vainly strove to rally his men.

ANOTHER DEATH DEALING STONE WALL AND ITS HORRORS.

Go Gincomo Gomoes survivors were still rushing bravely on in spite of the dreadful dreadful artillery fire which was cutting their first lines to mere shivers, and they now came to a closed double stone wall commanded by in possession of the christians commanded by the great christian general McLaughlin his officers being at a hand and the whole christian line was held together despite the fierce volley the gray columns being shattered by the tumult of bayonets along the christian front. Despite it all however the Glandelinians had rushed themselves over the stone wall in despitethe disparity of bayonets and planted their tattered batle flags on the wall. The struggle was terrific and fierce in the extreme, being themost desperate hand to hand fight of the whole battle , hundreds of thousands of men facing each other in terrific death struggles battling with the energy of despair. The clothes of the generals themselves were being actually burned by the flashes of guns, exploding of cartridges, or the flar if burning powder, the christian commanders using every weapon they could in their hand to hand fight with the enemy. Pick axes were sud, shovels were fl lfourished at the heads of the Glandelinians even boots and shoes were used, pistols were used point blank, and sabres clashed by the thousan ds. Men even fought fist to fist, stabbing with da e dangers, and even scratch ing tearing and bit ing each other in their fury to conquer he othe or die in the attempt. Gincomo Gomoes lines had been left intirely alone for the forces which had covered his left had met with annihilating fires and were def defeated/ and now the whole of his lone besides that of James Gannon had be n badly cut up and destroyed and both he and Goncomo werewounded. Hannon indeed during this whole bat le had revealed the qual ities of a great commander now massed heavy reinforcements on the point which was in danger by the stone wall and cheered by words and fired by the examples of their officers the christians began to press bravely forward. The glandellinians did their best to check the counter charge fighting like true heroes that they were but theywere utterly overpowered and reduced to thelast stages of desperation, and flinging their long guns from them thousands started to raise their hands in token of surrender, others fell upon the ground to escape the destructive fire and the remainder seeked safty in precipitate flight, the Angelinians columns on pouring down after them in mon sterous waves, ui pouring across all the plaines and chrisingfor hours and hours against Ghommans line cutting it to pices and carrying all before them, wounding Ghoman and taking thousands of thousands of prisoners besides whole batteries of artillery and lots a large amounts of arms and ammunition and military stores.

regards the results of the first battle of Marcocinio and of the great forest fires, general vivian had not fully abandoned the seige and now that shoe man had been worsted by Hanson in the bloody battle of Gabibble town where a many millions fell general vivian decided to move forward again and strike ag another blow upon the enemy at Marcocinio.It was already drawing toward September and the main seige of Evangeline Crania was now in full sway, and for thirty days already the fortifications had ben been shelled continuously and the noise and racket of the big guns and the myriads of explosions every minute made most astonishing clamor. Hanson had pressed forward since his crushing victory at Gabibblestown which he declared was from the help of Gertrude Angeline in her successful spying and he determined to press the seige with more determined vigor. A few days more and greater christian armies were concentrating upon Marcocino.

The persistent seige of Evangeline Crania, and the danger of the Loe Lisghburg landing Crossroads, and the dangers of Marcocino alarmed alarmed the enemy seriously and they decided to fight fiercely this time and not to allow the christian armies to do the attacking by all means.The Glandelinian generals remembered that general vivian and the other christian generals had been victorous before, and that Marcocino was only saved by the forest fires started by shoeman which had compelled the christians to retreat, thus gapping the main line of seige at that point.But now with the fall of the town of Gabibbie, and Shoemann really retreating in con fusion before Hansons advancing armies, the enemy decided to strike themselves once more, and this time to take the christian army under general Vivian completely by surprise.

The plans of the enemy was to move forward as close to the christian lines without being seen, and to start some of their peculiar siga signal cries, and then to follow it up with a storm of wild yäls, and then to rush forward and mad make a desperate attack in large bodies.If this ruse would work, and the christians would be surprised, and be taken off their guard completely by the suddenness of the attack, all would be well and the seige would be broken.If not then Marcocino would fall.So the plans were being carried out.....

THE BATTLE OF MARCOCINO, AND ITS RESULTS..

Violet and her sisters were singing some beautiful hymn they knewand watching the distant forest fires when a cry that seemed neither human or earthly seemed to echos and reechos through the woods penetrating to the innermost hearts of all who heard its It was followed by such still'ness apparently as deepasif all the noises of the distant forest fire, the wind and other elemental things had been stopped at once at such a horrif horrid and unusual interruption.

"What was that terrible noise?" murmured Violet, aftera few moments of terrible suspence. They listened as if expecting the sound to be repeated.

"Was it one of those peculiar signal cries of thes the enemy that we had heard once before?" Asked Jennie.

"No , no it could not e bee This was too shocking and seemed very unearthly though their sioux signal cry is terrible also."

"Then what"

Suddenly thesame horrid cry filled the air, and made a creepy feline go through the little girls It kept on for several minutes and was heard undulating through the forest in distance and di dvinecadiences It indeed seemed unearthly and now suddenly changed to such a tumult of yelling and cries which made Violet and her sisters quickly rise to their feet in terror. It seemed for moment as if all the demons of hell h had possessed themselves of the air above them, and were venting their savage hu humor in barbar ious sounds. The cries came from no part icular direction though it penetrated the woods. Violet and her sisters ran ran for their horses, while bright flashes and the sharp reports of thousands of muskets suddenly rent the air. Violet's horse fell and a bullet grazed her cheeks She drew her rev l revolver but to her dismay she could see no one. The trees and shrubs around them were being cut and torn in a hundred places by a storm of bullets. The muskets flashed again and again in increasing numbers, and thelaves and barks of the trees in front of violet flew into the air and were scattered by the winds. The little girl dashed behind a tree her sisters d i doing the same and just in time for the leaden hail flew thicker than ever, and a tremendous roar of musketry was heard incessantly.

The rolling volleys made a great din and now the little girls seeing moving onjects opened fire themselvesand saw a number drop.....

Violet attacked attached her glasses to her e es and looked in the direction of the firing knowing it to be the enemy's picket lin es. What she saw thrilled her through. Angelinians in waves of men had burst down upon these picket lines in overwhelming numbers and were falling back to their reserves reserves delivering a volume of scattering volleys and yelling at the same times. The litle girl told this to her sisters and they retreatedand mounted a high rise of ground t to see more better.

All of a sudden Wyn came running up, hunt as a heavy cla ttering fire broke out at a new point.

"I believe there is going to be a big fight." Said Evangeline St Clare; "General Henrique St clare my cousin hasbeen attacked by the enemy and I'm a afriad he will be killed."

The sound of generalheavy firing now was going on followed suddenly by a tremendous roll of six hundred thousand musketry and a thousand cannons.

She saw thousands ofpurple coats lying on the ground dotting the field over which the firest line of battle had passed. She as also saw thousands of ambulances on some hurrying back with the first of the wounded.. Then the little girls saw thousands upon thousands of clo columns of puffy balls of smoke rise high into the air a the far distances, the ground seemed to shake under their feet , and then they saw t something that made them almost scream.

Jennie go and flag general Monte llicos divisions quick." She cried; "Heavy forces of Glandelinians are moving through the woods in long high waves of men to take these positions a Hurry for if they get here first the christian line will be flanked."

Jennie quickly obeyed and the first to come was general Montellicos artillery which soon opened a fearful fire, while at the same time the guns planted by general Thomas Evans on Swanconcordia ridge opened a terrific withering fire of canister mangling many of the columns of the Glandelinians at once.

It was general Ambrose Fullers Glandelinians which were advancing, through the woods under cow cover of their own artillery, which poured shot and shell into Evans rifle pits and among Jennings artillery linewhich looms like the form of Hedges.

Wyn alone, alone was terrified in the terrific din and hid behind a large rock to watch the coming carnage.

The Glandelinians were now swarming on the ridge just as thechristian divisions arived and the Mandelinians though driven back with terrible carnage re-returned to the assault with furious desperation. Severe and sanguinary fighting continued for over an hour during which time the Angelinians retained their position despite the furious assault made upon their lines. With an elated fury the attack continued but now two reserve brigades from the right were ordered up to assist in repelling the assault. These brigades advanced in double column and attacked the Mandelinians in the right rear the Angelinians making an opportune advance their appearance having been hidden from view by thick trunk and undergrowth. The suddenness of the attack disconcerted the Mandelinians and they fell back in disorder across the open field but halted and reformed in the edge of the woods which were already incredibly ablaze.

After a lull of fourteen minutes Ambrose Fullers Mandelinians again moved in line of battle by brigades with double double lines of skirmishers in front followed by reserves in mass. The six Mandelinia machine guns now roared terrifically above the thunder of the light artillery of the christian lines, all the ammunition along the Mandelinian front being ablaze having broken out into a conflagration in itself.

The Mandelinians slowly worked their way through the fallen and smoulder ing trees and though exposed to two different fires, the Mandelinians did not halt, making a bold and desperate push, breaking through these obstructions, despite the flank and reserve fires they met, which mowed them down in myriads, and threw many into confusion for a few moments. A good number of others too, to precipitate flight, many prisoners falling into the hands of the christians, leading a small number of men on and firearms.

The surviving Mandelinians continued to advance, the men fighting and climbing up the steep rise of ground scrubbing ravines roads, and less rugged parts.

The ground was so broken that it was impossible to keep a regular line of battle. The christian officers were exerting their utmost in surveying large bodies of men from to the right of the line to the center.

They could be seen by the enemy coming above the summit of the ridge in double quick time while already Collions divisions having lost their commander who was killed was being withdrawn from Fullers fronts. The christian generals were at the center doing their utmost to encourage their troops and urging them to stand firm and drive back the advancing enemy-- indeed so near that the big guns could not be sufficiently depressed to reach them and those though these became utterly useless as artillery men lighted the fuses of shells and flung them down by hundreds until the rapid gatling guns could be placed into position.

The critical moment now arrived when the summit was just within reach. At six different points and almost simultaneously Ambrose Fullers and general Nelsiches divisions broke over the crest only to meet a withering shot of grape and canister followed by long lines of undulating sheets of musketry fire which cut down a whole line. Ambrose Fuller was first near Jennings battleries, while Nelsiches tried to take the works under Castellibes command, but faced a sheeted torrent of missiles and canister which crushed and mangled whole waves of men so terribly that the scene indeed was as bad as the ridge at Gabilible towns.

Big Blackheart came up on Fullers right, Jennin ga battleries being captured after a desperate hand to hand fight, and these guns were turned upon those who still remained in the works and soon all were in flight down the western flopes. Blackheart got on the ridge in time to change front and oppose the large wave of purple coats which still remained on the ridge and after a short engagement he drove the Angelinians back way beyond the ridge which he at once occupied.

Dead and wounded on both sides lay thickly strewn on the smoking hill but thicker yet were the dead and wounded in grave. General Canoxcanoe whose troops were passing down the hill when Fuller came up halted at the foot, and turning to the north made a vigorous attack on un upon Nendons divisions posted at the foot to check his advance and cover the retreat of the christian line already driven from the ridges. Canoxcanoes division twice met with frightful slaughter and was driven back in confusion.

After taking an hour to reform his lines general Fuller pushed forward to take Canoxcanoes position. Jennings division which had rallied upon reserves ing reinforcements was thrown upon the right grand division of Ambrose Fullers army and the line thus reestablished moved forward with tremendous fury, reversed the tides of battle here there and rolled back the attack of Ambroses men with frightful loss to both sides. This fighting had been more severe and bloody than on the ridge and Thomannia Canning on the christian side was wounded.

The battle now extended on the southern direction with steady and determined attacks upon the west end ridge held by Castellibes but the Angelinians there still clung to their hold on the ridge against every effort to dislodge them cutting down every wave that surged above the works. The angry flashing of musketry, and its heavy roar mingled with the thunder of hundreds of cannon and the yells of the combatants was fearful.

Half an hour later despite it all Ambrose Fullers whole force force of veterans came up and swept forward to try once more to Dislodge The christian line under Jennin ns General Pugnose this le thi time led in person, under orders from Fullers. The heavy blow fell with the greatest force upon Jen ings corps south of the ridge. Key made what front they could and renewed the fight until the attacking columns overlapping the right wing it gave way and the whole line was rolled up from the right and retired in disorder along a burning plank road as far as the position of Henry Dargers lines which now opened a terrific fire upon the attacking forces. The Mandelinians pressed their advantage and were soon abreast of the artillery, storms of hale bullets and shells flying everywhere and for a while matters looked very serious for the Angelinians though one of the Mandelinian leaders by the name of Butcher Cou n had already fallen wounded.

General Berger after sending a message to send to hasten the march of general Henson Conrecmon's troops f went to the moment for a moment to the rear to assist in rallying the disordered troops and direct the fire of artillery when he himself was thrown down wounded and bleeding.

Conrecmons troops now appeared regardless of the confusion on every side marching their way steadily onward like an avalanche. Wallans division took the left of the smouldering smoking roads and his men coming into line under a heavy fire of shells moved obliquely under the menace of burning trees to the right to meet the left of the Mandelinian columns which had swung around in that directions. The Mandelinians along this point were checked in their swarming advance but the main line continued to press on though the Angelinians made a stubborn stand, despite Wallan falling mortally wounded.

Pugnose urged by Ambrose charged furiously with his whole command in the face of a sea of musketry blasts the Mandelinians advancing with apparent reckless forces. Nine hundred and ninty thousand Mandelinians under general Mobie regardless of numbers flanks or supports which they may face in attack ing the christians moved swiftly through the smouldering forests and dashed directly upon the Angelinians under Jennings. There was a terrific crash of musketry going like a million cannon at once mingled with wild yells in in less than fifteen minutes three quarters of that nine hundred and ninty nine thousand were lying upon the fields together the Angelinians having delivered a second staggering blow and for a time broke the force of the Mandelinian advance at this portions. Jennings and Natelaws divisions of Smarian Curdes one grandly crumbled to their support and the whole again swept forward, but were re rudely repulsed and driven back with terrible loss to a second wave of graycoats who rallied them and on they swept again bound to capture the already burning low breast works at any costs. This burning position was attacked in front and on the right from a ridge the smoking and blazing wooden planks of the Bendon crossroads and Natelaws Mandelinian columns was fairly crushed to fragments, the survivors yelling like demons as they retired backwards, reaching the first line of blazing breastworks now in their rear.

The Mandelinians had ben also met by a fr furious counter charge led being driven beyond the burning line of trees with more dreadful loss and two of their leading officer generals Cheff, and Muttington were killed and Taff and Bud Mabar were wounded. Other portions of the great Mandelinian waves still advanced the christian again holding their lines against a most determined attack in which the Mandelinian general officer Bod, and another Dare Bobo were shot from their horses as they rode close on to the christian lines on the burning Benton roads. The position however became untenable by reasons of the furious movements of the Mandelinians on their right, and of the forest fires and they retired behind the second line of works consisting of falling trees, d earth embankments and stumpwalls. The christian right wing simultaneously under Goodwill was rolled up in the greatest confusion toward the Ben on Bendon roads which were now being overwhelmed by raging fires and then back upon the burning burning plank road with heavier losses than before and Good will wounded twice.

Man while Mandelinians fir forces which had followed Pugnoses made a vigorious attack on the north of Bendons roads aided by Hagood and Love-land brigades these Mandelinian columns assuming the offense offensive and driving Henchens christians beyond the extensive line of burning wooden breastworks scout worked prowling to this great onslaught.

Fires now became more threatening but the battle raged on. Stuart fanatically an unsuccessful attempt was made now to turn Roswell Slater Johnstons left grand division and heavy assaults were made upon these positions only to meet with frightful decimation every time. Yet so persistent were these attacks on the front of Grouthearts brigades that other troops were brought up to the rear to the support and these finally paid a terrific slaughter bought Magruders division of Mandelinians back with a staggering defeat. The Mandelinians under Mc general Pugnose continued to press on and overlapping the right of Jeffers columns made a sudden and determined attack upon it, the christians here being driven from their works with the loss of one thousand prisoners, among them being three colonels and one sergeant.

On crossed the Mandelinians under Sanders throwing themselves heavily against the christian lines which resisted by the timely arrival of Ph Phils brigades re newed the attack with frightful slaughter. Then general Baldon was ordered up from the right with Mahonen and Butcher Gomes divisions, and moving rapidly toward the Angelinians attacked jennings divisions with frightful fury, but were again driven back with more severe loss than ever and Baldon , Butcher Gomes and Mahonen fell riddled by bullets.

Meanwhile general Ambrose Fuller was not idle elsewhere He had plenty of reserves and after another lull lasting fully an hour suddenly made the most des perate efforts to break through the christian lines confronting himbefore the main divisions came to its aid/The first general assault was made upon the whole line at this point almost simultaneously, and met with a complete and bloody repulse.
But again with incredible fury the gray and gray columns pressed forward to the attack, and the whole line was rocked back torn and bleeding leaving the ground covered with hundreds of thousands of their dead and wounded.

The Glandelinians however were reckless despite their severe losses. Again they came into view from the line of burning trees, one big wave of men after another , first in quick time thenat a rush, the first waves of men slowly melting away before the pitiless storm of bullets that met them, but those in the rear pressed forward, over their dead and wounded comradesand reached the works held by Jennings.
These gallant fellows stood manfully to their works. Their whole line was bent backwards and crushed to fragments by the terrific pressure, but the survivors continued the fight in the rear of the works, with bayonets, pistols, clubs and clubbed muskets.

Fortunately for them, Gallios brigades had cleared their own frontand portions of it turned upon theflanks of their assailants who were finally driven outleaving many dead and wounded outside the works.

While this attack was in progress another quite as de termined was made further to theright in front of Ratrabrooks divisionsof corps and artillery men. Dallions corps at the death of their leader were broken into pieces and swept out of its works with great loss, but as the attacking force poured through the gap thus made, Daniels brigades on one side and Peatikes on the other drew back from their lines and fell upon the enemys flank, while Emery and Jack Johnston's brigades were hurled up from the left and thrown across the Glandelinian fro front. Assailed on three sides at once, the Glandelinians were forced back to the works and over them where they broke in disorderly retreat. The lines of christians under Jennings however suffered a disaster.

Dense columns of Glandelinians led by Pugnose and Nugood emerged from the directly direction of a fiercely burning palm forosthalf a mile to their rear and rushed to the attack with exceedingy violence.

They came on in great disorder, their wave of men extending as far across the open as could be seen. Jennings battalions of artillery unfortunately were not in possession or in position to fire upon the attacking columns which offered so fair a am mark for artillery.

The gunnersstrove frat frantically to bi bring them up but at this moment the Glandelinian surge came upon them n and after a desperate hand to hand fight the guns were captured before they could fire a single shot.

The infantry lines of the christians fou ht nolong as fight ing wasof any use but the poor christians being deprived of the assistance of the artillery which consistuted the chief strength of the position, and as those guns were now turned upon them they could do little to check the onrush of the assailants which soon overran the salient, capturing every gun of the second battery, and 7, 822,000 prisoners, almost Jennings entire first division. The whole thing happened so quickly that the extent of the disaster could not be realized at once.

Nelligoons troops who helped to make this bloody and successful assault, had re covered their reformation, and extending their lines across the works on both sides of the salisent had resumed their advance, when Phils brigades of field corps which was immediatintely on the right of the captured works, rapidly drew back to the unfinished line in the rear, and every one of hisrankspoured in a galling fire upon the left wing of the assailants which checked their advance and threw it back with serious loss.

General Love hreart whose immense divisions were in reserve and under orders to support any part of the line about the works hastened to throw them in front of the advancing Glandelinian columns, who were charging as furiously as they knew how.

The two moving lines met in the rear of the captured works and after a fierce struggle the Glandelinians were driven back to the base of the salient.
But,evehearts divisions did not cover their whole front.... If On the left of the salient w where woenes divisions had connected with Norgonians the attack was still pressed with great determination. General noss drew out Phils brigade from the l left of the line , a portion of Joices taking its place, and sent it to relieved the pressure on his right and restore the line between himself and Norgonia.

Phils brigades swept the trenches the whole length ofhis line, but did not fill the gap and his right was exposed to a terrible withering fire from the works still held by the enemy. Three divisions of his own army were ordered up.

Markus which was the first to arive rushed forward through a fearful withering fire and after a terrific combat recovered apart of the line on Norgonians lifet .

But at this moment general Markus fell dead from his horse just as he reached the works, general Daniels had be killed and Phil though painfully wounded,.... remained in the trenches with his men. Ross as right was still hard pressed.
Harvest and Mc-Low Mc-Swans brigades were ordered up, and these rushed through the same blinding storm of bullets into the works on Phils right. The Glande linians still held the greater part of the sal sailent, and though all this fierce concentration of the Angelinians just now failed to drive them out the enemy could get no further.

Pugnose's corps which had made the attack, had been reinforced by Despairs division s of the seventh corps and one half of Crawfords corps.

The batt le now increased furiously..... Artillery had be n brought up on both sidesthe Angelinians using every piece that could be made available against the sailent.Butcher Gou had a s also put in every man that could be spared at that time for the restration of his broken center, consisting of Gmarians troops which had suffered crushing losses in the recent attack. It now became a matter od of endurance with the men themselves..... For three hours the battle raged with unceasing and frightful fury in the space covered by the sailent and theadjacent works..... Every attempt to advance on either side was met an and repulsed from the other f with the most frightful decomination ever seen... The hundreds of di fferent hostile flags waved over differnet portions of the same works while hundreds of thousands of the men fought like fiends for their possession. The very mouths of hell seemed to have opened and was rioting in its sulphurious fumes. During these few hours of deadly conflict diversions were made on both sides to relieve the pressure on the center. An attack upon general Jack Hendersons corps by Hallies sixth corps of Glandelinians was severely repi repulsed, while on the other side of the sailent general Hopkins who was moving with general Chickaddees corps to strike the flank of the Angelinian force engaged in a bloodier fight there than ever but nonetheless corps which were advancing at the same time to attack Phils lines encountered an annihilating fire of four thousand pieces of artillery which swept all the approaches to Hillstones lines, and these attacking forces millions strong were reduced to fragments and driven back in disorder before it came well within range of the muskketry of the infantry. Chickadees divisions encountering no cannon fire as yet continued to press forward and made a heavy attack with the combined divisions un der Hoke and Killshaw. Glingmans brigades on Hokes left gave way and Woofferds on Killshaws right being turned turned was also forced back. As the attacking columns swept over this part of the sailent a loud cher was given as it rushed into the angle of the sailent. The front covered a little more than the line of brigades of less than ten thousand men.

But line followed line untill the place enclosed by the sailent became a mass of writhing human beings upon which the Angelinians musketry and artillery played with cruel effect. Butcher Gou had taken a position on a slope in the rear of the line and here he got a wound that laid him low. Violet and her sisters who were carefully noting the firing of the whole christian line which had become so heavy that they feared that they would exhaust their small ammunition before the attack ceased, had just been missed by a score of shells aimed purposely at the spot to down them. The men were in fine spirits laughing and talking as they fired, but there too it could be seen more plaintly the terrible havoc made in the ranks of the assaulting columns. Never before since the other battle had there been such dreadful havoc among the woods of or such destructive carnage.
It was not war it was murder. Probably more than six million six hundred thousand Men lay for miles and miles in front of their works either killed or too too badly wounded to leave the field. Among them there werequite a number of Glandelinians men and officers together who were not hurt, but remained among the dead and wounded rather than take the chances of going bak under that mer ciless fire.

Most [illegible]

Most of these came in and surrendered,,/but werefired on in some instances by their own men who still held a position close to the christian line to prevent them from doing so... He The christian artillery was handlye handled suberly during thefierce action..... General sanguine chief of artillery of Nelshaws division not onl only cooperated with wne energy in strengthening the christian line but directed the fire of his guns with great skill during the attack reaching not only the front of the attacking force but its flank also as wel well s as those of the supporting troops. While they were busey with the eighteenth corps on the center the sound of battle could be heard both on the right and left of general Vivians main center and the brave vivian Virle knew what it meant..... It was a general advance of General Fullers whole line Glandelinianinio, and Inman Parobecks corps was attacked in a furious manner but without success. On their right where the line extended tward the line of burning woods, it was broken at one po point but at once restored by Micahels brigades with heavy loss to Gandons corps of Mc-Hollestinians who were attacking there.

The result of the action along the whole christian line along he point where Jennings ll es had been crushed to fragments presented a fair picture of the result, along the entire line, a grad driving assault, a desperate five hours struggle a bloody and crushing repulse.

But terrific was the co rnage a, a long along Gen eral ivians main center. The landelinians after making a soi series of furious assaults in which hundreds of columns w were mangled and crushed and large waves of men beaten down at last leaped over the breastworks and after a fierce hand to hand conflict with the bewildered Angelinians in w which guns were used as clubs the lande liniand landelinians possessed themselves of the trenches. The advance of these Glandelinians was ir estiless and upon reaching the main line of works held by a part of Baldwins infantry under Wailen whnat on who by this time became aprised of the disaster to their comrades and thes landelinians met with fierce resistance.

Ambrose Fu er in the meantime had been hurrying troops to K widland from vans from Yens on the right and gorden on the el left and these were sprung upon the christian lines with great fury and with such a impetus as to drive them hastily back tward Nolends crossroads. Wailen however was reinforced and made desperate efforts to regian what they had o lost... General Nelly's Angelinians were hastily retiring from the burning timber forest before the concentrated attack of the landelinians and hess with so an many wounde wounded that they could not be counted lined the road under the swinging menace of burning branches. General Wailens main line however still held a large part of their burning works.

The landelinians pressed forward and clearing the smoking woods reached an ied insedious fen covered with dense marsh grass, where they lay down a few minutes awaiting orders. It was marvelious how any of the landelinians survived the sharp fire that swept over them at this point a fire so keen that it split the blades of grass a all about them the minnies moan ed in a furious concert, as they picked out victims by the tens of thousands.

The smoke of the forest fires o and of battle held the countr country about in obscurity..... The command was soon given to the landelinian divisions it being the advance of Gallions brigades, to rise up whereupon with u hurrahs they went forward cheered on by gneal Canno Canbie. It was not long before they reached an angle of works constructed wih great skill. Immediately in their front an abatis had ben erected con x consisted of branches and limbs interwoven into one another forming footlocks of the most da dangerous character.

But there the works were, and over the landelinians went many thousands never to return.....

At this moment Canbies strong line line lf of battle selected for the work of retriving ill fortune appeared through the wr wreaths of smoke. The Angelinians all t along their whole line received their bolts losing nearly six million six hundred thousand of their go gallenth sixthy forth corps. Wailen saw at once that this point must be held at all hazards fr for if the Glandelinians should ever take this angle they would be able to sweep back his right and left and the battle would probably be lost. It was now eleven o Clock since four in the morning when it started and still the battle raged. The order was at once given to lie down and commence firing with all their might. The left of Wailens div isions rested against the main line of works wiwhile the right slightly refused rested in front and now began a desperate and most pertinacious struggle. Under cover of the s smoke Ambrose Fuller was pushing large bodiesof troops forward deter mined at all hazards to take the angle. Wailon wondered if his line would hold on untill the remainder of his divisions and even reinforcements would come to their assistance.

Regardless of the heavy volleys of the landelinians which were thi nin thinning their main line ter ibly the christians struck to their position and returned the storm of fire untill the other brigades came to their support , while the battalions went in on their right. Thus reinforced they redoubled their exertions. The smoke which was dense at first was inc nciflod by each discharge of musketry to such an extent that the accuracy of their aim became very uncertain, but nevertheless they kept up the fire in the direction of the enemy. Meanwhile they were crawling forward under cover of the smoke untill reaching a certicertain point, and raising thi their horrible "Devil Yell" they charged gallently up to the very muzzles of the Angelinian cannon and occupied the works after a fearful struggle.

Upon reaching the breastworks the landelinians for a few moments had the advantage of the angelinians and made o horrible use of their rifles and of the captured christian artillery. I The angelinians went down in too many thous thousands to relate correctly, and the gallent Wailen was the only mounted officer in sight. Hat in one hand and sabre in the other he bravely cheered his men an d begged them to hold this point. All of his staff officers had ben killed and wounded or dismounted/ the killed being generals, Fred Cary, Nolandine, Hennie Phoemannia, Logan Hendon, Cary Hendon, Fred, Hendon, James Hendon a nd Jack Hendon all brothers incli including others as follows James Fredrick, Hamndonia, abblinia, and Feddinie. Those wounded were Cory, Henry Fredricksonia, Henry Ressurrection, Resurrectinca, Pliny, Prancitus , Bellie , Hellie , Callie and Folie. James Fendonia, , Jennings , and Walterintin were mortally wounded.

Yet every general who had survived the terrible storm of slaughter had his horse and their uniforms were torn to shreds and every every officer after the battle counted more than twenty holes in their hats alone/ and some of the officers liter I89I ally found bullets in their coat pockets. At this moment when the ground open ground in the rear of the christian works were chocked with glandelinian troops ten ten batteries of Gathling guns under general Richard Baldwin was brought into action increasing the terrible carnage by opening at short range with double charges of grape and canister cutting down all the landelinians chocking the open ground a fearful slaughter indeed. This staggered the app arent exultant glandelinian forces. These guns in the maze of the moment were run up by hand and fired again and again, and they were only abandoned when all the drivers and cannoneers cannoneers had fallen. The battle was not at white heat and clouds of smoke hung hung over the scene. Like leeches the glandelinians stuck to the captured works determined by their fire to kep the Angelinians from rising up. In a few more minute fivehundred breastfield pieces cut and hacked by the bullets of the opposing sides lay unworked with their muzzles protruding over theworks and their wheels half sunk in the mud and gore. Between the lines and near at hand lay thousands of horses of the guns completely ri ddled by bullets or disemboweled by shell fire. The dead and wounded were fairly torn to pieces by the canister as it swept the ground where they had fallen.

The smoking debris was knee deep and by the constant move ments of the fighting glandelinians the fallen were almost buried at their feet. The glandelinians now backed off from the breastworks a few yards, abandoning for a while their parks of twelve poutders, but still keeping up a dreadful fire. The glandelinian s then again closed their shattered and torn lines and sett led down again to their tasks. The glandelinian fire was now directed at the top of the smokin smoking breastworks and woe be to the head or hand that ap eared above it.

In the meantime another brigade went into action on their right delivering a most destructive fire and themext approaching brigades went hard at p work hamssing away with their firearms.

Two brigades under general Joseph Barlow's assistant was n ow at an angle of the wp works and general Duckwicks brigades went deep into the struggle which increased with terrifing furye. The roar of firearms had become indescribable and also that of artillery. The second and third divisions of thesecond corps were also ready to take part, and it will thus be seen that they had l on los lack of men for the defense or capture of this position which ever it may be termed.

The great difficulty was the prescribed limity of one part of the angle of the works around which they were fighting which precluded the possibility of geting more than a limited number into actin at ca ce.

At one time their lines were crowded in some parts ten deep bt by reinforce ements. The glandelinian losses itself was frightful. A continuous and rapid fire was maintained to which the enemy replied with vigor. Majoy general Henry Kemp commanding one of the glandelinian brigades was killed and general charles Diebleman who succeeded him was shot dead.

A moment general Calie who had excited the admiration of the glandelinians was shot through the arm and body with a rewarod during one of the several atempts to get his men to cross the works and drive off the Angelinians. What remained of many hundreds of diffdenent big division s that had come to their support had con centrated at this poin t and had planted their tatt ered colors upon a steep rise of ground close to the angle of where they stayed untill shot to pieces by the storm of bullets. To keep up the cunl cupply ofammunition packed mules were brought into use each animal carrying three hundred poun ds though almost dropping under such a heavy load. The boxes were dropped close behind the troops engaged when they were quivkly opened by the officers and file slashes who served the ammunition to the men. Wailen fired five hundred rounds of ammunition and many others as many more. Finding that the glandelinians were not to be driven back the angelinians bec began to use more discretion, exposing themselves gu but little using the loopholes in t their works to fire through and at times placing the muzzles of their rifles at the top loge of the breastworks coising the trigger and on small of the stock and elevating the breech with one hand to reach the landelinians. During the day one of the new batteries took position behind them sending broadside after broadside of shells over their heads to explode among the glandelinians. In like manner coehorn mortatr coehorn mortars e g eight hundred yards in their ra rear send their shells with admirable precision, gracefully curving over them.

Sometimes the landelinian fire would slacken and the moments would become so momentious that something had to be done to ei stir them up. Then some resolute Angelinian would seize a fence rail or piece of abatis and creping close to the works thrust it over among the enemy, and then drop on the ground to avoid the volley that was sure to follow.

A daring general whose name was Cain conlain one of the light infantry divisions divisions leaped upon the breastworks took a rifle that was handed to him and i discharged it among the fie. He like manner discharged another when his feathery braid flew up into the air , and his body pitched headlong among the enemy.

So continuous had ben their fire that theheadlogs of the whole line of breastworks tens tens of miles long were cut and torn untill they resembled Hickort brooms. Hundreds of thousands of large palm trees, already burning, and which grew in front of the opposing trenches of either side , and which even grew in the rear of theworks were completely ka knawed off by their converging fire and fell among the Angelinians and Glande.inlandelinians with a loud crash killing and injuring thousands, scattering a shower of burning embers and sparks, and pinioning many others unde their burning branches.

The trenches all along the whole line and even on the right of the angle ran with blood and had to be cleared of the dad and wounded bodies more than fuorty times.

Tward noon the enemy had retired cautiously, and preparations were made to relieve Wailens Angelinians. By his time they were nearly exhausted, and had fired one thousand rounds of ammunitionper man. The lips of the men were encrusted from with the powder from biting cartridges, their hands and shoulders were coated with blood that had add adhered to the butts of their rifles and their uniforms were torn and even half burned by the powder of exploding cartridges.

The troops of the second divisions who were to relieve tha now moved upand took their posit position and evening fire upon the receding foe, as the others fell back a a short distance to rearrange their shattered lines and get sometiscmething to eat in which they were sadly need of.

They fairly dropped from exhaustion. Hundreds of thousands of Angelinians dad or dying lay piled over one another. The fa ll fa The fallen lay three or four feet deep in someplaces and i with but few exception s they were shot in and about the head. Arms accouterments, ammunition, cannon shot and shells, and broken foliage were strewn about. It was the most horrible sight ever witnessed and it was fortunate that the struggle cased along this p p portion.

But still the conflict raged along a portion of general vivians linea. The assailants drew the fire along newly discovered batteries and set w whole lines of musketry extending scores of miles ablaze.

Men see divisions moved up in a long line with skirmishers well out. Stally chief of artillery arranged thre batteries to keep the enemy from advancing around the unprotected flank, and thi the bravgeneral commanding the twenty third corps against a storm of bullets and shells swung his divisions around to follow the bend in the enemys lines.

The air was full of screeching shells, and wi whizzing bullets causing uncomfortably near, while line after line though already badly torn and mangled in earlier actions were adjusting themselves for the consumanation of the deadly conflict.

On Gandon hills one of Si mion Legrees and cannons divi ions under general Ju n Judas and Stntta Annin had a fearful half an hours struggle losing over sob seventy hundred thousand men. The others coming to i s helpcaptured and secured a gun part of the christian works or inren intrenchements. The front was stacked, and repulsed, but heavy columns came swinging around A Stailoys lf left, every b tatery man and supporting infantry doing great wonders, but if it had not ben for the prompt arival of help rendered, general Luckwick Baldwins whole line would hope ben rolled up and displacedlike theleft of Wellintions at Waterloo.

Amid the frightful carnage No-Love, general Gloom and black cloud, were killed,, Legree , Can on and Judas were wounded. General Dodger who had ben sent in time brought up General George shelbys divisions from Lovafriends corps as quickly as men could march or run. Stailoys brave artillery men were thus secured or succorded before being forced to veild their ground. Then came the Glandelinians cheering loudly and confident that their superior numbers would gain them success. They approached to within fifty yards yards of the line firing rapi ly. A sheet of flame, a deafening roar was the answer, and the countless dead and wounded lay piled up before their works. A color bearer while his comrades were retiring a few steps for better better cover of the ground bing chargrined at the defiant yells from the Angelinians behind him unfurled his flag and swung it to the breeze breeze. He was instantly killed, but there were other hands to grasp the flag and it came back only to return and wave from the spot where its former bearer fell.

Fresh forces of the Glandelinians reinforced by those who forcely retired now began to advance in a column of deployed brigades. The christian generals watched with the most eager excitment this great pass age of arms, the divisions of Glandelinians under Butler-Hade. They coi coined some trenches and cheered but were stopped before a sort of lunette holding one thousand seven hun dred cannon.

The Angelinians were driven from their trenches but the Glandelinians meeting a continous and deadly withering fire could not get the guns at all big as their numbers in men were, drawing upon themselves the fire of new batteries as well; well the shells bursting among their torn and mangled lines with astonishing rapidity.

The new sound of cannon spondily drew the Glandelinian general to the point of dangw and he immediately ordered the necessary changes. Pelvince divisions having passed on faced about and came back while Fralsons field corps hastened up.

These each forming parallel lines promptly assaulted the christian position again and again. Baldwins brave Glandelinians went forward through the burning forest only to run upon log barricades which were so throughoutly manned that to take them in the face of such a severe fireas uttorly impossible. Of course this meant for the Glandelinians a succession of bloody repulses. The enemyslosses from the trenches in front and from artillery that tore their lines one after another to fragments were vas very intolerable, the christian fire being terrific, but the Glandelinians did not stop unless struckn untill they gained the edge of the fooled felled trees thousands penetating at once to fall dead c. close to the christian parapets.

But most of the others sought shelter ne behind burning logs and rocks, in rifle hole holes and depressions in the ground. Harkrelog, Harkreligion moving with them cheered on his men and when they were forced to stophe rallied them agan and made a second vigorious effort in which he fell mortally wounded. Derrices effort was like Harkreligion 's. He met the same withering fire of rifle balls and shells and canisterand was killed. But despite his death the men managed to make a shelter which they kept close up to the hostile lines. Here under a destructive fire they stayed and intrenched untill heavily reinforced by Legree Dunn.Hen they came surging through the burning woods up the gentle slow slope with great noise and fury and yelling like demons.

As to the Angelinians some of them were protected by rails but the rest had not time to barricade. Liebiemanns masses advanced successfully free his right,as general Beppo was the first assailed. His rifle and cannon lines fired with utmost steadiness and incessantly, soon re pl repueling the front attack, but whole divisions went far east of them. Thomans Evansbehind a creek was watching. He t rned some reserves upon these Glandelinians and fired his storm of shells into thesmoking thicket, that bordered the deep creek, sweping the length of the creek as far as his biggest guns would reachmaking terrific carnage. The hostile flankers broke back cut up and thrown into confusion. In succession Geary, WardNelcion, Palmer, and Jack Evansions recieved the oncoming human waves, and though their lines were shaken shaken and broken into shattered and mangled masses,they each made a strong resistance, and soon rolled the Glandelinian wave backshattered to pieces and in confusion.

Yet general Halio offingotts divisionsupported by Jiles and Smith who now came up cheered the rise of ground and carried it though with aheavy loss and the four general officers shot from their horses. It could hardly be imagined to hear the loud boom ing roarof thousands of artillery, and the angry sounds of million s of musketry as the christians repelled the assault before being forced to yeild.

The Angelinians had put in a cross fire of artillery but the attack ing forces despite the losses of four of their generals swept away the bold Angelinians by a charge in d double double line. Ward and Palmers were killed killed and Nelsionand Geary were wounded. Along other parts of the line the Glandelinians with a terrific yell charge through the burning forest regardless of the blasting heat and flying embers. They were met steadily and repulsed by a part of the main line but in the impulse a large score ofLandelinian divisions passed beyond Logans extreme right. Four divisions came from wedge. Inspector general Stronzer led thither two from Blair armed with repeating rifles and the chief of artillery placed several parks of artillery to as to scoop that exposed flank.

These were brought in at the right moment, and after a few rapid discharges the repeating rifles being remarkable in their execution , all the divisions of flankers were eithe cut downor had sought safty in flight under a galling fire of artillery and reptenting rifles.

The increased sound of musketry indicated so sharp a conflict that lieutenant general Hardee was requested to send general Cranberrys brizades to the help of the christiansat Kenzia creek, and to take command there himself. These occessions soon decided the contest, and again and again was driven back from his works by the assailant he himself being mortally wounded in unsuccessfully repelling the last onslaught. A sharper engagement was occuring at the same time on the crest of ahill where Greathearts right and center joined Batwen Pett us brigade holding that poit point, and troops of the fourt h corps, the assailants here being repulsed with frightful and u inhuman decimination .

But soon a much larger force a assaulted the troops and with great determination but the Glandelinians were again defeated with a loss propp proportionate to their courage and daring. Assaults as vigorous vigorous and resolute were a made at the same time on Amiles and on Petes and Pots. The Angelinians who fought under cover had but trifling losses in these combats, but the Glandelinian troops fully exposed lost heavily, the more bacs use Glandelinian troops are not to be driven back without severe losses. The next hour spirited fi ghting was maintained by the enemy on the whole front, a very vigorous atack being made on Hindmasdivisions of Beppos corps which was also handsomely repulsed. But sharper fighting continued steadilyand with so much vigor, thatmant hundreds of thousands of the assailants pressed up to the intrenchments only to be mowed down. A litle before two o-clock in the afternoon Steqarts division s was fiercely attacked Kallioss troops also, and the action continued two hours without pause, when finally the assailning lion crushed to fragments fell back. The canister shot out out of nint nine thousand field pieces and the millionsof musketry a t short range effected havy loss upon the foe, and now after a cannonading of all thetheir artillery theGlandelinians assailed the christian right wing especially in the center.

The army of gra/ ocate advanced fiercely against the first and t those of green against the other although suffering losses out of all proportitions to thouss they inflicted the glandelinians pressed up to the christian intrenchments in main many places maintaining the unequal conflict for two hours and a hlaf, with the persevering courage and deap desperation of angels and all the line for fifty miles a furious fire of ari artilley and musketry was kept up!

At all points the Angelinians met the glandelinians with determined courage and in great force delivering a most desc destructive fire. The glandelinians fought very bravely as usual, many hundreds of thousands falling close to the christian parapets, columns of Angelinians being killed within their own tenches.

The glandelinians encountering an incessant fire of artillery and musketry suffered heavier but they came on as steady and irrestiless as a tidal wave. A couple of batteries in the first or advanced line h gave them a broadside and galloped back to he works. A volley from a thin skirmish line was sent into the glandelinian wave without causing any delay to the massive array.

A moment more and withh that wi wild ''Davil Yell'' which once heard is never forgoten the great human wave wave swept along and semed to engulf the litle force which had so steadily and sturdily awaited it. The first shock came of course upon the two misplaced brigades of Wagners division which through some ones blunder,(Mike Braggards) had remained in their fasle position untill too late to retire without serious disaster.

They had no tools to throw up works and when struck by the irrestiless sweep of Elliburnsand Bil'lous divisions they had only to make their way as bbest as they could back to their main works. In that wild rush in which friend and foe wi were intermingled, and the piercing ''Devil Yell'' rose h high aveabove the christian cher seven hundred thousand seven hundred christians were mamade prisoners.

But worse of all for the christian side the men of Rielly and Strick1 Strickalands brigades dared not fire less they should shoot down their own comradesand comrades and the guns loaded with grape and canister stood silent in the embrasures.

With loud shouts of;

''Let's go in the works with them.'' The triumphant Glandelininns now more like a wild howling mob than an og orginized arn army, swept on to the very works without hardly a check from any quarter.

So fierce was the rush that a good number of the fleeing Angelinians and officers drop ed exhausted into a deep dithditch and lay there while the ter rific hand to h nand fi fight raged over their heads.

On Strickalands left close to the line of works was posted one of the new infantry divisions. The tremendous onset, the wild yells, the whole infornal din of strife was too u much for such an un disciplined division. An they saw their comrades from the advanced line rushing to the rear rear they too turned and fled. The on contagion spread wildy and in a few minute a disorderly stream of human beinrs was pouring across a large plain and past a burning stockade. The guns were abandoned and the works the whole line deserted, only to be occupied a few mini minutes later by Elliburns and Browns glandelinians who swarmed over the works.

At this crit ical juncture genera l Emerson unordered, had brought his command within the vinicity of the ca ptured works, and seing the fearful peril ordered forward his well disciplined brigades, which deploying at it advanced was soon involved in as fierce a hand to hand fight as ever soldiers engaged in.

The columns which formed Rellifssecond line had re mained steadfast, and also rallied to the work. A large part of Comrades and lanes men as they came in gave the enemy a hot reception. Amid the frightful carnage general Emersons horse was shot from under himand he fought on foot at the head of his brigades. General Cox was everywhere present encouraging and cheering his men.

In the meantime this part of the battlebatle had assumed all its furv. General Stailey galloped up to the f front as soon as possiblesand di all that a brave man could do untill he was painfully wounded.

Some of Emersons men man ed the abandoned guns in Reillys works others filled the gaps in Strikklands line which now balsed with the fierce firing. When there was nothing to hinder the christian fire the muskets of Phile brigades made fearful havoc, while the batteries along the Angeline Railroad cut ploughed hundreds of lanes through the main lines of the advancing foe.

Time after time millionscame up to the very works thogh they were mowed down in hundreds of thousands, the nearest survivors never crossing them. Sixten color bearers of the glandelinians were shot down on the parapet. It was impossible even toexaggerate the fierce energy with which the glandelinian soldiers threw themselves against the works fighting with what seemed the very madness of despair. Despite the strong wind the dense smoke of the vesy firing alone settled down upon the field almost like storm clouds and it wasbecoming impos ible to see even at any distance beyond the line. Through this blinding medium assault after assault wasmade but meeting with such frightful decima decimation that no one could exaggerate it. Several of thechristian officers that evening afterward in their reports to general Vivian stated, that their lines had recieved as many as sixteen distic distinct assaults and that over one hundred fifty thousands glandelinians were le ft behind in dead and wounded after evey every reple repulse.Between the ruined and smok ing stockades the fighting was the fiercest and the glandelinian losses the greatest

The roar of hell was not as clamorous as the battle lines here, where fell most of the Glandelinian officers who that fateful afternoon made ly madly wave up their lives. Andsons and Quarrels of Stewarts corps were among the fallen. An Andiansshorse rode astride the works amid the scathing withering fireand himself pitched headlong into the christian lines.Cockrell of the same corpswas severely wounded ,Parsons and Granbury whose brigades of Glandelinians suffered annihil ation were killed under a withering storm of fire. On the west side of the battle field Strike , James and Jones Gish were killed, and Brown was severely wounded. General Ambrose Henry Fuller, was mortally wounded, and general Pugnose who was captured by Emersons brigades after being wounded was rescd rescued by the glandelinians. Really without Exaggerating the Glands lalans never lost so many officers as in this batt le up to this time though most of these were not named.

I Thuheaviest loss in all the christian line engaged in this conflict was in the center of the rightwing the advance guard of long expected reinforcements which here was stationed on the right of the raw divisions which broke and ran at the first casct of the enemy.

Quickly on chargin its front it held its ground with indescribable stub ornness, but also with indescribable loss many of them being officers/

. While this infantry battle was going on Operational had crossed the river with his cavarly some distance east of the stockades with the evident purpose of get ing at rovechildscommunications wagons. Bus But he rackoned without his host. Hetch and Grnten by general Greathearts directionfell upon him with such vo vigo vigor that he returned to the southside whee where he was killed, his force giving the christians no furthr further trouble.

Indeed it had been one of the bloodiest repulsesAmbrose Fullers army had ever suffered during the war up to this period and he had lost in al over 7,650 generals alone and eight million men during these sixteen desperate but unsuccessfulattacks. Major general Houghton was among the slain. He had been one of the best glandelinian generals next to Ambrose Fuller and made a great loss in dead to the unfortunate Glandelinians. This conflict of the first day ended at exactly at four oc, lock.

THE SECOND DAY'S BATTLE

General ,ivian fearing another desperate attack looked to the front and up along t the sentry pits and saw many large puffs of smoke beyond. General ,ivian then ad advanced down the picket trail toward the en in outpost and as he did did so the sound of one hundred and fifty g ns sd suddenly bounded to his right and the muffled sounds of heavy fighting was heard far to his fr front. Some quiet strokes had been given there for a large body of during glandelinians were in possession there and toward morningangelinian guns were being turned on friends. The foremost of glandelinian surprisers, for thousands of them were at it in ernest had gotten through the abatis and picket lines in front of the main linesand all the serious mischief of the day was to comefrom thatinitial stroke. The pickets were some fifteen yard u yards distant and they all had been silenced by stratigem.

Glandelinians thousands in number under pretense of surrender had approached the sentered pits simultaneously and after a short parley had pounced upon and dicarmed them all. The first points having ben gained, thousands of men crawled along the gra ground toard the lines meeting thesolitary sentinels at the ditch. Of all those christian guards only two discovered the in truders ere even then when it was to lototo shoot but one of them put a bayonet through his assailant.

Another glandelinian knocked the brave christian guard senseless and hat opened the way to the lines without a shot or serious alarm. One hundred thousand men now passed in to the first line of guns and were prl prowling about silencing with noiseless knife or bayonet every man theycould find asleep,or awake.

Now a strange face looked in the window of general Riners headqua h headquarters and amazed the Angelinian officer within, reached for his weapon.

Quickly with a scowl the queer stranger vanished

But before the general or his staff could get ready for defense a mass of the in truders came in and in a straggling free fight many of the Angelinians within the house were killed or taken prisoners. The glandelinians now controlled the works, and n in a few moments reversed its guns. It was this melee and its guns that were being fired on reverse range which had startled general vivian as he passed from shellicos lines toard the picket line. Betwen a large group of burning trees and foliage general ,ivian met a large column of glandelinians moving steadily up to surprise shellico. The division was in five long lines each a million strong and had filed into their ranks through the gap and was moving upon ,hellicos and Stellico lines unapproned for they were between them and their pickets. The Glandelinians supposed that they were approaching the rear of the line, and were moving very confident ly expecting an early triumph! Thirty hundred howitzers double shotted with grape and canister in iternallost muzzles and shell in its larger ones were trained upon the Glandelinian force, and as the Glandelinian assailants approached the static the Angelinians who were on the alert could hear their septs and whispers.

"Wait ."Said general vivian as the gunners were going to let fly;"Wait untill you see the white of their eyes and then fire."

A breath seemed an age for they knew nothing of the numbers before them.

Finally the leaders whispered among their men;

"Steady, we will have their works. Steady my men."

The nerves of the Angelinians rebelled and like a flash the thought passed along the parapets. Not aword was spoken but in perfect concert, the cannons belched forth grape canister and a storm of shells and even heinfantry simultane cusly discharged their muskets upon the hapless division. It was an awful surprise for the surprisers and within th two hours of it two million mangled bid bodies lay there in the abatis, victims of a quicker blunder and the fate of battle.

But this repuls did notend it. The surviving lines closed up ranks and tried it again. Two more assaults were cut down and decimated. Then the Glandelinians split into squads, and moved on the flankers keeping up the fu ly lay byplay untill there were no more of the five million Glandelinians left. The Ange liniens had perfectaim and the ra gems of the reckless Glandelinians was use/ess useless.

They had risked and met annihilation. This bloody and effective repuls of he assailants at Stelliceslines was a grand thing for the cause of the Angelinians but proved to be asort of a boomerang for themselves, having aroused the demon fierce ness of the Glandelinians by doing their work too well, as it was, for the capture of Stellices and Shal l iceslines at the cutset being absolutely es ential to the success of the Glandelinian sortie.

The stunning blow given to the great movement by the Angelinians occured just as a divisionof Glandelinians which ad filed into theworks had started on a rapid conquest along the trenchestward general Mc-Culvery's bateries. They could from there se the flashing of hundreds of thousand thousands of rifles from Stellices and Shellices lines, as these men mosd on and d on through the cap camps of the guards. Another division encouraged by he succes s success of the first started along wor Hellmans linesalong thetreastworks limping the two lines. This division aimed to take Stellicoslines in the rightrear at the very cutset, this movement meeting with momentatrily check, for it fell upon two concealed batteries, and four Angelinian divisionsnow under arms. The Glandelinians opend on Stellice lines with the captured guns, and also with their own in front. Their division divided in blaf sa guarded the front parapet the remainder rallying along the right works to meet the onslaught threatened by this divisions coming against it.

At this juncture majoy ma o en major general Woerner a verteran artillery ma man and commander of the third battery came into the lines and to k charge of the battery. He placed two hundred and twenty pieces in the right rear angle where theembrasure admitted the working of them with an oblique as well as a direct range range.

The venturesome Glandelinian columns had borne down all opposition and with closed up ranks came bounding along at a point thirty rods fro them, the ground being cut by a ravine, and from t those it rose in a gentle grade up to the christian like. Qoerners two hundred and twenty guns and about five hundred men were all they could justnow summon to repell this columns, and there were probably six hundred cannon and one million men at the right, and more than a million at the main line concentrating their fire upon Stellis to cover their charge upon the christian li e s. lines. The advancing troops rov reserved their fire the Angelinians mounting their parapets while those with sound arms and even many thousands of wounded loaded their muskets while the others stood to the other parapets and blazed away with might and main. The foremost assailants after deliver ing a random volley re coiled and scattered. This success again stirred up the devilish fierceness of the Glandelinians w who gave the Angelinians a response fiercer than ever and a body of sharpshooters within easy range sent the Angelin ians a storm of minnie balls. The air was immediately full of shells and on glan glancing up o e one saw as it were a flock of blackbirds with bearing tails beating a bout in a gale. At first the shells did not exp,explode their fuses being too long and they fell intotheir fi fuses going out.

One man counted one hundred twenty four mortar boun bombsin the air at n once with pathway directly overhead. Sometimes theyrolled about like footballs or bounded along the parapet and landed in the watery ditch. But when atlast the Glandelinian gunners got the range their broadsides became exceedingly murderous.

Several of the Angelinians held the battalion flag in the center of one of the long parpasts and a shell aimed there exploded on the ensmark. A seargeant was hoisted bodily into the air by the concussion, but strange to say he was unharmed but two one his fellow seargeants were killed, and thecommanding general woerner who stood near the flag was prostrated with a shattered thigh, and half buried in a pile of dirt and debris. This was al all the work of one shell. Before the wounded general could be removed a second shell woundedhim in the head and in the hand three blows as in as many minutes.

The charging column was now well up on the slope and general Grania divisions added their muskets with some well directed consebct.

Each check th on the column by their effective firing, was as a spur to he Glandelinians, and they increased the fury of their cannon fire. They poured solid shot and case, and had thre hundred and twenty six case ouchors mortars sending he he and of a all of these Stellice recieved its full complement.

General Turkof oranias battery had an arm and la leg t torn off by the explosion of a shell while he was sighting an angle gun . General Grainia relieved him and mounted the gun carriage glasses in hand to fix a more destructive range. He then left the piece with a corporal general the highest subordinate fit for duty with instructions to continue working it on theelevation just set while he himself went to prepare anothergun for close quarters.

The corporal general leaped upon the gun stanging and was killed by a bullet before he could fire a shot.

The Glandelinian columns were proceeded as usual by sharpshooters these using the trac along the trenchesfor shelter and succeeded in getting their bullets plump into the christian works also gaining command of their rear.

The advancing Glandelinians took up the planks from the bridge stringers ove the moats and began to think of their bayonets. The outside supports of the Angelinians had been driven off and not a friendly musket sword of or cannon was within a quarter of a mile of them and they were partially sur rounded. The flag poles had ben shot away and all the post colors were down.

TO make matters worse one of thier ow own bat eries near the Angeline rail road began to toss broadsides upon broadsides of shells int o the christian lines. They were isolated as all could see their flags from time to time by shot and casualities as I have related depressed below the ramparts, or if flags floating were enveloped in smoke.

They were reserving their little stock of ammunition for the last energy the hand to hand struggle that was sure to come. The rear batteries intrepreted the situation with them as a sign that Stellice had yeilded or was about to,. General n w called for a volunteer guard to rally forth and made a demonstration to show their enemies that their flags were still there. Stellices color bearers and thirteen men responded to the call . Randall led the way across a bridge stringerand the flags were flaunted in the astonished e e eyes of the Glandelinians . Better than all the standards waved conspicuiticuslyin view of their second line.

Four of the guards were hit but the firing in the rear had ceased. The assaulting columns now broke under fire of the christian muskets and Grainers well aimed guns, but the men found some shelter behind theinfantry parap elts along which they moved and also in the dap trenches, and among the brushwood but while the boldestcame within speaking distance and boiledthem to surrender.

The main body hung back beyond canister range near the ravine at the base of the slope. General Grania at that held his firehaving a ll the pieces loaded with grape and canister. Suddenly a big number of large brigades rose with a yell from their hiding down along those connecting parpets and dashed toward the Angelinians, leaping over the parapets intending to thus to scale the wor ks.

But Grania hadanticipated this. The rear angle an embrasure had been contrio contrio contrived for the marginov. The christians let g go their broadside of grape and canister. A number of the Glandelian divisions were cut down while the rest ran off to cover, and now not a few passed beyond the right wall to the rear of the works and out of reach of the guns. With this theaggressive spirit of that famous movement melted away fro for a while.

The sortie was a failire and the Glandelinians were stalled in the ditch , not being able to advance, death or capture waiting them where they lay, and in orde to return to their own lines they must run a gauntlet of guns which had cross hand infilading range over the only way of retreat.

The combat now changed but was none the less excitingin the n ew phas than it had ben thus far. The roar of cannon had waxed louder and louder as the gunners on each side sighted the true situation. As the infantry movements ceased the artillery duel beca me terrific. It was the ground for such engagements and had witnessed hundreds, but never on such a scale as this.

The whole space of rolling surface between their front linesand the second on the bluff near the Angeline Railroad was dominated by the Glandelinian guns.

When he in Glandelinian infantry columns disappeard from Stellices front all those guns opened upon the field where the manauevers had been made.

The Angelinian guns back on the bluff near Failens lines, the works next, south of Sellisecs took part and swelled the cannonade to a warefare of titans.The air was full of flying shells, and balls clash ing and bursting far above them, and raining fragments. The Glandelinians opend with all of their available pieceson Stellices lines and it now becameimpos ible for the Angelinian defenders tomove safily within thethe works. At one line every man had been ground to earth,and another had be en forced away from the sheltering walls and parapets only to be torn and mangled. The one plain or open surface offered no shelter whatever for thousands of mortar bombs once upon them almost perpendicularily. Tents, timbers of woods, were shattered to earth by the rain of high explosives, and also scores of gun carriages. The exterior surface of the christian line fared no better. Theheaviest guns pounded away to reduce it by batering and their projectiles plowed up the embankmenttossing the logs and sandbags as though they were feathers.

The Glandelinian problem od the da day was to reduce b the silencing of Stelliose batteries and it was the target of more guns than had been concentrated upon one point during the batle before. Here for once after all the long series of stuped carnage was the rea/ realization and grad grand of the grand and the terror of war. It was no longer a a question of forging ahea ahead, but of going out of thenot into which they had plunged. A number of fortified batteies commanded all the ground. Whereupon the Glandelinian ranks were spread and the a Angelinian artil, artillery reseves stationed betw een the main line of batteries created an unbroken chain of cannon barring them from the railway.

Supporting these guns was a solid lineof infantry just gathered hastily from the left and covering every avenue of advance. The way of retreat for the Glandelinians was bak over the bridge. This was swept by two of the most destructive withering fires for stellbes lines commanded the southern s ope of the rise and Mc- Gloseran the northern. With either slopew s uncovered the retreat would be comparatively easy and safe for Gordon the Glandelinian commander n and Stellices batteries were the ones to be affected ot to effet effect effe ot the severest injury to the lies of retreating Glandelinians.

But it semed apparent ly the easiest to silence.

The rifls and mortar bateris and sharpshooters of the christians took for a target the right forward angle of Stelliose as silentothe only point from which woarnisan could reach that coveted slope. A murderous fire was poured into this angle and the Glandelinin troops began to scramble back to their own lined unable to endure the indescribable withering fire. Granis removed his ammunition to the magazine out of reach of the bombs that were droppoing all about the guns.

His men at times went for the carriages and brought up the shel s as needed.

The brave gunners with the brave general wo mounted the breastworks and sin signalled to them let fly broadside after broadside and made that slope be tween Stellices lines and the salient a pen of fearful slaughter. The whole mind sickens at the memory of ut it for the victims were not fighting but were struggling between death and home. A general on a white horse rode out under the range of Granias guns and attempted to rallly the panic stricken men.

He soon wheeled about followd by fifty thousand men. He drew them back out of range halted and formed for a charge, to silence those fatal guns. This movement was distinctly or observed by the Angelinians n and the gunners continued to pound away at the slope while the infantry once more formed on the parapet.

The moving infantry of the storming party moved directly on their center as if determined to avoid contact with the guns of either angle but the Angelinian muskets were well aimed and thenew lines were thinned out at every deafening volley. The division crossed the ravines and there their poor leader fell shot through the head. Many hundreds of his men fell fell near him and thelast of the spaces of the Glandelinian assault for that second bloody day was gradually ended the fire of both sides slackened and the Glandelinians who were still within the christian lines surrendered.

All the Glandelinian infantry linesmaking these assaults had met practicall an nihilation.

That evening general Gavian and all his officers held a council. They debated on w who should attack on the morrow but at last all at lastart agreed that the best method was to be on the defensive, and all night long all the christian artio artillery were placed in new positions for the mornings conflict.

THE BIRD DAY OF T H BATTLE.
WHOLE LINES OF CHRISTIANS CRUSHED. THE TERRIBLE CANNONADING OF NEARLY A HUNDRED THOUSAND CANNON.

At five oclock thenext morning Baldwins men under the personal command of Archibalds brought a batt ery of heavy artillery from their left to bear upon ettens lae. And soon they were being swept by shells and shrapnell. A little later special a attention was given to the christian batteries but for some other reason or other the Angelinian guns could not be siel silenced and the storm of shells only increased. Enraged Sae Saten prepared his forces for an assault.

As he was making these preparation t he firing along the whole christian line under Archibldo became incessant and it was as heavy a fire of shells as ever poured continuously upon a single point. The divisions now started in m moved by theleft fln flank under a most galling fire and the first six million six hundred and fifteen thousand men ca chag charged with the most tremendous fury delivering that blood-curdling "Devil Yell".

The fire was incessant and indescribably severe. The advancing Glandelinian were subjected to a most a appalling fire from batteries on the left flank and f from infantry fire in front and partly in the whole right flank. On and on came the Glandelinians and a field officer of one of the Angelinian regiments seized a sh stand of colors as he saw his men faltering, when they met the withering fire of the assailants and mounting the very highest portions of the work works waved the colors zealouslyamid the dreadful storm of shot shell and minnies. The gallent fellow was soon riddled by bullets and he fell that fearful height to the ground breaking his neck. For a whole hour the Angelinians kept up the unq unequal withering fire soon driving the Glandelinians ba back with the most heaviest loss.

When the first first swift ol charge of the Glandelinians was had shndsomely repulsed the Angelinians cheered deafeningly while Saten downcast and sullen withdrew his crippled brigades shaking his fist as he yelled;

"I'll make you cheer you darn fools. T his is not the end yetand you will find ou out. Down with your God. I hate i him."

Ambrose Fuller saw Satens men fall back and so he and his f of officers held a council while storms of shells kept screaming over their heads. In the mantime Saten ordered his other brigades forward and wasn't the Angelinians surprised when they saw consternation columns of Glandelinians moving forward with their serried lines extending for fourteen miles. A withering fore of shot and shell and minnie balls was poured upon the advancing columns but the survivors though their columns were badly torn and mangled came on with thesame tremendous fury, like the brigades did in the first tremendous assault.

It seemed that nothing could stop them. Their left wing was in advance of b the right and center and was rushing forward with irresistible fury in the face of the most destructive withering fire they had ever advanced under before.

Though they mowed Though they were mowed down in hundreds of thousands the survivors still came on while the right and center was moving through the fire of the storming fire, hundreds being killed at every step.It was an aul awful but still they came on on only enraged though the whole christian line blazed with a withering fire. Nearer and nearer they approached while Archibaldsmain ba tteries now opened a most destructive storm of fire raining perfect streams of shells grape canister and chainshot causing the most terrible havoc ever imagin imagined and starting new fires. With formation unbroken they came on with that terrible "Devil Yell" and at nsking the Angelinianswelling t in the trenches and drove them out, then pressed on with fearful force to the main line.

The left wing which was far in dvance of the right and center being now near Archibaldins right and soon swarmed against the works despite the destructi ve destrictive fire that was poured upon them from the Angelinians.

The thundering roar of the glandelinian batteries incre increased as if in titan throes and the screaming shells fairly dotted the sky. The artillery along the works fairly poured broadside afterbl broadside upon the assailants and now how the cannons did roar. The Angelinians holding the first line of works did their best to hold the Glandelinian at a bay butit was of no use at all. After a furious struggle hand to hand both sides of the works the Angelinians were indeed driven back but were soon heavily reinforced though their lines were crushed, and they drove the Glandelinians back with even hundreds of whole regiments slain. Indeed Satens rage was indescribable. He again sent large bodies forward to make a third charge and though one whole colum was repulsed with a frightful loss of officers one wave of men after another continued to press forward the fury of the battle being like a death struggle. Saen indeed was in an indescribl indescribable rage. He hated to see his army so frightfully dec insinated and sent or orders to the artillery commanders to mass every single battery upon Baldwins chain of artillery and give it a hammering.

When all the batteriesare ready by Eleven O-c Clock general Stt St

Saten gave a signal by seinding up five shells and discharging a coehorn mortar...

General Ignorance's batteries were be first o to open fr fire, then simultaneously seven hundred cannon on Manley Hendons side opened on Archibaldies lin es and all the wooded hills where the artillery was in action seemed as if volcanics eruptions.The carnage was indescribable. More than a thousand cannon opened a fire a minute later and the din was likethat of a hundred volcanoes blowing to pieces simultaneously. Shot shel , grape and canister, ay even pieces of iron large stones and chain shot dri dropped like hail among general sta Satens lines. Thousands of Glandelinians tired to seek shelter in sheds and small caves or any kinds of objects of protection but hundreds were badly cut up and killed, the sheds were blown in the air, and many pieces of artillery bagmage wagons, ammunition wagons gun carriages and cassions weresmashed or blown up and innumerable parcially burning tres were cut to pieces by the rai of shot and shell whose explosion s produced a continous roar like musketry.

The detonations of the dreadful cannonading broke windows in Angeline fifty miles away where the trembling of the ground caused by the concussioncould be felt for more than one thousand six hundred miles. Foncan shoda , small stone walls, hundredsof wooden barricades and stockades were riddled by the horrible rain of shot and shell . Every one of the enemys batteries now opened a murderous fire increasing the carnage the broadside of shells raking the works in every direction. More christian batteries were brought into action and the hills as mad to be riven by the terrific cannonade.

The discharge of more han five housand can on was like the fearful viberating reports of many volcanic eruptions and the smoke wreaths obscured everything along the line o hills and hundreds of broadsides of shells exploded among the christian lines with the fearful earsplitting roar in the explosions.

More than deafening was the fearful din of the great cannonade and great sections of the works were torn away and the barricades were ablaze..... The ground was actually trembling beneath General ivians feet as he was leading his headquarters which were battered by shot and shell..... Other different hills were riven with th usands of deafening detonations and large large wreathes of smoke ma extending many hundreds of fe tfe tfeet above the tree which crowned the hills, storms of shells coming from both sides as the cannonade was steadily but swiftly assuming fearful force and destructive fury.

Now i might y jets of smoke and flame as mad to swap the ridges wi while the unequ l conflicincreased in force. By the roar of so many tens of thousands of thousands of guns the ground continued to tremble and it as mad as if the grass as and bushes would be buried with the fal ing Angelinians. Frightful streams and roadsides of shells were sent through the air in two or three directions , even from the sum its straw shells and balls rolled down the sides. Everywhere havy showrs showers of shot and shell fell caus i causing indescribable confusion and carnage.

This cannonading was kept up for several h hours and the christian works were terib reached. As the terrible cannonade was seeming to increase with redouble fury many large columns were seen to be forming quite a distance from the direction of their batteries, which though badly battered continued tohammer broadsides.

It t k quite near night fall before they were all formed and on the next morning when all was quite the glandelinian front began to move steadily forward seeming to be headed directly for general Vivians lines..... General ivian and even the ivian girls saw this appalling advance the Angelinians swarming in countless numbers to their works once more to repell the assailants. Down the sides of the smoking ridges rushed the assailants a mighty avas avalanch of human beings.

THE CHARGE THAT CARRIED NEARLY ALL TO HELL.

Satens main divisions which were composed mostly of long infantry and bridadiers and which were leading the van of the whole charging line advanced swiftly all the landelinian can on once more fairly hammered aways more and more artillery being brought into action to cover his great charge, and within ten minutes it seemed as if ten thousand cannon were pouring death and destruction among the christian lines. The artillery fire of the enemy increased but not a sound of either can on or musketry came from the christian line which seemed silent as ever.The steady march of the landelinians not meeting any resistance was splindid coming on and one under covering of the most withering tempest of shot shel and high explosives which at every moment waremowing the angelinians down in many thousands.

From this te ific cannonading and from the meanacing assault many a question passed amongthe christian generals with the debating whether heir own three grand division scould resist this irrestible onslaught. The landelinians were coming on in the most monsterous human waves ever seen storming with their d "DeilYel . Vanitys line on the left with Nilirans large force well advanced on the outskirts of a large grass plain on ivians own right and at a great angle with two parts of the main line was threatened with annihilation from the fire of the glandelinian can on and had to be withdrawn. Tonsy peaceno had withdrawn his shatered forces more to the right back by a burning forest and Dane withshi large forces of Abyssinkilians in front d finding his postion untenable was compelled to withdra w his lines to the rear.

It seemed as if poor Gannons whole front we recieving the main blow of the art illery fire and to make matters worse he great assaulting columns were moving in their dr direction and now the artillery fire of the landelinian had become so severe and insedious that the christian line bending more to their own right broke and recoiled in utmost confusion , the landelinians still moving on unp unopposed and again and again giving forth that bloodcurdling "Devil Yell"

. Their line of march was indescribably sublime and they came directly in front of peaceno Henrys forces who alone stood its ground despite the artillery fireof the enemy and who excited at the near approach of the foe blazed away with the rear of hell. The right and left flank of this christian line was however exposed to thefire of the landelinians and the enemy returned in such a destructive withering fire that several brigades melted away right then there like snowbanks , but at this moment ten batteries of Hooltaaaaaaaa poured a withering storm of canister upon the already bleeding and torn glandelinian columns fairly cutting them to pieces.These glandelinians were ficnal ly others however and continued to press on with such tremendous fury that it was amazing to see, and three bodies of christian troops inclinging more to their own left under peaceno Fallen and Fulmalon Phelan,, whom the landelinians simultaneously opened upon them a storm of destructive firing a fire that the christians had never met before. The survivors gave forth a well and directed rep response, but theenemy atthis point had made a gre great swing and a turning movement and hanging the christian right with terrible violence the whole line crushed to fragments gave way in confusion and Fugelion Phelan was killed, and paredlies divisions which flung themselves upon Fallens left with the most murderous loss mowed the whole opposing force down as the tornado does the corn, while a very severe and murderous withering storm of fire was opened on paredlies troops also commanded by Lovoheart and a Largehsert these three glandelinian generals going down mangled and bleeding simultaneously. All the other christian artillery which had also been in position lot loose an indestricable tempest of shells grape and canister, which tore and deco decimated whole waves of the assailants, while simultaneously a horrible unequal withering fire of mus ketry wo mowed down tens of thousands of survivors seemingly per volley, and some of the panic stricken columns of Angelinians seing his awful havoc among the enemys lines rallied and drove in at the landelinins with a regular hellstorm of bayonets and pikes.

Five glandelinin generals fell riddled by bullets at one time being Generals Walter Woodrof, Jelliosinis, Irishead, Wormwood, and Gallstonies, while generals paredlie and large heart thou h they themselves were wounded were able to retain their command. These generals strove to rally the columns which were thrown in confusion from the unexpected annihilating fire of the christians, a tut n new and dreadful artillery storm mowed down ranks by the thousand, all along the line and the whole scene beyman dissolved in walls of smoke.

General Blake Hennings glandelinians were close to a high stone breastworks ten miles long and neither the overwhelming waves of the glandelinians or all the landelinian artillery could force the christians back from it and here five million glandelinians were either cut un and mangled or had surrendered themselve as prisoners within an hours tme.

They simply couldn't stand the fire of the christian line. It happened however from a mistake in orders that general henrys divisons had cullenyl retur retired and fel fon and many of his divisions came forward in time to fill up the break before the landelinians discovered it and the glandelinians face a storm of bullets, though they receded and rallied, and went forward time agn in and and again amid a sea of blood, hell fire and storms of destruction intolerable. The monsterous columns of landelinians who had fairly swarmed over the stone wall along general Rewingtons front and had planted their tat erad battle flags on the wall, had all been completely mowed down.

The battle was fierce and most terrific being at many points a raging hell of hand to hand fighting, ex ploding shells actually killing men and even the catridges which exploded on the bats that the man were actually burned the clothes of the acaba tants and so fierce was the flaflash of musketry and cannon by this stone wall that the grass under the feet of the soldiers even the trees and shrubbery caught on fire.

T housands of the stubborn cannoneers had ben bayonated but as fast as they fell others took their place and the artillery makde a greater wall of smoke than the conflargration in the far distance itself. The rest of the main line at the point of the stone wall inspired by general gian and eaton continued their attack despite their inhuman losses paying no attention to the terrific artillery fire and storm of musketry and bayonets, yelling like millions of demons ,bayonetting many masses of christians at once but it seemed in vain.

James Gannon who commanded at this point of hollo fury seemed to be having a farful time indeed for hundreds of thousands of the glandelinians were pressing furiously against his men, the christians standing their ground with the stubbornness that inflicted excruciating losses among the foe.

Gannon was certainly having a desperate fight but he was bound to f win at all costs. Along other points where the stone works extended across the seething batle smitten plains the glandelinians were attacking with great storming fury and a lae large meadow boardered by large burning trees in front of the stone wall was now a regular mound of dead and wounded landelinians.

General watching star had brought up his gathling guns a thousand in number and thus thechristian art illery fire increased. The enemy seemed to be massed in thicker numbers than now hurling themselves in seemingly overwhelming numbers upon cannons lines. The landelinian brigade under general ocan l all handsome u in uniform had been placed betwen two fires and were compelled to surrender to save themselves from annihilation.

The other glandelinian columns opened a series of horrible volleys themselves doling awful havoc among the line of christians the discharge of t their musketry increasing while Gannon knew hat they were not ashecked for he could see the fierce glea of thousands of bayonets through the curtian of smoke , his men keeping up a continous fire upon the enemy dying to check them the re flection of fixed bayonets being greater. Gannon was having a fight worse than any he had in the fewer before, the multitudes of Mandelinians dissolving away a fast as they came came within range, the conflict having steadily grown worse the enemy seeming to increase in numbers and fairly moving their way through the barricades of fallen trees only to go down before the terrific fire poured upon them, and though it was difficult to drive back the assault it was seen evidently by Gannon that the foe could never carry this stone wall as long as his ammunition held out. And worse yet all this firing was not at long range either but at point blank, and to make matters worse for theenemy Gannon was being steadily rein forced so thus enabling the christian to increase their fire mowing the Glandelinians down inas many surges as came through the pall of smoke.

If the advance of the enemy could b even be temporialy checked here the desperate fighting of Geocmo would soon decided the contest but if the fur iously Mandelinians columns at this point did not soon stop their attack the focle would only meet annihilation for Gannon had a notion that they ought to realize that their attack was futile while yet going on.

The dreadful roar of the Angelinian cannon continued and even broadside after broadside by the score per second crashed through the already torn and mangled Glandelinian columns dealing awful havoc continually and not even a lull of pause was in the deafening and terrible roar of musketry or the clash of sabres musket butts and the ring ring of steel on steel, and the smoke was thicker than ever so thick that the Angelinians could not see the trees in front of the position at all.

Despite it all no change had come, the situation remaining only the same and not even a slight pause was in the tremendous firing which only increase making a more awful din and the smoke become moresomo. Suddenly there was a crash of tens of thousands of musket butts and many Mandelinians who had attempted to swarm over the works had their heads split open, and the others meeting a tumult of bayonets had to reco e recede. At other points the Mandelinians fairly hurled thes themselves against the christian lines with such tremendous fury that they woure poured pellem poured pellmell over the works only to be cut down or taken prisoners.

The enemy warlike regular human waves charge ing against an immovable breat breakwater one wave after another going to pieces the works swarming with the dead Mandelinians, the Angelinians storming their own position with a withering horror of flame and vengance of crashing din.

Part of Gannons line to the right se med to be overwhelmed in slaughter and rapine and horror but the Mandelinians were fal ing back at this point and as for Geocmo he was having just as hard a fight for steadily in the fa e of the awful withering fire and tumult of bayonets sikes sabres and cannon the Mandelinians were steadily attacking giving forth their blo d curdling "Devil" Yell", and for a time Geocmo was alarmed as he saw how steadily the Glandelinians were attacking Geocmo being exposed to a rain of bullets and he could not dare stand in thi this perilous position in front of his division so he fell back to the rear for he knew if he fell the whole column of christian s under him would be thrown intoconfusion andthen the battle so stru stubbornly x contested would be lost.....

Many a large column surged above the breastworks of stones only to be torn down gaps appeard scross of time in the main lin e of the enemy, new roaring tumults of bayonets broke out afresh v ollys blazed by scores point blank nearly simultaneously, but the Mandelinians with a fierce defiant yell j kept up the attack their monstercus columns surging on being m anily impelled to gain the victory no matter what the cost.

The enmys lines was mangled again and again the gos being closed however, but finally it was more than they could stand and now the christians themselves were pressing forward with great fury under a withering fire of shot shell and canister. The entire length of the first line of trenches were already filled with the dead Glandelinians the survivorswhich were now falling back, the Mandelinians retreating morers idly than the Angelinians had expected. The whole line of woods was swarming with the advancing christians and they themselves were not being checked though meeting with the most fierce resistance and having their own will. Gannon nagrinia and Failen were doing their utmost to keep the christian well on the advance now, and as fierce and as stubbornly as they did try to hold their ground they were not stopping the onward rush of the christians who seemed to be having a clean sweep.

The Mandelinian batteries were still thundering and also the christian batteries and even increasing tremendously while shells were bu bursting every where. To al Gannons surprise he saw the multitudes of Mandelinians swarming in overwhelming fourcetward his center to repell him and now a merciless struggle beyond description ensued. All the lanes and the open grounds were fairly alive with the pandemoniumms of Mandelinians and christians facing each other in a desperate hand to hand struggle, millions of pull puffs of smoke appeard, and the roar of an indescribable number of firearms became like Bounequel cannonade, and the grayscoat swent down in greater multitudes. And on pressed thechristians. This certainly did look very discourneing for the Angelinians were advancing in more heavier columns than could be driven back by five million men though this whole line of grayscoats had ben twenty million strong and still it seemedutinly impossible. Geocmo wousse of the Mandelinians who was having it still worse could not ask General gaten for aid or to give him Fin Failens divisions or Prociles forces of curdes for from their side they had all they could do to carry on the merciles conflict in an el endeavor to stop the christian advance. The christians were only gaining more steadily and it seemed impossible to even hold them at bay for a moment. Failens men werealready pressed back and driven into confusion he was killed, and in the very face of the most destructive withering fire thechristians were advancing more faster than before and the entire first main line of grayscoats was completely envelped by the Angelinians who interminglad with them in as des e desperate hand to hand fighting as ever could beimagined. The Angelinians were pressing forward withirresistible violence the whole field of battle seemed like the blaz blasting fury of some great forest fire filled with bio billions of explosion explosions and vapor clouds.

It was awful and the angelinians were coming all from one direction and though the Glandelinians tried to increase their fire it seemed in vain to check them.

Their faces red with excitement they tried to stand their ground more stubbornly than the had ever done before while their awful withering fire was directed continually at thechristians swarming forward piling the ide of retreat with dead and wounded christians.

Two Mandelinin a brigades set fire to several grassy prairs praires where thechristians were swarming but the fires unfort unately for them burned the other way driving the Mandelinians before it. Also their right was hard at work being supported by batteries which mowed the assailants down as fe stes they could be discharged but more and more hundrads of thousands of thechristians came swarming across the very burning fields regardless of the tremendous heat which seemed to sar the sky and threw themselves at the solid c Glandelinian columns and the struggle became more fearful.

The Mandelinians had started their defense at the front of their own double row of works and as the angelinians had been steadily advancing on them had pushed them with dreadful loss all the way back to the last line of works and all these first line of works were already filled with dead and wounded of both sides closely intermingled..... On theright of the extreme line of works the Mandelinians swarmed to the defense fighting with the utter bitterness of despair.. It certainly did look bad for the Man alinians. General Failen Gannon Procile,...., and his aid Geocmo Bach Bucklockerington were suffering terribly from the storm of fire along the christian line and already were nearly played out and had almost exhausted their ammunition. The struggle along An Archibaldies advancening lines was more horrible and many whole brigades lay in windrows of dead and wounded in front of the Glandelinian works, the Mandeli inns also having lost most div divisions... General Cainies division had been wiped out by general Sta catens artillery storm but nevertheless for the enemy it seemed as if the could not hold their ground much lonverthough one fresh force after another came to to support them for th the Angelinians had captured the first line of works and despite the heavy almost annihilating withering fire all along the christian line were making splendid an d unchecked headway and were soaing in the most tremendous fury toard the Mandelinian cannons which honeycombed their lines with a avenues...?

They were already within three rods of the works and at them with all their cannon and musketry the Glandelinians met with a will and the air wasfic filled with a dense cloud of powder smoke from the terrific withering fire on both sides and when this did clear a little the Glandelinians could see that the furious christians were still advancing though the their dead and wounded la lay piled up in ridges. Failens right being crushed to fragments was already rolled up like Wellingtons left and he himself was wounded and nearly all of his staff had fallen. The Angelinianswere now coming on at a tremendous rush a hard and bloody fight it being indeed and for several minutes many hundreds of large gaps was seen in thegray line itself torn by the awful christian fire but they closed them up again, and the christians still coming on with all their sped orpang over the works hough parts of their whole first line fairly dissolved away. The fury of the fight was indescribable and the whole line in gray com defending Baldwins position was rolled up with soathing lose and crushed to fra ments and driven back for a mile the works being captured, and the deadly guns turned on the Mandelinians and increasing the carnage with broadside after broadside..... Not a trick of the Mandelinians did the Ange, lnians allow to escape them and this insured their already coming success. The simultaneous thousands of volleys rolled in heavier detontions followed by clouds of smoke and heavy storms of bullets. The Angelinians however still came on the con querers. Heartrending indeed was the slaughter. The Mandelinians under Geocmo now steadily fell back still keeping up their destructive fire though it was useless and just as steadily did the hold enraged Angelinians follow.

The Angelinians were indeed winning the contest but at a dreadful loss. The incessant roar of musketry, the tumultious crash of musket butt s against musket butts the ring of steel on steel and the din of cabron the volcanic roar of artillery and the shrill scream of the christian shells as they flew through the air reminded the Glandelinians they they must fight harder to win . From the rear of Gannon Mc-Hollester and Gascomos forces came the roar of more cannon trained upon their right flank. Liebiemann Glandelinians though threatened with annihilation stood their ground more stubbornly using the ridges of dead bodies as breastworks while many loading their guns paused to wipt wipe the black powder and sweat from their faces. Whole lines of the christians who were exposed to the awful deadly fire were all shot down but the surviving Glandelinians themselves at up their wild heartrending ''Devil Yell'' and mowed down every swarm of christians that rushed them. Indeed all seemed hidden by a more sudden pall of smoke all the works except the rear ones now swarming with the christians who had pushed their way stubbornly forward while the Angelinians were vainly trying to check them. There also was a series of series of crashing artillery volleys of thousands of guns all of a sudden from the works where they had first fought while great columns of the christians can rushing down on their flanks pinning Liebiemans forces between to fires..... The Angelinians came dashing in the headlong advance in front and the Glandelinians under Gascomo instead of being confused over this stood stubbornly to their works pouring volley after volley in endless succession upon the Angelinians trying to check their onward rush. It indeed indeed was of no avail for Liebiemans forces were already rolled up and he himself slain, but still they fought manfully.

Yet Gascomo knew within himself that the line could not hold without heavy supports from the right. Nothing could check their advance, even the most stubborn resistance of Trecile apll applied directly on the right center, could not at all check the steady advance of theshti christians. Though the firing did mangle columns by the score and thrown them into confusion the gaps were only closed and the survivors advanced the more furiously, the Angelinians in front of Gatens men forcing his lines to fall back still keeping up their grand advance and soon the whole Glandelinian center was threatening to give way.

Moving with irresistibleforce was a long line of battle eighty miles long. Many Glandelinian batteries for hours had been storming with fire upon them and in that great force and action every sword can on rifle and other firearms flashed brighter and stronger and the fierce onset made by the christians was indeed met by the most stubborn defense and even general Ignorance whose men were annihilated in their stubborn defense to hold their batters fell riddled by bullets but nevertheless was not dangerously wounded as no bullets penetrated any vitial parts. The Glandelinians fought untill every works, and trenches along their line were on fire and their forces of twenty million men were reduced terribly but they yet stood manfully though Gascomo himself was killed and his divisions swept out of existance.

Line of Line after line of rifle pits, field fortifications and intrenchmen ts burst into sheted flame and smoke packs packing the plone with the dead and wounded in purple but nevertheless nevertheless were still in the hands of the foe.

General Vivian who led the on charge in person was wounded himself but could retian his command, in deed so fierce was the carnage that it seemed impossible for any general to survive the terrible bath of destuction. However the Angelinians got no further than the first and second lineofor general heavy reinforcements were sent from general Fabroce Fullers right and these with a fierce conflagration of cannon and musketry held the christians at bay.

The thunder of the batteries and the firearms alone broke the terrific yell on both sides while each side once more like at the stone wall kept up a withering fire point blank.....

Greatheart, Darelie and Gannon were among the wounded christian officers and Love friend was and Madge Evans were monst he slain.

It was late in the afternoone afternoon when this occured and there seemed to be no end to the terrible slaughter but it happened to be that general Abdinia Mc-Hollester sent forward an overwhelming force of Angelinin cavalry and these managed to force the whole of the enemys line but it was not untill late at night before the terrible firing ceased and in fact no one gained the advantage, the outcome being a drawn battle. All night long tremendous works was on at rescueing the wounded from theperils of the forest fires. It took nearly a week before all the wounded were rescued but heavy was the toll of missing though the Glandelinian s had suffered the loss of betwen four million, to 5,560,240 in prisoners.

The losses & total among the killed and wounded were not stated.

PLANNING THE EXPEDITION FOR THE BOYKING ISLANDS.

CHarles Zimmermann was a Glandelinian by birth and had already commanded several expeditionagainst the town or city of Vivian Wickey having a special grudge against his wicked fellow men and owning di diamond mines and twice as much money as all the rich men in this world and so was in favor of all the nations of the world for he loving the christians and using his money for their behelf in taking this town.

What brought on his enmity was from the serious reason that in making a trip to the Boyking islands he was seized as a spy by the garrision, who were men of off kinds of Glandelinians by birth. He had tried to explain who he really was, and even showed them evident proofs but they would not listen. Finally he had managed to make his escape with a shipload of children. The ship had been sunk by a Glandelinian torpedo boat in persuit all the children being drowned but he escaped and by means of an aeroplaine he seized he agiagain got away though persued by hundreds of the enemys aeroplaines .

In the confusion caused by his tremendous firing upon his persuers which brought down a score of the airships he managed to make good his escape to his diamond island another island which belonged to him. He however had returned to the Boyking islands four weeks later in disguise however and hovering over over one of their main fortifications fortifications shook his fists and shoted; shouted;

''I have now turned traitor. Before long all your fortifications will be in ruins. I will have my revenge. You will not persue me above the clouds without cause and get away with it.

In truth the scenes at these Boyking islands also could never be fully described. Even when a great spiral typhoon had passed over the islands not long before this the Glandelinians had taken no measures to rescue theinjured children buried amid the tons of wreckage of the crushed towns and even let them perish in the conflagrations that ensued. Of the survivors they were blamed for the disaster by the Glandelinians who declared that the children prayed for the typhoon so that they could get free or be killed so that their misery would end.

Scenes which then ensued could never be described. The Vivian girls had never seen such horrors as these and if they did go through it they would not really live verylong. Indeed news of these hellish scenes had reached the rulers of all nations , and who had known of these conditions for thirty five years, and had wondered how it came that after all their hold Zimmermann had several times already failed to carry the fortification of Mc-Whirther. Attacks after attacks had been made on these impregnable positions by one big fleet after another but the result had ben only annihilation for all the fleets that stormed the fort if ications of the islands. The shynsinkillan fleets had tried to carry the places on the islands as well as on the ports of Mc-whirther five times, Angelinian ten times, and Zimmermann six but without the slightest success. Domdobia, Tripoligonia n and Abbira Abbisania had spent $700,000,000 in their support to Zimmermann to carry these islands, but every fleet he had brought against the Gigorbraltar had met with terrible destruction.

Hicksmillian ships had made attempts , about twenty fierce efforts within two months of terrible gun fire shaking the whole Angelinian coast with the din but met with bitter defeat every time. The fail Failure of the Angelinians in all these attacks had disgusted the nations, and they feared that the Angelinians would never win that great war.

The whole line of Glandelinian fortifications along the Gay Galverinian coasts were responsible for the unhappy christmasses for the children of the other nations and only if those were dead would the sorrows and misery cease. These fortifications were so strong that no cyclone had been able to wreck them and neither the typhoon which had destroyed everything also in the range of islands. These positions were manned by Glandelinians, GUmarians Omarifin Gurdes Mc-Hollestinians, and Zimmermannians, and these positions were declared to be so strong and massive and armed withso many twenty inch gunsand field mines that it seemed asif the very angels could not carry it these positions being stronger than anything ment ioned in the Pilgrimms Progress.

The Glandelinians had even threatened to slay the children under their power if the Angelinian fleets made any further bombardments and as another Angelinian fleet was already under way i under the command of Zimmermannthey had con confirmed their threats and made preparations to carry itout. In fact Charles Zimmermann was a hater of child slavery, and decided to have revenge if he died for it indeed and indeed Zimmermann did fight some of the most terrific sea battles that world had ever seen or will ever see again.

Charels Zimmermann haddecided to carry out his plans as soon as possible and had wrote this not to the King of Protestientia soon after his last failure;

There were twenty eight attacks altogether.

''Your excellency

I'm a born Glandelinians but have ben wronged without cause and desire revenge and havetried it already several times without success. You Know that I'm I'm one of the richest men in the world and have hundreds of billions of dollars and millions od diamond blocks besides. Of course rich as I am I have no carewhat ever for the old money anise have so now make up a plot which if you will get all the nations to involeve I it will I swear ru ruin child slaver in the boyking inslands and Galverinia forevern cause the fall of Rule Jailio and wrong dor the christians and enable: the Angelinians to win this war right away.

Those b o blonkades also by the enemy ade in these fortifications as you know has caused the horrible pr ise in price of your food and other things, butter has caused the horrible pr ise in price of your food and other things, butter has caused a dollar a pound, two dol'' ars for one orange orange and an a even bread a dollar a pound, two dol'' ars for one orange orange and an a even bread eggs and other things cannot be sotte n unless a dollor or two is paid for it.

Meat is getting too scare scarce to be sold now adays, and for the whole time sic since the war started the children of other nations, as we ll as all the people have seen no happy christmas tide again. No toys can be crossed on account of the war, and children in your nations shiver in dread of what the result of the war will be. So I wish for every nations fleets and armies under my directions to sent to be sent on an expedition to the Ports of Mc -Whirther, and to blow their fortifications into the air and if the attempts are successful I will reward you kngs handsomely, and not only that all the sorrows and fear caused by the su situ tion will be ended, and ngelinia will be able to crush her foe in the end.

Yours truely
Charles Zimmermann.''

The King was inded amazed when he read this note but he sent a wireless telegraph to all the rulers even ngelinia telling them of the plot.

The answer was!

''Can it be done?''

''Will it make serious loss and destruction of lives and property and also of the helpless child slaves who may be victims of their own guns?''

All the rulers decided to hold a coundil at King naldis palace in Protestentia but it was quite three weks before His holy kings of the christian nations met.

At the pl palace they met Zimmermann who fully unfolded the plot to them, told them of all the horrors he witnessed in those islands (Indeed it would be a sacrilegeous sin to mention here) and of everything else, and then of how all the fleets helping Angelinia may crush wicked ue-Whirthe Mc-Whirther and end the war for the christians.

''It sounds good.''Said King Reynolds;''But are you sure you will succeed.' This will make a regular war of the worlds, no fierce will by be this battle of a hundred thousand ships and probably cause preternatural loss of lives and propert y. As we are not in on this war with Glandelinia and Angelinia we do not wish to lose so many of our ships if it going us nothing, for it would be a sin to do so ourselves, and you know it.''

''I don't know what to say about the success.''Said Zimmermann but ''But I'll tell you this I'm bound to succeed if I die for it. And yet with all the arm armaplanes helping mecan lay everything in ruins and if those fools will not surrender the only quarter they will get them is annihilation. I'm sure however that God will cause this plan to succeed and I would rather die than fail.

We of course may fail in one great battle but I'm bound to kep up the seperate attacks ti till I win.''

''What did they do to you that you desire to do this?''Asked the Abbieannian King Arry Annda., who knew the glandelinian language well.

''They arrested me as a spy when I went there to give instructions from my King. I tried to explain who I was, showed them thdull proffs proofs, but it was of no use, and worse yet the stripped me of my uniform, tarred and feathered me before the whole swarm of child slavesmademe ride the rail for two miles and looked me in jail. Through the means of a little girl Called Evangeline St lare I and she managed to escape with a ship load of children. A glandelinian torpedo boat managed to catch up with us and in the sinking og the ship I and eva were the on y ones of the ten thousand children on board who managed to se escape drowning, and were retaken, only however to escape a few days ater in an airship.

I was persued so closely by their ae ; aroplaines th at I hada fierce battle in the air downing scores of the airships before got away, and then I returned to my iamond island where I planned my revenge.''

''This is a very serious thing to attempt but if you are sure it will succeed we will make it and you can be in command of the whole expedition of the fleets.' 'Said Procilline of Wormomia;''We have all debated that we will charge nothing unless the expedition fails for the opening of those ports to our trades once more is pay enough and worth more than thrillions of dollars in one day. We are all h r horrified at the childrens conditions there and would do anthing to crush it. We will make the atempt but will cla charge nine billion dollars if it fails for it will that is the great battle cause great loss in our great ships. Otherwise we will charge nothing. Fleets of angelinian ships had been recalled from all parts of the Angelinian coasts since your plan was known as they are going to join us, as''

''But this must be a cautious expedition , and our arrival must be at night at least.''Said Zimmermann;''The ships must be pd paine painted black for the glandelinians will not be able to t see their approach in the darkness and all lights must be out, and this will make them unprepared.''

This was agreed upon and the kings returned to their respective n ations to make their preparations.....

CHAPTER FOUR

TERRIFIC CARNAGE AT MARISCHORCHANIOR

Three days after the battle of Maroccino the two recently opposing armies retreating from the advancing fore st fires had marched in s parallel lines at seperate roads. By continual marching and other movements Ambrose Fullers army finally managed to elude general vians armyand moving in another direction toward the city of Marischochanda, general Vivian found himself confronted by another and fresh glandelinian army unde general Leonia Walton in icknell and howman in who had reinforced Ambrose Fuller, who also now confronted him.

Ambrose Fuller saddened and grieved over the death of his brother who was killed in the past just past noon advanced his forces to assail the christian lines again, this second battle with fuller actually happening marvellous as to not say three days after the battle of Maroccino.

''I'm afraid that plain below cannot hold artillery.''Said general Greatheart assistance to general vivian as the two generals watched the advance of the angelanto.

''If the enemy are coming fast you had do something quicker, at least we will have to break up all the bridges to the northwest if there are any.''Said general Jude.

''How many are there ?''Asked general vivian.

''Fifteen.''Answered Jude.

''Well you had better go on with the mens and show them where they are.Out ing them down will keep the enemy slow for a while.''

In silence the two walked down the lane, went through the fence and into the fields. It was now perfectly light and the could hear movements down into the marsh where hundreds of thousands of soldiers lay ready for the enemy. Jude led the soldiers to the first bridge a mere footing over the narrow creek, where it flowed out into the main river.

General Vivian sniffed at theinsignificance of the structureand shallow water. ''It is quicksand.''Exclaimed Jude as his man out down the bridge.''

''Where are the other bridges?''Asked general vians.

Jude led him to one after another. General Vivian shook his head when he learned that the stream was not fordable for cannon.

''Down with them .''He commanded.

They finished the work of instruction and started back on the winding road when faint in the distance to the south of them sounded the unmistakable roll of many thousands of muskets at once.

''Run.''Commanded general vivian as a deafening fusillade of thousands of other muskets sounded near them with a earsplitting crash;''Take us by a short way if there is one.''

At a steady ato trot they ran up a hill, crossed a fieldof parcially burning wheat w stubble, and plunged into a thicket..... Another and still another volley sounded and in his anxiety general Vivian outer outstripped his guide as he tore through a tangle of Blc blackberry hedges. They reached the shore of the Angelinian creek after meeting the flank of the large force under general Surprise vivian.

The marsh was not manifestly alive nothing was to be seen or distinctly heard except the tremendous roar of muskets.. Another volley of probably of twenty thousand muskets at once sounded much closer this time than before..... As general vivian reached the lines little violet met him.

''What is all that shouting about?''She asked;''Are they attacking again?''

''The enemy is advancing.''Cried general Vivian;''Stay in your hourse. We will have to use it as a fort untill my heavy columns comes to the aid.''

In the meantime the soldiers in the yards had been joined by the men who had slept, e slept in the tents and they stood about in clusters talking and laughing.

A file of them pas passed ohn Evans who came running up with his own commands.

More heavy and terrible volleys broke out simultaneously now, the long bayonets of the christian soldiers glinting in the sunlight . A sudden gust of firing a rattling roar of hasty volleys which spurred into a rolling crash of many thousands of musketry ripped suddenly through the the air startling viola and her sisters... Then onehundred and eighten six and twelve pounders pounders in the palm woods went into action with a roar that drowned every other sound. Evans and several others were arousing the officers from their sleep so as to bring on the main troops before the enemy overran everything. The rattling of muskts and the steady thudding of cannon cannon sounded from down the lane and soon after a few minutes all of the officers were out of bed and dressed..... Suddenly a ss spent bullet crashed through the window sending the glass tinking to the floorand buried itself with a buzz in the opposite wall.

Evans Evans walked unstentibly to the window and looked out. The thousands of soldiers had scattered along the line of hill on the other side of the marsh and there they lay a long line in purple, their purple uniforms showing sharply against the brown and gray earthlike so many logs,only the motion of their guns and the thick white smoke in the air above to them showed that they were men of life and death. Over the woods to the right where the cannons had been hammering the smoke hung thicker. Indeed Evans was aware that the artillery had ceased firing. Then came a series of blood red flaring explosions scores of feet high that showed plainly through the trees and purple clad men, and many trees were seen to crash to earth with as loud a roar as the christian musketry itself..... An officer on horseback galloped up threw himself from his horse and burst through the door.

' You will have to get this place ready for the wounded.''He announced''Any women here?''

''We have a couple of nuns here.''Answered general John Evans;''What is the matter now' Is the enemy pressing you back?''

''Yes sir. 'Answered the officer;

''Well we will not the nuns at work to tearing bandages, and you send the wounded wounded in here.''Said Evans.''I will have all the mattresses down here, and as thatplenty of water is brought. Hurryon and send the wounded before the enemy come to close. This place will have to be used as a fort.''''

The angelinian officer then went out,jumped upon his horse and galloped do down the lane..... General John Evans then asked the nuns to tear bandages and while he and several soldiers set about to carry mattress mattresses and quilts and spreading them on the flor floor stumpl stumbling footsteps suddenly sounded on the veranda outside.

Joice vivian opened the door and a soldier sprawled into the room the blood dripping from his smoked sleeve to the floor. He dropped on on a mattress and lay breathing heavily while Joice herself to orderly ra tendaged his arm.... Evans now peered out of the window. The artillery had left its position, on the other side of the marsh and was tumbling back in haste toward the lane the only path by which it could retreat. The flailer figure of general Evans, mounted on a bay, flitted past the house dashed into the main road and disappeared. The lane was filled with wounded men staggering toard the house. Fifteen cannons with their limbers and ammunition wagons a nun ca ssions thundered past the house the gunners clinging to the rocking carriages, the drivers lashing the ti tug-ing horses.

''Break through the fence and go int o the fields on the other side.''A voice called through the terific din...

Through the fields on both sides of the lan lane and up thatcongested channel the p r purple coats came thicker. Suddenly there were hundreds of bright flashes and terific earsplitting re ports enough to shake the house to its foundation an ap eared directly under the line of trees one third of the way down the lane and hunireds of men and scores of officers of all rank sagged limply to the ground, while a sot storm of earth branches and even tre trunks as spattered against the house know knocking down the pillars and shatteresi shattering o some of the win dows.

The dismounted on rly cavarly men pushed back at every point of their long front and deprived of the u support of their guns backed away from the marsh in sagging lines which broke and parted here and there. The fields were swarming with hurrying figures, while Evanssaw an officer ordering his men into barns, and looking over his shoulder at general vivian s headquarters.

A score of bullets just then whipped through the window. Another struck a poor nun killing her her instantly as it buried itself in her heart, and another struck a chimney sending down a shower of bricks. Then there came a simultaneous discharge a withering flash and murderous roar, and hundreds of Angelinians were seen to drop right in front of the house, andthousands of others along thei main sagging ine.....

Then a figure in gray showed for an instant on a rise of ground across the marsh then turn and wave a glittering sabre toard whatever was behind him.

''Get under cover quick.''Shouted Shouted the Angelinian officer in the u yard.

''We can hold against them here a bit. Into the house with them. Use the windows for loopholes, and put the bedding in front of the walls.''

Nuns the nunes, and the little girls stepped aside as the swarm of grimy bloody panthingmen burst into the doorway followed by a general who gave some orders.

Four men were sent t o each of the rear windows facing the marsh dragging the mattresses before them. One of them glanced out of the window.

''Gracious G oodness.''He gasped;''they are coming fast.''

All the men who had gotten inunstrapped their cartridge boxes and put them where they could reach them, without moving. Evans and themen smashed out the panes of the windows with the butts of their muskets and carbines and poked the muzzles out warily.... A bullet smashed a clock which fell rattling ans inkling on the floor. The troopers looked around and laughed.

''That clock can't run away. 'Chuckled the general;' Now boys fire away.''

They commenced firing methodically, the reports of thir muskets hellowing like deafening earsplitting thunder crashes in the room, and empty paper cartridges soojn littered the room. The room grew hazy with the thick smoke and the pungeant smell of the burning powder nealr nearly shocked violet and her sisters. Bullets incessantly struck the house, and they could hear the guns of the men upstairs and the noise of their feet as the shifted their position. A bullet struck one of the men at the window squarely between the eyes, and he fell back onto the floor kicking out his le legs stiffly and one of his companions busy with the remord did not turn his head. All of a sudden a a grinding crash seemed to make the walls of the house shake. The concussion of the explosion struck the ears of the men in the smoky room like the blow of a heavy pillow, while a deafening clamu chorus of shrieks mingled with a pater of fast sounded outside followed by a slatt ari clattering roar.

''Gracious.''Cried Evans;''The glandelinians have put a shell right through that barn and its on fire too. ''

Then he hurried to the door to fire his pistols at the approach ing enemyiut an Angelinian trooper who had skulked up the lane under fire made a dash for the opening from the outside, and they crashed together in the doorway, with such force that they both went sprawling on the floor.

Evans staggered to his feet and stepped over to the window and began hammering away with his pistols, paying no attention to the bullets which twanged through the broken window, bored through the thick walls and whistled past his face. Hadid not see the dodging hurrying prayconts which stole up to the fence along the lane and skulk through. A shell burst under a gathering trough but he did not even wink.

Another of the men by the window had dropped his gun and was trying to stop the flow of blood from a bullet hole in the shoulder praying steadily.

A red faced captian stood near general Evans watching the fields behind the house and firing his revolver over the shoulders of a man near th the window.

''We can hold the m at bay if they don't shell the house.''He said over and over again;''Yes sir we can hold them. '

All of a sudden a bullet sang through the room coming from an opposite dire otion.

''Oh Lord save us . 'He ejaculated;''The enemy have got around us somehow, and they are coming from the other side.''

Outside Evans got a glimpse of grayuniforms under the very windows. The red faced captian was on top of the back steps trying to keep off the hosrm bayonets of four glandelinians infantry men, with his sh sabre. The gray uniformed men seemed to be all around the house. Evans saw a lou loaded fourty four lying on the f floo and he picked it up raised the hammer and turning to the vivian girls himself;

''Follow me. This place is lost and the man will be captured. Follow me and I will try to save you.''

Withthi he ran out into the u yard. The little girls were close behind him. A glandelinian soldier, the butt of his gun lifted for a frail like blow hurled himself at Evans. But Evans waited untill the muzzle of his fourty four almost tuc touched the breast of the grayconf before he pulled the trigger. He saw the scourched cloth around the litle hole before the man went down right in front of him. Then followed by the lit le girls he dashed onward but a score of gray fug figures seemed to leap for him from every side..

Evans commenced snapping the hammer untill all were mowed down. Others dashed at him and Evans grabbed themusket of one wrenched it from him and dashed his brains out. Then he swung it club fashion before, all around him,and many dropped from the blow. Then there was the sudden thunder of hoofs on all sides of the house and purple clad cavarly l men on gray horses their sabres glittring in the sunlight seemed to have sprung from the earth, the swarm of glandelinians reeling and staggering under the shock. But they rallied and though caught on the instant when they could not form to face the horsemen they had nevertheless captured avery Angelinian prisoners in the burning hose house and barns. Across the road the Angelinian artillery men were frantically limbering up their pieces to get back to the ground they had ben driven from by the enemy and take what the cavarly had laid open for them.

The Glandelinians however were not retreating and for they had also been reinforced by one of the advancing main bodies the assault being continued the glandelinians soon crossing the confused Angelinians back f further and further. The roar of firearms had increased anew as Violet and her sisters were going for the rear for bett er safty, the glandelinians under Bob White a attempting with great bravery and desperatefury to break the christian line but suddenly met a destructive fire from a new line of christian artillery whihe paved the ground with glandelinian dead and wounded.

Other glandelinian cavarly divisions simultaneously borne down upon the Angelinians and during the five minutes desperatehand to hand fighting with bayonets clubbed muskets sabres pikes and lanches, managed to crash through though the other christian infantry fired away to a thousand shots per minute.

Despite the dreadful carnage the Angelinians, after having fired several rounds recieved no more time to fire, met the charge of the rest of the glandelinian soldiers with clubbed muskets and bayonets. But The glandelinian cavarly forces pressed on upon the angelinians with great courage, under a terific fire from general Greatheartz guns, and crashed down o upon the other solid purple squares though large lanes were torn in their columns. General Bel Baelzebubs division s were also advancing upon Handons purplecoats who were blazing away with their own cannon and musketry dealing awful havoc and destruction among the graycoats but several batt alions of slandelinians charged the Angelinians with fixed bayonets and with great gallantry. More cannons were being brought up and trained upon the assailants who suffered terribly from the shells but they could not be checked the slandelinians pressing onward with thrilling shouts, hurling themselves against the christian works underHandon shattering his left and throw ingthem into confusion. The Angelinians were determined to hold the slandelinians at bay however and made their line shake with rolling volleys, di delivering a greater dischagre of musketry on the assailants had ever faced before. The slandelinians were mowed down in thousands but during the carnage , and while some of the columns of thefon did recoil the slandelinians under general now land charged the angelinians with such fury that the slaughter was increased.

Other divisons were coming up to support general Greatheart, the fighter growing fierce r and hoter yet as the slandelinians confident of their own numbers continued their attack.

A detatchment of slandelinians under general Whiteheart attacked the christ ians with terrible fury and still another detatchment under general Benligan came rushing up in frightful numbers by but were met with such furio fury that they were crushed and mangled and forced back slo slowly.

Even general Belzebubs artillery had arived by this time and now these opened fire to u support the at tack of the advancing slandelinians who continued to press on wit h marvellous force att acking the in fantry and ninth corps which being under a heavy fire finally broke and fell back to the rear, the slandelinians swarming on with great forceand crushing the line of the stubborn ninth corps to pieces taking many prisoners. Other divisions also assaulted general Greatherats packs of artillery and after a fierce hand to hand fight drove the gunners and the infantry supporting the artilley artillery back pellmell and with frightful and stupendous loss.

Other points of the enemys lines were also pressing forward , though the receding fire along the christian line was something terrible. Large waves of graycoats under Bob White poured against the christian lines under Charles Brown, while Julo Benligans and Phils were striving to drive back the assailants who were swarming over the works, but these soon mingled with the christians driving them back with the most frightful loss/ Brads briagdes presenting a wall of bayonets against General Ignorances slandelinians, thousan ds of the assailants being impaled, but the rush of the slandelinians was so terrifisthat the Angelinians were driven back a many being trampled and trod upon by the slandelinian horsemen without mercy.

General Baybelons slandelinians held stubbornly in their works they had captured from the christians against a terrific counter assault, these Angelinians rushing forward in frightful numbers with fixed bayonets. General Hendon Zimmermans forces fell with terrific force upon Baybelons center and after terrible fighting which resulted in horrible slaughter on both si es drove the center in. The Slands linians here however were heavier in numbers and as Zimmermann fell mortally wounde wounded they ral lied with angry shoutsand repelled the advancing christian s furios ly furiously, the Angelinians howeve making one counter charge after another , the slandelinians soon bea being compelled to retire. However Baybelons right was massed together in overwhelming force and the christians here meeting a terrific fire was repulsed with terrific loss the str struggle having been extremely brutals The apparently victorous slandelinians having taking the rear bat alion s on the flank and pressing them back in a furious charge met general Henriqies Henriwu Henriques force which struck the flankers a ter ible blow an d scattered them to the four winds, and now again t e christians pressed one once morethourh the slandelinians blazed away like a thousand furies. The firing was incessant on both sides now there being treem tremendous fighting all along the line the chr christians advancing with irresistible force striving the seventh corps of the enemy furo furiously and after fighting like save savage demons broke the line all to pieces and pressed on yelling/ yelling/

''VICTORY FOR CHRIST. DOWN WITH CHILD LABOR.''

The battle raged all the more furiously all alo g the lines and on all sides the thunder of cannon seemed to shake the earth, and the discharge of fire arms was deafening. General Meldorfs divisions also broke the line of the enemy to the east making a serious breach, and the other columns of angelinians taking advantage of this swept upon the rest of the line pouring through the gap, the slandelinians pouring in a deadly fire of musketry and cannon, the gunners doing their best to hammer away heavy broadsides. The slandelinians had already been forced back at ce certain points, but the lines still holding and swelled by reinforcements met the Angelinians bravely, but the Angelinians managed to drive them from their works pel'mell and even beyond them. The angelinians pressed on with a rush the slandelinians under general Apollioon and Apoyloon becoming man ic s stricken and breaking ranks fled in all directions their two leaders cursing and swea swearing in volumes. H the two slandelinian generals shot many of the men down and tried with the fury of desperation to rally them, bi but the christians firing all to their weapons at close range brought the two of the slandelinians downriddled by bullets driving their brigades still farther back shatered and panic stricken.....

General Failens divisions, themself known christian commander stormed general Scalbill's divisions and scattered his columns after a terrific charge Scanda ll and many of his officers gadly giving up their lives amid the brutal carnage. The whole scene of batle had been quickly strewn with hosands upon thousands of dead and wounded, the christian cavarly under general charles Brown, riding into the panic stricken brigades while a detatchment of christian cavarly unde under general Loveschild charged through their lines amid a fearful hand to hand fight scattering the slandelinians in all directions.

General Eaton seeing the gain that the christians had been making rushed his own forces into action and his gunners driving with their artillery quickly unlimbered them and fairly hammered away with three hundred gathling guns.

But they could not check thecnard rush of the christians, and the first and second corps being crushed to fragments and being able to withstand the fierce attack gave way the Angelinians under Richardson Halsted hearing down upon the retreating slandelinians in front and Failens and Phils brigdes charged at their other wing with crashing force and yet Brad and greatheart advancing upon Callen and ones lines met the slandelinian artillery which hammered away with sledge hammer force mov mowing down thousands. Generals Loveschild and Keveschild, also having artillery had these brought u up and these soon hammered away like belzes while thei their long lines of infantry struck against their central lin es with brutal force while Marenotic Dare-not-lie and his infantry were assaulting their mai main front line with terrible violence, the enemy keeping up a tremendous cannonade and the infantry blazed away with all the ir firearms.

Reinforcements were arriving for the slandelinians and a simultaneous discharge of musketry broke ut out along thes e new lines, and now a large force of slandelinian cavarly force about two million men were coming up to the rear of the Masonic lines at a dash and these started an advance to prevent the christians frok from advancing any further, but a large force of Angelinian cavarly man being all concentinians made a terrific charge in a solid line both forces colliding in a tumult of sabres carbine shots and ring of lances and blows of butts of their guns. The hand to hand fight ing was terific but the slandelinians being over-whelmed were flung back, but while falling back they believed with the aid of all the musketry of the enemy a withering storm of fire which dealt awful havoc among the christian columns...

But theAngelinians only closed up the monsterous n gaps and their lines seemed as impenitrable as steel, as they continued to bear down upon the slandelinians and irlving hald hald half of Satens forces outof their positions. Pressing on they charged upon the rest who re mained stubborn , the slandelinians using their bayonets fiercelyand rolling up the assault with terrific slaughter in the ending carrying all before them and changing the retreat int o atoa total l r rout.

In the meantime Angeline surveying the scene from a high rise of ground spied some thing like a long gray ribbon in the distance.

For a while she watched it and by using hr spy glasses discovered that it was a large force of the enemy advancing to take the ch christians on the flank. She fortunately had a sin signal fla with her w which she used to attract her sisters first and their boyscouts. She then raced down the hill and signalled t o the officers of the far distant main line several of these officers hastening up at a gallop.

''What is the matter ?''One of the m asked/

' We would advise t you to take your forces to the summit of that hill right away.''Said Angeline.

''That gray streak like a moving ribbon.''Gasped one of the cavarly men das dashing up on his mount;''The slandelinians are coming to the flank us. ''

So rose the cries and thercol of drums sounded calling all the christians to arms.Artillery by the hundred was dragged up to the summit of the hill and un limbard while the infantry rushed up to sup port them. Angeline met Evans gave him s some advice and begged a cavarly man to go and warn her sisters. She then dashed this way and that signalling back and forth with her flag while hundreds of thousands of christians shoulde-ring f their muskets made for the hill.

Even now many masses of the Angelinians a swarmed around to protect Angeline who could not leave the hill in time before the attack came, and now the sound of heavy firing broke out and all the christians were rushing this way and that to the positions picked out for them by the officers. Hundreds of the Angelinians were massing around Angeline with fixed bayonets while the crashing of musket volleys increased. Then the cannons on the hills broke loose with their roar of hell, the enemy approaching nearer, andthe chris christian infantry on the hill forming a long parallel line started firing t themselves, and soon all the christians were ready to meet the enemy. Nearer and nearer came the Glandelinians shouting and yelling likefiends of hell and now a screaming hell of firing broke out along the parallel line and this fire grew so figrce and incess ant that the christian line becamehid den in a pall of smoke. The Glandelinians were now coming on with a rush in silo solid lines the furious assailants determined to carry the works no matter what the odds of losses inflicted and so the fiercest fight that poor Angeline had ever witnessed so close to her ensued while the whole region seemed a hell of flame and smoke. Again and again the Angelinians hurled back thecourages of the human waves in gray crushed mangled and torn torn to pieces, and even with stupendous losses to both side in men and officers, but the Glandelinians were filled with a blinding rage and attacked again in overwhelming numbers..

They swept upon the christians who were formed in the paralle l line with terrific desperation and seemingly irresistible force and fury, the enemy mangingto drive a portion of the christians from the works pell mell.

The line of christians that still held halzed away with their firearms and cannon with all their vim and vigorand increased their fire to a storming withering discharge but during the terrific fight at close quarters the Glandelinians finally broke the christian line one and charged through the gaps. The slaughter now was appalling.

The christian cavarly divisons who were just now coming up swarmed to the rescue and made a counter charge but was repulsed with the loss of their leader and half of their number. All along the line now there was terrific hand to hand fighting it being awful to witness but the christians were finally driven back down the hill the enemy storming their retreating line fir furiously. The main columns o however still held stub ornly poor Angeline waping and praying of over this scene of slaughter who had to witness so close and in great danger of being shot of blown to pieces at any moment. The Glandelinians were attacking like demons but a more artillery was brought up and the nearest assailants were mowed down in thousands at the very first discharge. General Greatheart seeing these terrible scenes, which to him made the hill look like a conflargration in itself, withdraw after winning his ascen t and scattering his en enemy to the four winds and moved forward in double line to repsell p repell those assailants, as those coming under the other commanders were too far away to come to the aid in time.

Again and again the enemy assaulted the purple lines under the most galling fire and att empted with all their might to carry the works but one columns o after another of their were cut down or routed and scattered in the wildest confusion and with every leader wounded or killed.

Many thousands of te Angelinians Circucupon the assailants from benhind the trees rocks and bushes, and the Glandelinians who were in a terrible terrible rage over this determined resistance again gathered for a furious assaultand assailed the purpl purple lines with unequal fury, and courge courge courage!

The roar of artillery and firear s was worse than the very thunder itself and whole multitudes of the Glandelinians melted away. Angeline was thrilled and horrified at the horrible slaughter and prayed frat frantically thatit would cease.....Again and still again the enemy assailed the christia christians with brutal desperationad and again atempted to swarm over but the artillery and musketry fire only cut the down them down in tens of thousands the bursting of shot and shell among the Glandelinian columns being appalling. Many thousands of the Glandelinians after terrific work did reach the parapetsand assailedthe gunners with horrible violence but the guns ofthis battery opened upon them a discharge of canister and grae grapecompelling the assailants to retreat the way they had come. As reinforcements reached the assaulting columns and as still more was approaching the enemy ilike a living mass, stormed the works again and poured showers of bullets upon the gunners and during the horrible struggle hand to hand they fell in thousands. At last scoresof thousands succeeded in pouring over the works and with a shout rushed upon t the christians, who met them with savage fury.

They clubbed away at the Glandelinians fiercely, and the more that rushed over the works the fiercer the hand to hand fight became. The christians fought with the most terrific fury, and as themcrushing foe assailed them with a fiercer rush they met them brutally with the bayonet and shot at all that assailed them.....

Swarms of the enemy having passed through an ever widening gap were trying to get to the rear of the angelinians desite the raking fire from the christ ian batteriesand when they did the Angelinians were prepared and poured a heavy fire of musketry and canister upon them cuting them down by a whole thousands.

Even scores of the Glandelinian columns were melted away and just as many spranf sprang among the christians and opened a raking fire themselves but it was useless.

The roaring of artillery and firearms, the bloodcurdling yells of the Glandelinians, the moans of the wounded and dying, and the whistling of bullets and the screaming of shells was heartrending. More and more of the enemy were pouring over the works seeming to pay no head tothe awful fire from the guns f the batteries and rushing over at many o points. Fiercer grew the handto hand struggle, shel s bursting everywhere, and bullets hitting the groundmade the dust g fly.

Evans r shed past Angeline flourishing his glittering his sabreand yelling commands incessantly. He rallied the men to fiercer f effortsand the death struggle raged all along the line.

"DOWN WITH THE FREE NASIONS. DOWN WITH THE FREE NASIONS."Shouted the Angelinians, repelling the onrushing Glandelinians furiously. The The ground was strewn with thousands of dead and wounded of both sides, but the strug le grew more fiece fiercer, more and still more of the Glandelinians swarmingover the works firing as they jumped or sprang, while many others disabled the artiller,y blew up the gun cassions and killed the gunners after a terrific fight with them.

They seemed only to laugh at the fire of t echristians which mowed them down in masses per second, assailing theChristians right and left, hitting and hanging away with the butts of their musket mu k muskets and using their bayonets cruely. Evans again rushed past Madge Evans as he saw a score of Glandelinians dashing toward her.

Sudde ly a stalwart Glandelinian rushed at him with drawn cabre the man being a captain, Evans meeting him furiously braining the Glandelinian stone blow ed of his own sabre. But now fifteen assailed himon every side and his anger arose. Tears sprang to his yes , tears of wild desperation, and he slashed right and left with his sabre, untill he broke it over a furious Gray coats head. That man went down with a thud.

Evans quickly drew his pistols and hammered many soon laying all of his assailants low. The hand to hand fight raging on all sides was increasing, and it seemed as if there was no end to the swarming enemy. Evans now grappled with a Glandelinian officer to get his sabre, and both clutched at eac h each other and rolled over and over in a death struggle. Evans was soon down with the graycoats on to top but he managed to raise his reloaded pistol before the human fiend could strike and shot his brains out, and the Glandelinian rocled off from him dead.

Evans then drew the sabre from the mans scabbard and flourished it wildly in the air as he saw Jennings divisions coming to the aid.

"That's it boys, drive them back."

Up came the reinforcements with a rush and s slowly but surely drove the enemy back over the works , pressing them back step by step. The Glandelinians utterly exhausted, and the other divisions too far yet, and their main line badly shattered by the deadly fe christian fire and the fury of the angelinians with their bristling hedge of bayonets, slowly fell back the assault on the hill being al andoned while the advancing christians l'et out a serious of tumultious yells and deafen ing shouts and cries that would have done credit to the very devils themselves.

Many who had gotten far into the works had been surrounded by the christians and taken prisoners . Many od of the guns that were not disabled opened fire upon the slowly retreating enemy, the broadsides of shells plowing their li es to pieces, throwing the survivors into confusion, and makin making them retreat a faster. Just than one of the liue lieutenants cried nout;

""Fresh divisions of the enemy are advancing to renew the atack, which the others have abandoned."

"Load your guns. ""Commanded Jennings;"Be ready for them."

During the short lull the christians had reg ined their breastworks and rifle pits and strengthened them. The fresh divisions of the Glandelinians were approach ing on the run and with haughty steps, the firing commencing again vigourously and the christian, battalions, dragoons,, corps, infantry, gavarly and brigades rushed to the works and from a more impenetrable line than the first one, the enemy enemy recieved a terrible storm of lead and canister. Nearer and nearer came the Glandelinians and soon came on with a rush, opening fire upon the christian whose lines again seemed to let loose a fire of hell. The graycoats melted away in thous ands per minute but on and on came the survivors did discharging their firearms in an alarming fahion.

Again and again the christian gunners poured in dadly broadsides but the Glande linians drew closer and charged in thick parallel lines.

They assailed the breastworks furiously but their lines were swept by a most de tructive fire before they drew near the christians.But after a terrific ch charge the glandelinians carried a portion of the lineto theleft , but they could not hold the position long as a part of Jennings infantry plunged among them with a horrible tumult of bayonets and pikes and clubbed muskets, and after a gallent hand to hand fight drove the Glandelinians back over the works with the loss of two hundred and d twenr twenty thousand.

The Glande i Glandelinians along the rest of the linesc encountering a scathing artill ery and musketry fire fe' fell in frightful swarms, but theurvivors came on yell i g yellinglike demons. Despite the destructive artillery and musketry discharges the enemy charged on/ and now for several minutes several of the Glandelinian brigades were in deadly peril of being swept out of existance and so fell back upon the main body so swiftly that again the whole line was compelled to retire.

Dare-not-lies divisions who had abandoned their assault had fallen back on Margrets lanes and ga guarding several passes on a hill, and here he wax was enabled t o make a determined resistance against eatens army who attacked in three seperate divisions. The left under general Beelzebub marched along the shore of a creek under a galling fire, the center under No-good and Child general and the right under St Satan and Cannon marched up the Angeline railroad, which passed betwen gondons hills. Noo No-good advancined under a scathing fire, and after a furuous fight drove the christians at Seven Palms away with frightful loss to themselves. At the same time Beelzebub was pressing forward and attacked vances cavalry divisions, but were routed and scatteredafter a fearful conflict.

Satan advanced from the railroad at the same time andmetGreatheart. A bloodier conflict ensued and while it was raging , No-good as ascended the wooded hill and gained a Greatheart rear, but encountered an annihilating fire , while donald wansonisss men rep sented No-goods forces furiously and drove them upon the bayonets u of Greatheart men, and after fighting desperately hand to hand with the christiansin front and rear, and suffering from terrible loss and threat ened with annihilation Nogood was compelled to surrendre

In the meantime an after an hour of hard fighting and with varying fortunes on both sides and and the mutual losses dreadful, the glandelinians under St eaten were on the point of carrying the works when the Angelinian battalions crashed down upon their rear and hurled the enemy away from it pellmell.

So desperate was the stbborn resistance of Dare-not -lies veterans and battaklions that the grav lines assaulting the breastworks, were shattered and cut to pieces.

Satans whole force again retured, but other assaults were made at differnet points of the line, these assailants advancing so quietly that the first intemation Robert Camps Angelinians had of their advance was the bursting of shells from their guns over the breastworks. When Apeleon s Glandelinians were within musket shot distance of the Angelinians they opened a destructive fire with artillery and firearms, spreading consternation among the ranks of the foe.

A sanguinary battle raged.

Terrible was the roar of three hundred Glandelinian cannon and five hundred Angelinian cannon. Now in four lines the Glandelinin srushed on to assail the christians in the face of a horible storm of grape and canister. They reached the works, paused a moment, and then attempted with great desperation to carry, the ramparts, when the Angelinians behind suddenly arose and poured murderous storms of bullets upon them that a swe t them down in thousands. But in the face of that terrible fire, the enemy rushed upon them carried a port ion of the line, forcing the Angelinians to retrat, while they fought fiercely with sabres, bayonets, pikes and clubbed muskets.

After a terrific struggle the whole advanced force of the christians began to slowly give way. With a shout the enemy swept on but general Shelby came to the aid with his brigades and by keeping up a deadlier fire managed to hold the enemy at bay. General Meltertons Glandelinians however still swepton with a tremendous yell. On and on they rushed furiously and despite the fearful fire they recieved began to swarm over the works, assailing the bold defenderslike demons, shooting cutting, bayonetting and cutting them down in frightful numbers. In the meantime the other divisions were making desperate attempts to swarm over the main line of works killing all the gunners.

Poor Violet who had been in this vinicity had been attacked by six of the Glandelinians before she s could get away but one of the privates saved her by hacking right and left, with his sabre killing them all. The Glandelinians rushed upon the newcomers, and slashed and m hammered away at them fiercely. The christians clubbed away as if they fancied themselves axe briandes, and hammered away with a ll their loaded firearms. Guns once fired could not be reloaded and so were used as clum clubs the Angelinians also using their bayonets, and pikes and pistols at the crowding enemy right and left. Those who were unarmed clutched at their assailants, bu bit them wrestled with them, and tried to strangle or claw and b't or kicke kick them to death. It was terrible being man again man being man against man, on in one of the most savage hand to hand fights that ever raged before. General Boices columns of christians now came up and hurled themselves against the enemy with th terrible fury, and soon the enemy along his front were rushing this way und that in the wildest confusion.

Jennings force had been replaced by thatof general Evans who moved against these new assailants and charged the Glandelinian flank like a whirlwind. The Glandelinians become panic stricken and began to retreat in a stampede. While this was going on general Gobert Camp made a counter advance and attacked the Glandelinian columns under Cannon who were advancing through No blanket Lane, the assault being made with terribly terrible fury, Rine and Camp throwing their largest brigades upon the Glandelinians and for their advance guard there was little chance to rally.

One volley after another rang out as the Angelinians scattered the advance guard right and left , so that no considerable number could get togeter in any one place. As the Angelinians were advancing tward Bondons a asylum a large portion of general Howes Glandelinians were seen to come sudde nly forward.

A Tremendous fire was poured upon them, but confident of their superior numbers they came onreturning a scathing fire. HO Howe was determined to push on however and at once a sanguinary struggle ensued, and the smoke hund hung above them like a pap pall. The gallant Angelinians were determined to give the Glandelinians all the trouble they could, and made repeated and terrific onslaughts, but were at length forcing the enemy back to the verge of a creek where Cannons main body met them. The ground was soon covered at this point with many thousands of dead and wounded, and after reforming the Glandelinianagain went into action, rushing forward with a will. The charge was so impetious that general Ghrist divisions of Glandelinians drove a brigade of christians back upon the main line, but the Glandelinians themselves were soon moved down in such frightful numbers that they were glad to retire. Cannon seeing that he would be unable to cope with the Angelinians unless he brought a large force into action, sent a detatchment throu h the woods to turn his opponents flank. Rine percieved this movement and after delieveing delivering a withering fire the Angelinians retreated across the stream. Bringing forward his cannon ,owe plantedthem on the brow of a hill and kept up a strong ful fusillade upon the Angelinians, which was returned by general Givinns batteries, the big Angelinian cavalry divisions at the same time recrossing the creek which was not deep and had a firm firm bottom under a havy fire of bursting shells, and after hard fighting, a main drove the Glandelinians back. One million thirty hundred more pressed on and after a fearful fight the Angelinians again retreated. Belzebib Beelzebub in the mean time having taken acircuitous rout so as to turn the Angelinian la flank fou d found this protected by batteries and after three desperate charges the Glandelinian so columns were cut down and driven back with the loss of thre generals unnamed.

The main lin e of the assailants continued on amid hundreds of thousands of wild yells, firing terrific volleys. The Angelinians answered with ringing shouts, and soon yells, musket volleys and shrill cries intermingled. For an instant only it looked as if the Angelinians might be driven back, but the Angelinians stood their ground doggedly and in a few minutes shouts were heard behind the enemy.

Reinforcements were evident ly coming to their aid, and with a shout they pressed forward, and the struggle soon became hand to hand. The beating of drums the rattle of muskets, the hoarse cries of the Angelinians and the terrifying e yells of the enemy confined in one ter ible uproar. It was not before long when Jennie who had been signalling with br scouts all this time found herself opposed by half a dozen yellowcoats, instead of gray, and at once she caught the glimpse of the face of one of them. It gave her a start for she fancied she recognised the fellow, and then Angelinians soldiers around her were forced to defend her desperately and surrounded by a mast maalstrome of battling men the matt er vanished from her mind. The man she had thought she had recognized had disappeared at the next moment, and another took his place.

All six of the Glandelinians seemed determined to kill brave litt le Jennie, and the fight with the men defending her waxed more horr hotter and fourious.

The foes assaulting Jennies defenders pressed them hard, and all seemd lost as all were bent upon her capture of or death. Sabres clashed against bayonet/ and more than one fierce thrust was turned aside at the instant when death seemd absolutely certain. Her defenders struck down three of them, and pressed forward but sudde nly one of the fallen managed to gē around her some way seized her by the leg and Jenni Jennie fell to her knees as her enemies having co overcome her defenders dashed upon her. As one of the fallen grasped h her by the throat and shocked her with all his strength, another raised his musket aloft while a look of hat overspread his face, and in another instant the blow would have fallen, but in the nick of time Jack Evans came to Jennies aid. Hurriedly thrusting his bayonet through her assailants heart, he ripped open his body and the giant Glandelinian with his in testines coming out fell to the ground his musket flying out of his hands, striking the ground several yards distant and going off. He then drew a pistol from his hostler and discharged two quick shots at the Glandelinian shocking her, . He let go his grasp and dro dropped lke a log. Jennie quickly sprang up a again and Evans cried as the other Glandelinians pressed forward;

"STAND BACK."

The Glandelinians paused when they saw the determined look in Evans face andin a moment a number of Angelinians were athis side. The enemy slowly fell back and on sped the Angelinians amid smoke and flame of bat le.

"Thanks, dear Evans thnaks." Muttered Jennie pressing the soo soldier boys hand for a moment; "When the battle is over I would like you to come into my fathers headquarters when we setle down."

Suddenly there was a ter ible scream high up in the air and with a wake of smoke behin behind it, a monsterous shell was seen rushing down upon them. It was seen at once that the fearful thing a vertible high explosive, would strike in their very midst and bursting might destroy a hundred of them.

The man seeing it coming scattered but Jennie remained firm. The shell came rushing tward her holding a nd shrieking like a evil demon bent upon tearing her to pieces for being righteous, but she either did not see her danger or cared nothing about it. As the shell came right at Jennie, Evans turned uttered a cry of horror, and then dashed straightupon Jennie and bore her to arth, both falling to the ground so violen t was the boys charge and both rolled for several h ndred yards like balls.

In another instant the shell struck the ground not twelve yards distant and exploded with an earsplitting crash that sat stunned them both. Jagged fragments of iron was thrown in every direction and for a moment the air was thick with smoke while the pieces of the exploding shell flew over Jennies head and left her unharmed though a few minutes later both found themselves in the bottom of the crater torn by the shell. Had she remained standing she would surely have been torn to pieces and killed. For an instant Jennie lay as if stunned while several Angelinians rushed up to the craters rim expecting to find her dead and mangled.

The soldiers with long ropes pupo pulled Jennie and Evans up from the lot on of the crater and Jennie soon recovered her strength having ben only stunned by the concussion of the explosion and notby the fall.

"Hurrah." Cried themen. "She escaped unharmed. Hurrah for Eva as her savior."

"I beg your pardon Jennie for being so rude." Said Evans naively;

"But it was the only thing I could think of at the moment."

"Say no more about it Jack dear." Said Jennie with tears of gratitude in her eyes; "Papa will make a general of you when I tell him of your bravery in saving me vice. I had though that the fearful screaming was from Be foe and did not see the shell."

The enemy was now rallying and the struggle continued anew.

"Forward men." Shouted pob to his cavarly divisions.

In another moment all wereon the thick of the fight again, and in the midst of the smoke and flame of battle, the rattle of hundreds of thousands of musketry the bursting of hundreds of shells at once the Angelinians rushed on and the battle raged fiercely on all sides. The combined forces under Belzebub and Child s Strangle attacked the Angelinians with the utmost order ferocity, the on s aight being ter rific terrific and fight as they would the christians were slowly driven back. Atlast with a rush and a roar the Glandelinians bore down upon the spot where Jennings divisions stood holding its ground and after fighting fiercely for several minutes reinforcements arrived and the Glandelinians were repulsed with frightful loss. The enemy however were expecting reinforcements from Shoemannia the main commander of this Glandelinian army and general Smiths troops advanced to rene renew the attack.

This battle was raging within fifty miles of the great city of Angelina and general Shoemannia was bound to hold general Livian at bay at all costs.

The Glandelinians came on at a run and when within musket shot distance they recieved a fire that tore and mangled their main lines frightfully, but though they were forced to recoil they with frightful yells opened a heavy fire upon the Angelinians who pressed down after them in a sea of smoke and fiery conflargrat ions of musketry.

The ga Glandelinian withering fire wasincessant but the assaults of the christians were so furious that fter daperate fighting the left wing of the enemy at this point were in confusion, and fight as g furiously as they would it was in vain to check the irrestible charge of the christians, and they began b give way but as they were fal ing back general Caswells divisions came up and supportedthe them and the fight became more fierce and bloody still. Yelling like demons, the Glandelinians with great daperation atempted to press forward with the bayonet, . Theenemys dragoons surged upon against Jennings line like a huge wave from an angry sea, thecollishion being terrific, the dragoons outnumbering the christ christians, and the onset was so furious that Je nnings men were thrown into some confusion and portions of the line retreated. General Evans with his divisions rallied them and met the furious chargeof the enemy. One whole brigade was was surrounce surroundedand cut off by the Angelinians and the Glandelinians made desperate efforts to cut their way through, but it was not an e asy thing to do.

Three quarters of their number fell and the rest were compelled to surrender.

The main line of Evans brigades met the charge of the dragoons with terrible carnage, the whole division of Glandelinian dragoo dragoons charging like a thunderbolt.

It was a tremendous shock and the first line of christian infantry were borne down amid the hoofs of the horses by the impetious of the rush. But those behind delivered a simultaneous withering fire emptying scores of thousands of saddles will with well aimed vol'eys. Then it was slash cut and thrust, but the big veterans of the dragoons were were amazed at the dexterity of the christian infantry with their bayone's and pikes.

Strange movements among the dragoons started, then the whole line recoiled the Angelinian leaders yelling;

"Forward boys. The enemy are retreating. Give them a a swift and close chase."

With a shout the victorious Angelinians rushed after the m. As the first brigade including Jennings were rushing on up rose on all sides but at far dis tances huge wa llsof gray and yellow coats and these assailed the christians furiously. The Glandelinians went at the christians with the fury of the tornado through the wooded stretch of country but the Angelinians met them wth with cool courage and a terrific slaughter at once ensued. Jennings divisions were on the left of the ambushed army and recieved the fu ll for e of the onslaught that was made gallantly. There was a hot struggle all along the line and after fighting fiercely for several hours the assailantsunder general Beelzebub were hurled back their lines crushed and mangled. Gen. on mit himself at the head of the main line of assailants and attacked with unabated fury and fatal fearful was the struggle that raged. A battery of five hundred and fifty cannon was brought up and soon a continuous and dreadful cannonade rent the air and as more parks of artillery arive a thousand went into action. Thousands of shot and shell were hurled upon the Glandelinians, and the heavy cannon fire of so many guns made great breaches or gaps in the lines of the assailants at every discharge. But the Glandelinians un de Smith though going down in many multitudes, assailed the batteries in overwhelming numbers and after cruel fighting and after losses assailing car ied it, the Angelinian gunners defending the cannon f fighting to the last man.

The fury of the battle increased and during the f rious struggle the batteries had been captured though the Glandelinians had lost 1,150,565 in this tremendous as ault.

The whole gray line now swept across the field like a multude of savages, making great breaches in Jennings lines. Cannon launched sweeping assaults with ten sperate divisions against the thinning lines un der Jennings, and the fighting grew so fierce ab and bloody that scores of solitudes lay dead or wounded.

Fiercer and fiercer became the fighting and positions were taken and retaken over and over again. Finally the Glandelinians forced the center amid the dreadful carnage, pressing their way through with terrific slaughter, and during the awful struggle drove the christians clean out of their position, driving the christians farther and fath farther back.

Jenningsline however held like deem demons and along their front the Glandelinians were checked by the ferocitiy of the christian rear resistance, and even driven back forced o to leave much of their supplies, ammunition wagons s, artillery big stacks of arms and artillery in the hands of the christians. The Glandelinians however did not count themselves beaten and the attack was soon resumed with awful fury, the Glandelinians charging like a tidal wave, the angelinians throwing themselves heart and soul into the defense. Screaming shells nearly filled the air and the loss of the Angelinians was over two thousand two hundred men a minute.

The losses of the assailants per minute was ten thousand. The battle raged fearfully on all sides, both sides hammering away for all they were worth, and the roar of the cannonading was deafening and so tremendous that the ground shook like an earthquake. The discharge of firearms was more frightful and incessant and general woe ou Bae Beech was killed on the side of the foes.

A large force of Reppos Angelinians gave way in the face of the enemys heavy fire and by four oclock that evening several hundred thousand men went to the aid of the Glandelinian troops, after bloody fighting and the mutual losses dreadful. Jennings suspected at once that the enemy was making a shrewd movement and that thechristian lines fighting Cannons men would have to retreat or be caught in a general ambuscade and forced to surrender, so he sent a courier to the commander in chief informing him that a large body of the enemy was assailing the right and left flank, and then ordered his divisions to charge while the battle was raging in its fullest fury.

"My God." Said Lieutenant Evans; "That is going right into the jaws of deaths."

"It is to cover the retreat of the rest that we do so." Said Jennings that reply as they went on like an avalanch at the swarming Glandelinians n in front of them who opened a simult aneous withering fire and thre or the entire front lines of the christians fe ll in dead and wounded. But the whole division did not stop at that account, but charged on under the same ha havy fire, even from two sides and despite being placed between two p firas fires broke the line of grayscoats, throwing them into confusion and cutt ing and shooting down hun dreds of scores of Glandelinians par seconds.

The Glandelinian officers were amazed and did n not know whatto make of such a desperate attack byJennings divisions when destruction would be the almost certain result. But the angelinians fought with such fury and slew so many of the gray coats, that the other Glandelinian brigades had to be brought to bear. Time and again did the opposing lines charge at each other and every charge brought on ter-ible slaughter. It was an unequal fight, but a brave one at that, while it lasted, but Jennings forces soon having lost three quarters of their two million men began to give way and retreat. The attack made by Jennings division s di d not prevent the pursuit of the enemy, though it prevented Wienstiens Angelinians from ne being surrounded.

Seeing the peril of his army Wienstien had resolved to retreat until all came from the main force. The retreat was begun at once Jennings handful of men making a stand at St vincents Convent and trying to stem the current of disas disaster.

The Glandelinians pressed on in their attack and though they made a ferocious defense they were outnumbered and forced to retreat, several Glandelinian batteries pouring broadsides upon them. The angelinins were now in full retreat flowing in hot hast across a large stone vi aduct called Jennie's bridge, which ha ahd not been destroyed yet, and this was soon jammed with christ ians retreating t in the wildest confusion. Thepersuing Glandelinians were in the heat of noi[illegible] ever th their apparently gained victory and nothing seemed to daunt them now. With their colors flying, dri drums beating, and bugles and bands l play ing the Glandelinians rushed steadily on but now general „iving main like of batteries concentrated upon them pouring a storm of shot shell and high explosives .

The Glandelinians in their smart gray uniforms and gli' glittering bayonets made a sight not soon to be forgotten In twenty minutes this christian division had crossed it, theother retreating forces haing having retreated across the stream at all points, but the Glandelinians swarmed across the bridge and the creek also and there were sharp engagements between the retreat ing Angelinians and their pursuers. The nature of the country o in theneighbor hood f of the creek made it possible for the Angelinians to make a better running fight than they could have done in the open and soon the creek was a mass of dead and wounded in grays The fleeing Angelinians though covered by general Vivians batteries were forced to retreat faster the cheering Glandelinians pressing hot after them, heavy firing being heard occasionally at one point and another along the line while on and on pressed the Glandelinians?

But neglecting to take advantage of the victory he had gained general Gan on le lieving the fugitive divisions to be greater t n than they rarely were, ad anced very s s slowly and cautiously, and gave the christian batteries better chance and his men went down in columns and regiments seemingly at every steps At this moment the most of Gannons men had crossed the river, a large rear guard being leftbehind to destroy the bridge. Beanlon who was advancing hashastily to stop Gannon's men arived at the stone bridge and attacked the rear guard so fiercely that reinforcements were sent in hot haste, and many hundreds of thousands of Glandelinians recrossed the river and the struggle was more fearful than before.

As the Glandelinians had a larger force opposed to them were were badly handicapped but still they were determined to destroy the bridge and an appalling charges were met made and met again and again, the Angelinians making desperate efforts to cross the river and drive the Glandelinians back.But this they found to be a very exceedingly dangerous operation because the Glandelinians delivered a fearful fire all along the line mowing down thousands of the christians th to their ones. Yet Weinstine came up with very heavy forces, and in vain the Glandelinians made a des desperate charge upon the purple lines and stormed with volleys, but they could not drive the christians backs An hour passed and still the contest raged and increased in fury and the battle seemed no nearer to its end than ever» Gannonge divisions pressed to the attack vigourously and he was ever upon the alert , but under that scathing fire the Glandelinians were driven back time and again» The christians were holding their ground stubbornlyand would not yeild an inch, and the Glandelinians though ocuarages s and ex even reckless(Which was the cheif cause of their heavy loss in battles fought with the christians) could not even advance under the scathing fire and so the brigades fell back back back, while the infantry and dragoon s swept forwards Baldwins artillery had also been trained upon the Glandelinians and now these hammered away in in the most horrible manner and a large body of Glandelidian troops a million strong under general George Corbin and Henry Ombhorn after nearly being swept out of existance by the christian fire suddenly recoiled leaving ther that to their artillery in the possession of the christians.

The main force of the enemy was advancing in overwhelming numbers and in fearful array also being under Maldon Weinstine And general Granbloss tal the christian commanders seeing their danger j knew if they did not act quickly t heir whole division would be routed and so general Weinstien gave orders for the battalions and cavarly divisions who were not yet in the action to charge the one my and try to[illegible]suddenly got ready and mounting their steeds rushed toard the enmys unbroken lines in formidable array, amid terrific broadsides of canister, lead grapeshot and plowing shells, and with frightful yells that were deafening they assailed the advancing Glandelinian s , with awful fury, and fearful was the simultaneous discharge of musketry, an d artillery, and desperate was the struggle that raged hand to hands

Crash and roar was everywhere everywhere and the fearful sh shot and shell plowed furrows on the ground and swept theonrushing christians down in multitudes.

Buton dashed the survivors withi irresistible force and the enemy confused at their daring recoiled, while the frontal lines though shattered and torn delivered a fearful fire on continously as they slowly retired.

But unfortunately a fresh force of Glandelinians was approaching like a huge billow and as the retreating and confused and persuing combatants fought furiously hand to hand, they assaild th the christians right and left wings in the most deadliest manner. The christians again recoiled only to make another s witherin charge. Many hundreds of their ranks were shot down simultaneously during the awful charge by the enemy's incessant fire and soon also two brigades of the enemy were wiped outof existance.

The christians were again repulsed, and oh at what a cost. Fifty generals, unmanned three hundred captians, nineteen colonels, one thousand other officers of small rank and two million christian troops were killed and wounded. At the right and left wings the conflict was still raging furiously and soon extended n, along the center increasing with indomitable fury. The conflict became better and fiercer and the Glandelinians swooping forward to another charge a nin drove a force of the christians out of their position, but all theother forces did their best to hold them at bay. Hampsonia, Bob Windermine and Ben Ilgan, whose gray waves millions strong were crushed against the ch istian lines only regat hered their torn and shattered lines to go forward at it againand now milk and Ben Yens hurried largeforces of Omarian Curdes to support them, and the attack of this great waveof Glandelinians went on with redouble fury.

Hampsonias advancinf Glandelinians took -ost on the west si e of a burning farmhouse after being torn to pieces w by a concentrated artillery fire but here tendings had drew up the greater part of his forces with the - reinforcemen ts under Yens Hampsonia with a strong lineof veterans in a w ood on a high rise and place placed between two fires these Glandelinians recoiled. The distant artillery fire was increasing still more and every once in a while hundreds of shell would burst right near where the two generals of the christians were standing watching the great passage of arms in gray.

Not far away was a long row of stockades full of child captives held there to be murdered in the cruellest way known. Taking the rest of his force general Hampsonia advanced gallant ly and what joy thrilled the hearts of the captive children, when they saw theadvancing christians and implored God to cause the Angelinians to save them as soon as they could. Several boyscouts reported to Hampsonia as batteri batteries were trained upon the stockades what was in those stockades and he an swered grimly;

"Well than by the aid of God and all theHeavenly hosts, we will try to get thechildren out and make them awfully happy in the face of the enemy afterward. Boys at the artillery cover thecharge of myn my men only and do not cannonade the stockades after all as they are crowded with captive children."Then turning to the infantry lines he cried waving his sabre;

"Forward men to the stacks"

Advancing boldly the christians appeared at the ford and opened a withering storm of fire upon the advancing Glandelinians with great vigor, swarming out in great force, the Angelinians crossing the river in multitudes by wading, determined to rescue the helpless children or annihilate their foes to do so.

A long ma ssive line of the Free Masons stood their ground stuttornly and kept their line in flame and smoke, but on came the Angelinians to the childrens delight, and after delivering a murderous fire the long line of graycoats had to give way before a superior force.

The angelinians with a ringing shout pushed on and soon more Glandelinians appeared in frightful numbers, and indeed it a was now time for Bob and his cavarly forces to assail the enemy.

"Forwards!"She shouted w waving his sabre, and with a rush the brave cavarly men unslinging their deadly carbines followed straight up a slight rise and seemingly with no more s effect o or effort than if they had ben on level grounds.

It was one of those moments when to hesitate in , is to be lost, and when a brave dash will mean everything. The brave men understood what would be the result of hesitation and fariously urged their steeds up the rise despite the raking broadsides of shells, it being a desperate move, but determination might win the day for the Angelin Ange inains to cause therescue of the children whose hearts were fluttering with great hopeant they would not hesitate now or could not in fact, for to do so would mean frightful destructions.

Fearful was the fire the enemy poured upon them but a few minutes would decide the question, and Bob was ready to take every chance for the sake of his country, and God and for the children. Wherever he led the men the men were ready to follow and there was no holding back now. Hampsonia's men them selves p were pressing on just behind the rise resolved to drive back the stu bborn Glandelinians. Bod Bob now discovering where the enemy were charged up the hill at a whirlwind pace followed by his five million s cavarly men.

Straight at the surprised Glandelinians dashed the gallent Angelinians with such irresistible force that the Glandelinians after delivering a few withering discharges of musketry which mowed down one million christians, just simply showed how fast they could stampede down the other sides.

Part of the division still held however, and bullets whistled all around general Bob who kept on though wounded four times. Reaching the t op of therise his horse gave a neigh. Bob waved his sabre again and sh shoutedin shrick clear ton es heard above the din of the conflict;

"Forward my brave j men and the stockade is ours."

The cavarly men came dashing up to the top of the ill ten the n rushed at the graycoats delivering a witherin g fire and the Glandelinians became utterly demor ilized at thesudden appearance of the christian cavealy, but they drooped to their knee with bayonets fixed.

But like a tornado the Angelinian cavarly men bore down upon the enemy not caring for their old bayonets and soon after discharging a fearful volley sent the first divisions of the Glandelinians flying in all direction s and compelling the rest to retreat. The christians now dashed pellmell for the long lie of stockades standing for ten miles but were met by a ter if terrible fire from mill ns of loophole loopholes.

I920.

At lastgathering in great force the Angelinians swept forward in double lines at a tremendous charge and the foremost re ac reaching the stockade fu furiously attempted to scale the pla s palasades. Awful was the fire poured upon them from the loopholes and though every swem atempting to climb the palasades were shot down thousands of the Angelinians swept tward the gates and atempted to batter them down with the buts of their guns, but every one rushing for the gates also met with complete annihilatons Hempsonias veterans sweeping tward the fence loke wa' walls also attempted with great force and courage to batter down the strong palasade along their front, while thousandsor more christians rushed for themany g gate gates simultaneously, a thousand for one gate, and atempted to bater them down but were met by an awful fire that swept them down as fast as they came. The roar of musketry and great gund guns was a deafening and earsplitting, and the shouts and yells of the millions of Glandelinians within the palasades was quite uncanny. While this desperate fight was going on several christian bat eres were massed upon the palasades of the rto keg stockades and these broke into action withs redoubled roar.

A FRIGHTFUL BATTLE LINE OF SLAUGHTER TEN MILES LONG. AND THE TW BRIBLE EXPLOSION WITHIN THE STOCKADES. THE RESULT.

The child prisoners inside the forts or prison pens were badly frightened when they saw the terrible christian cannon pointed upon the stockades in long chains and in action with a terrible roar but the thousands of explosions of shells were only among the enemy. While Hempsonian veterans and mobs cavarly were still assaulting the palasades the christian forces under mindernine also, now surged forwar forward and kept on advancing like a storm wave. On and on they pressed the stockades nearly hidden in the palls of smokefrom bo withari ng discharges of musketry and great guns. Scores of thousands of the christians were swept down by that deadly fire but onward rushed the survivors and drawing nearer to he stockades soon reached it and hundreds of thousands of them put their pr own muskets through the loopholes and poured in a ravingfire upon the Glandelinians within med mowing scores upon scores of thousands down. In assaulting the gates e even with cannon balls from their artillery, for they dared not assault it with infanty again and meet annihilation the christians found them awfully strong and were impissible to be batered down by musket butts or battering rams. Several hundred of the big; est cannon were now brought forward and trained upon the hundreds of gates, but the fire from the e ems swivil guns was too much for the artillery men and the christians were compelled to drag them back while the assaulting columns continued their attack on the plasal palasades only to go down in multitudes.

Beinliagns force now at his command had also re rushed forward as fast as they could run and under a withering storm of bullets threw themselves with the rest of the force against the stockades. Again the few hundred big guns were brought forward to batt en down the gates but high explosives but the enemys fire was again too hot for them.

Though seemingly reckless of life in their endeavor to rescue the children the Angelinians at those guns could not face that dreadful fire that mowed so many myriads of the surging to troops down o for thlength of ten miles.

But they had a scheme. Dragging the cannon forward a litt le closer the Angelinian tied long heavy cordsto the hammers and pretended that they were retreating buthkeeping the other end of the cords in their hands.

Then concealing themselve behind bushes and they jerkd the strongs and the diche discharge made tothe gat es fly from their hinges and go crashing into the yards of the stockag stockades to the delight of the watching children.

With a thrilling shout the Angelinians went swarming through the enclosures and a fearful hand to hand fight ensued, while the cannons of the nearest batsies were trained upon the frontal palasades. The leader seing this took a lot of shavings and formed it like a strong tw tward large piles of powder kegs determined t o blow the assailants and the children into the air if he and his men had to die with them. The other leades of the other various stockades did the same.

Then the Glandelinian generals opened he kegs and let some of the powder out over the string of shavings. Then finally he lit the shavings. The Glandelinian troops on the outside defended themselves with brutal desperation nand clubbed away with their muskets and blazed away with pistols at the christians right and left strewning the enclosures with dead and wounded in purple. But more and more came swa rmingin through the entrance e ntrance, and now the palasades were bat ered down by shells from the nearest batery and hundreds of thousands of christians swept into the yards like a swarm of angry bees. The enemy met them furiously with tthe bayonet, ad discharged their muskets and pistols at point blank an d used sabres and pikes but more and more thousands of christians swarmed into theyards untill it was fairly purple from the Angelinian uniforms. Benligan saw that the enemy were already geting away and gave a ringing cheer. On and on pressed the christians charging with their bayonets and sabreand the enemy became confused and fled into the fortifica tions and out abandoning everything and fleeing tward Shoeman Shoemanias main line. The fires Shoemanias man main line. The fires burned dangerously close to the powder an d another minute would be fatal. With a ringing shout, (The Angelinians not knowi ng their danger) rushed up to the fortifications battered down the wooden doors and rush ed into the fortifications. Some of the Angelinians had already set fire to the fortifications which on the inside were swarming from top to bot om with purple coats who were as searcing for the poor children children. In the next mom ent all t e soldiers and nearly thre hundred thousand children lay amid burning wreckage, thousands of them with their bodies in littlebits, many others mangled beyond description and the rest with a' all their inte t intestines all exposed of bespatered in on the wreckage. The deafening roar of these series of explosions giong off almost simultaneously for the length of ten miles could be heard a n d f an d felt at general Vivians head quarters fifty miles away and even from the con cussion his the doors had ban broken from their hignges from the awful slamming and banging and all the windows were out. This scene was too horrible to de dwell upon longonly t o say f further that those not in the fortifications were annall ed.

And it was an not that Glandelinian payed dearly for at the Patle of nir Repne follofolling some time later.

In the meantime the batt e was raging simultaneously at other points of the line. The second divisions under Balzebub pressed forward in hot haste and discovering an overwhelming force of christians advancing delivered an awful fire that was almost simultaneous then d alwoly fell back tward Weinstein hills. The christians at first did not see his forces and were surprised indeed by that galling fireand f fearing an ambush b fell back themselves tward St Peters creek but discovering an advancing force of the enemy near Vivian Lane and learing of the great disater general Hempsonia sent a message of it to general vivian , and aroused his men to great de desperation while the enemy advanced with all haste to counter attack the christians with renewed fury.

They were soon within musket shot distance of the Angelinians who at once let loose a fierce storm of rocketry and artilery and such a sud den and destructive fire it was that horrible havoc was compitted among the lines of the enemy, many large gaps being made at once but despite all he havoc the enemy continued the advance and surged upon Hempsonins right wing in great monsterous waves wh which were only torn down and mangled. A fearful fight was now raging and even mobs forces came forward to se our pot support general Hempson las left wing.

On and on surged the furious stream of Glandelinians and soon both armies came together in a fiercer hand to hand fight. Bob now hastily swept forward with his cavarly while Yens Baldwin on the side of the enemy fell mortally wounded.

Fearful was the artillery fire and large multitudes of Glandelinians were swept t o destrucivion the Angelinians being stubborn and though heavy columns were thrown against the christian lines with terrible fury they would not give an inch of ground and instead hurled n back t e waves ther waves of men with frightful decimination.

But the struggle had been a terrible one before the assailants had been hurled back. Hundreds of thousands of sabres had ben used in an alarming fashion, muskets were used as clubs,, and many a many Glandelinians and christian dogs fe ll dead t thrust through the body by bayonets and pikes. The enemy were merciless to the wounded and dying Angelinians and cruelly slew them. The rest of the second were advancing as fast as they could to the scene of action but did not arive untill within an hour. It was now five oclock and the bat le was still raging with unabated fury. The whole of the Masonic line was pressing forward, twenty thousand volleys per minute being poured upon the christian lines but the christians held their ground like tigers at bay their own linesbeing complely hidden in a pall of smoke from the continuous d's discharge of musketry and cannon and as the Glandelinians were now advancing in full force Baldwins artillery fairly blazed away sending broadside after broadside of shot and shell plowing through the enemys lines cuting them to pieces one by one. The tremendous cannonade seemed to shake the earth as the enemys batteries responded simultaneously and then with a prolonged roar.

As the awful cannonading seemed to be increasing, and the air was filled with astorm of screaming shells the christians rallied for a more furious effort and now made a desperate charging onslaught in heavy numbers surin surin surging upon the strong unbroken lines of the enemy with fearful force. Both armies were fighting like enraged demons and the discharge of artillery and firearms was so destructive that annihilation of either army seemed to be the almost certain result result.

At last the Glandelinians cent ending with overwhelming numbersslowly fell back while general Mindernine (Christian') Jule Benligan, and Dare-not-lie and several others with their large forces made a swift dash across an open plain and ascended the Weinstien hills, where a large body of Glandelinians were trying to gain their rear. On came these Glandelinian columns and now the Angelinians halting piured a withering storm of bullets upon them, and the destruction of life was so appalling that this terrible fire caused or compelled the flankers to retire.

Ine the meantime large cavarly divisions of Glandelinians under Gallabeo charged like a great force of devils on horseback upon Joices firm lines and after a fearful hand to hand fight fight was repulsed with the loss of three quarters of their division in killed and wounded.As fresh forces came on to take the place of those cut down and routed Joice's cavarly who were the first to advance in a chare charge were t then on a body strewn plain and joice that is the Vivian girl acting with her scouts for Joices force signalled for the cavarly men in purple to haul. Every man sheathed his sabre at the signals and and made ready for dangerous work. Pistols and carbines were examined, saddles, girths and bridals looked to and order passed from column to column. After waiting for about ten ten minutes in silence the cavarly leader waved his gleaming sabre above above his head and cried in loud otentorian tones;

"Advance to the road men, and fallin four longlines at the edge of the plains. Use as sabres lances and pistols and reserve the carbines. Charge in full gallop."

Then across the large plain dashed four long lines of cavarly at a thunderous gallop with general Corbin at the head waving his sabre. Not a voice was raised until they neared the approaching enemy.

Corbin then drew his pistol and fired tward the advancing troops as he yelled aloud;

"Forward men. Down with the Free Masons."

A yell of amazement and rage burst from the surprised Glandelinian troopers but it was mingled by the volleys, and the shouts sent forth by the Angelinian cavarly men, as they swept along after their daring leader

"Down with the men who butcher and cruelly abuse helpless children."

On, and on, they dashed shooting away like madmen, pushing forward an avalanch of smoke in their front line from the furious storm of fire they poured upon the enemy, and yelling aloud that terrible cry of vengeance. Still on kept the Angelinians keping up that awful firing shooting down many thousands of the Glandelinians and horses together, the enemy swarming forward to oppose them and opening as severe a storm of fire.

"Take it easy now my dear frei friends." Cried Corbin as the enemy were swarming forward like hundreds of thousands of bees hees;"Be ready with the carbines so as to be ready for a general fire."

The scene was soon one of lively confusion as both cavarly forces came to gether in a fierce hand to hand fight fight. Thousands at once fired point blank and struck at each other with a all the fury of men who did not expect mercy themselves and thousands of wild deadly and terrible cries resounded as the hand to hand fight increased in furt fury.

Thousands of horses reared and plunged, men clashed swords like demons, lances were thrust at each other and carbines were fired at point blank and also pistols were used with destructive effects.

The Glandelinians were mowed and cut or stabbed by the scores of thousands fearful cries arising amid the confused tumult of conflict and new dire confusion prevaled for some seconds but the gallant Glandelinian general leading his dragoons and lances beside the cavarly forces still spurred on crying;

"Forward dragoons,lancers, and cavarly men, and close ranks. Spur on through this tangled mass of christian dogs to avange the deaths of our comrades."

The dragoons obeyed moving forward against their furious assailents like an avalanch and fearful as the havoc among the column of dragoons as the storm of po pistol shots and carbine volleys point blank were opened upon them mingled with a tumult of lances and sabres while the other line of christian cavarly coming on like a mountian of wildly dashing horsemen poured in a second storm of fire tearing and mangling the Glandelinian columns this volley being more disasterous disasterous than the other, and terrible was the maelstrome of confusion, the clatt ering din of hundreds of thousands of lances clunbbed carbines and the ring or sabre against sav sabre, and bloody and deadly duels were fought on horseback , the horses plunging and kicking in a way to make a stirring scene indeed.

Yet engressed the fury stricken survivors of the Glndelinians their officer yelling;

"CUT DOWN THE CHRISTIAN DOGS. CLOSE IN DRAGOONS AND CHARGE UPON THEM KILL THEM LIKE THE CURS THEY ARE DOWN WITH THEM. FORWARD PRESS INTO THEM HARD AND SHOW THEM THAT THEY GOT TO RESPECT THE FLAG OF DEAR OLD GLANDELINIA."

The christian cavarly veterans under Logan now arived and immediately went into action, but at this moment he fell dead perised through the head by a bullet and as the forces came together under a long grove of palm trees there was a witherin and murdercus exchange of carbines and pistols and then as the cavarly forces came into a frightful mixup another of the christian generals fell dead his steed still galloping on through the clouds of smoke and flame.

On pressed the Glandelinian dragoons urged by Boo-Boo to burst through the sea of smoke wreaths and to assail the Angelinians with great desperation.

Though the afwul tumult of sabre and carbines and lances had made awful havoc in the columns of dragoons the survivors reached up to the glen to strike at their e e nm enemiesand they did lay on with awful fury yelling like fiends incarnate and such a clamor of sabres and pikes and lances cutrivaled the bark of the carbines and over two hundred fell in themaze of destruction within a few minutes. But however as Corbin had fallen mortally wounded the christians hard pressed by overwhelming numbers, began to give way, and soon the retreat was in earnest but general Joice called on his men to form behind a long low stone fence and he sprang on his horse for he had dismounted to at the approach of the veterans to lead about four million of his men and he kept crying to the cavarly man behind the stone wall;

"Hold the fence my lads, for though our forces out there are beaten others are coming on as fast as possible to aid us and will soon be here."

In the wild rush and by the excitement of the strife itself Joice did not forget the past disaster of the stockades and deided to annihilate the Glandelinian cavarly if possible and give no quarters. The carbines of the Angelinians were now blazing away frightfully and as the enemy carrying all before them came within range their numbers and in killed and wounded were like like the m leaves in an autum storm.

Thousands were mowed down per minute, and the roaring cannons again rent the air and awful was the havoc and desperate rush of the dragoons andGlandelinian cavarly and even Ji Joices columns were forced to give way.

Yet they faced the one my stubbornly as they blazed away with at them with their firearms and clubbed and cut many a Glandelinian down. Joice and his advancing horsemen were dealing fearlessly forwar forward to strike with their sa sabres who while those on foot [illegible] their horses. Then again all were whirled in a confused mass, with yells arising everywhere, mingled cries of rage and defiance, and thethe moans of the dying added with the deafening clashing of sabres and the groans of the fallen. Joice soon realized that he was far outnumbered, and that the dragoons were fighting like angry fiends but he struck away as bravely as ever calling on his men to hold their ground, while he also prayed that reinforcements would soon come to his aid.

His forces were sorely pressed by the desperate Glandelinian dragoons, andthe second officer of the large squadronsman directing the Glandelinians and he fought with a dep purpose in vi view. The attack on his force in that plain told the officer that the Angelinians were indeed striving with brutal desperation to force themannian lines at all reinforced he was resolved on blocking the way of these monstercus christian cavarly and dragoons forces.

General Joice escaped from without a scratch in the deperate struggle and all his men held their ground stubbornly until the Angelinians could not retreatbe hurl back the Glandelinian dragoons with the loss of two hundred fifty thousand. Several of the defeated dragoon forces were dashing away toward the ob Bendinia Run when Poh rode up to the glen with his whole force. Jack wvans and general Mac Dane drew their own forces in a wheat field and listened to the sound of heavy firing that told that general Mc-Cann was rushing on with his forcesin a furious charge

Indeed it was true for Mc-Cann, Julo Benligan, LoveChild Dare-not-lie and Mc-Cant lar's forces were making a swift charge across theopen plains the Angelinians yelling like demons and when they were within musket shot distance of the enemy opened such an awful fire upon the Glandelinians that many gaps appeared and the first line in great confusion parted in the middle middle.

Seeing that they broke the Free Mason linein two the Angelinians with a shout rushed on and collided with a fresh force that was rushing across the plain, with fearful force. After a desperate fight the fresh force badly crippled by the awful fire of the christian musket rygave way in panic. But the other lines of the Free Masons had formed by this time and closing the large gaps in the middle and under cover of their artillery charged forward tward the Angelinians who now fought with greater desperation.

It was a deadly struggle and during the fury of the fight one of the Glandelinians under general Love-Pleasure was nearly swept out of existance and their leader mortally wounded.He had been riddled by bullets and died a few minutes.With fixed bayonets the Angelinians met the second rush of the enemy and fightinglike demons held them at bay for a while but suffering fearful losses.

Even with Jack wvans soldiers and a Glandelinian dragoon the re was raging a fierce hand to hand fight.

"Forward, down with God's enemy." Yelledgeneral Dane as he threw a lighted powder filled cigar in a Glandelinians face and then made a dsh at him to hurl him from his horse with a heavy blow of his sabre. As general Dane dashed another Glandelinian officer back with his sabre, his Glandelinian drew his pistol and fired at the christian general but the bullet only grazed his head. Aroused Dane struck the Glandelinian on the head with his sabre braining the officer and splitting his head clean to the chin. The slain Glandelinians fell sprawling from his horse who dashed off riderless. The struggle was now raging more furiously the Angelinians defending themselves in deadly earnest and now a furiu furicous Glandelinian built like an ox rushed at general Dane Mane, and struck at him with his sabre.

As the Glandelinian kept fighting with general fane both leaders of each side kept calling on thir men to encourage them in the deadly struggle, and their voices could ve te heard above the thunder of the deadly carbines, and pistol shots and the clashing of sabres and tumults of lances. Men were falling steadily in thousands on each side but the fight was increasing in fury. Dane put forth his best efforts, but his powerful enemy enemy fought with desperate velour and the struggle was doubtr ul.

Fearful and incessant was the roar of thousands of firearms as the contending forces under Mc-Cann strove in vain to hold the Glandelinians under general Hatschild, back and general Dane was thrilled to the heart by it. The smoke hungin the sky and d everywhere else in a white pall and bullets were whe whistling all about him as he hatled still on with the desperate Glandelinian and he at last forced his stronger enemy back and sending his sabre flying through the air and taking him prisoner. But he was assailed instantly by anothe stalwart Glandelinian and he struck out a desperate blow at Dane as heralled out to his comrades who were pressing their way through the line of christians on horseback with great fury.

"STRIKE FOR YOUR KING, AND DEATH TO GOD AND THE ANGELINIANS AND OTHER CHRISTIAN DOGS." Cried the Glandelinian officer.

"DEAT H T O YOU." Cried Dane as he parried the a vicious blow a! "And there is your last touch for me you scamp." Dane struck furiously a d the Glandelinian fe ll sr sprawling from his horse with a terrible gash on his forehead.

The Glandelinians were fighting bravely and the Angelinians had all they could do to hold their own, and fiercer and fiercer grew the hand to hand stu, le the christians charging back and forth among the Glandelinian horsemen delivering volleys by the thousand at point blank, and finally hurling their powerful as sailants back once more.

The Angelinians fairly hammered away with their carbines and pistols as they dashed in among their foes, and sabres were plied again and again with fearful effect. Again and again the forces closed in deadly strife the Glandelinian leader general Bech went down with a mortal wound in his breast and another one by the name of Henry Connenlly was killed. Seeing their two leaders slain the Glandelinian dragoons and cover y forces fell back, while the deadly conflict was still raging betwen Mc-Cann and Hatschild. The Glandelinians were pressing hard upon his columns of cavarly forces though they recieved a terrific fire which mangled their divisions frightfully. However they kept pressing on resolved to rout the daring Angelinians, but the more nearer the Glandelinians pressed forward the more of the christian cavarly arived and increased their fire and as he conflict was raging fiercely between Mc-Cann and Hatschild a large body of cavarlymen under general Stranglechild, made a furious dash for another line of Bobs cavarly men, but the christian caverly forces at this point was supported by Baldwin s batteries, the gunners opening fire with the greatest vigor and cut the Glandelinian columns of horsemen all to pieces. But on came the dashing Glandelinian cavarly the on a cavarly force of christians also pouring in a destructive fire, while the gunners swept their men and horses down by thousands with a storm of shot shell and canister.

But still on came the Glandelinian horsemen, every gap made they closed up a advancing on and nearing the cavarly force swarmed among them like a cloud of bees. Heir There was a simultaneous discharge of carbines and pistols at point blank but the enemy pressed among the Angelinians, who clubbed away at the graycots graycoats like cannibals. But the Glandelinians who survived the slaughter, with bloodcurdling yells also shot and cut many of the Angelinians down furiously, and tried to hurl the remaining ones back.

But the christians hammered away with their loaded pistols, and drew their six shooters and fired at the enemy so rapidly that more am and more awful havoc resulted in their lines.

But the enemy pressing forward in overwhelming numbers at last succeeded in driv i g driving the christians v back and capturing some of general Baldwins guns. Now Donald Hanson with his veterans came to the scene and determined to recover the guns advanced his forces of cavarly with a rush accompained by the defeated gunners and attacked the Glandelinians with redoubled fury.

The enemys continous artillery fire tremany gaps in the christian lines but on pressed Donalds veterans with fixed bayonets. The Glandelinians could not standthe chagre of christian cavarly and infantry both and gave way as the Angelinian veterans swarmed over the works. Thebreastworks were recovered, and now Donalds veterans of cavarly alone pressed on while other gunners took the places of the artillery the fo first gunners having almost a ll fallen. The whole scene was rapidly hidden with the smoke of battle and as the christians were still pressing on the Glande linian cavarly fired so frequently that their own lines were hidden in smoke caused by the awful disc a dischagrge of firearms.

Monsterous masses of the christians fell dead and many scores of thousands were wounded simultaneously by that awful fire delivered by the enemy but the survivors only kept on and flung themselves against the gray lines. Thebayonets were used fiercely and the veterans atempted with great bravery to press through the mulitude of Glandelinian cavarly but the Glandelinians fought desperately while falling ba ck, clubbing away with their carbines, slashing right and left with heir sabres and firing away with thir pistol a to a score of thousands of shots perse second.

Fiercer and more des erate became the struggle the Glandelinian cavarly men yelling like demons defending themselves with the greatest bravery.

Donalds Cavarly men lanced and sabred thousands of the Glandelinian horsemen and now Joe Mc-Cant ler Richard Mc-Cant lers brother came on with a large brigade to sup ort Donald. They opened a continous fire upon the enemys rightand a fiercer struggle than ever raged along that point, the brigades soon causing confusion among the Glandelinian cava rly and infantry but another detatchment of dragoons arived from across the shell swept plains and crashed upon the brigades like an avalanche. In the meantime general Mc-Canns forces were slowly giving way before overwhelming numbersunder general Hatschild, but during t the slow retreat they kept firing continously and rapidly at every step fairly paving the line of slow retreat with dead and wounded Glandelinians.

Bob saw the enemy pressing Mc-Cantler back and he ordered his own cavvly divisi divisions to hole hold the enemy at bay, but Jacob Baldwins artilleryopened fire upon the advac advancing Glandelinians with deadly effect hurling a storm of shot shell and grape and canister into their serried columns tearing them to pieces again and again, while eobs impatious charge combined confused the surviving columns somewhat and enabled general Mc-Cann to get away soft ly and to take possession a of a step rise of grou d ground which was already swarming with christian infantry and which fou had four th sand cannon on the sum it summits. The enemy after repusling Bob and scattering one of his divisions rushed on under a fearful fire from Baldwins batteries to drive Mc-Cantler or Mc-Cann I mean from hisnew position.

Though Baldwins gunners plied away with the big guns and tore the great Glandelinians columns to fragments and mangled thousands of their men per volley the survivors yelling with a universal din came nearer and nearer, and soon reached t the foot of the steep rise, and when Mc-Can Mc-Cann s men stormed volleys of shells and canister among the graycoats they tore the first line surging forward all down into dead and wounded.

THEENEMY WIN A GREAT VICTORY

The desperate Glandelinian survivors started to swarm up the side of the hills only to be swept down into mangled humans as fast as they came ty each broadd broadside, but over the loss the Glandelinian survivers were only furious and revengeful and after recoiling a short distance gathered into one solid line nny many scores of miles long and made a sudden and furious dash and despite the scathingfire of the artillery they rd reached the top of the rise, the whole line going over the summits almost sum simulaneously.

There was a withering undulating sheet of fire along the christian line followed by a roar that stunned the survivors and indeed the whole gray line for its whole length of really thirty miles was cut and mangled into fragments but nevertheless, though you would not believe it the survivors hurled themselves against the christians blazing away with their own muskets their own fire being ten fold heavier. But nve nevertheless the christian line was too strong to be broken just now and t the assailants broke into confusion and before theycould recover from the panic that was among their orn and shattered line the Angelinians dashed forward, and threw themselves with merciless fury upon the de morlized Glandelinians firing heavy and ter ible volleys in quick and el endless succession and driving them down the hil l in a worse a pain panic. Mc- Cann remained in his position and reformed his shatered lines and prepared to meet the next attack of the ene enemy in deadly ernest in case the enemy should come forward again. General Vivians right wing in the meantime had attacked general Bicknells left since early morning but they had suffered such frightful losses from deadly strings of m mile mines whose explosions made it a seem as if the ground was turating into volcanic eupitions that the christian columns millions strong were torn shattered and shivered into such ter itle numbers of slain and wounded that very few fragments had ben left.

The enemy had won a great victory at this poin' and the question was if it would a last. When Jack Evans cavarly forces appeared and opened a deadly fire upon the enemy assailing the brigades those Glandelinian columns also torn and mangled became panic stricken and fled scattering in many directions yelling and cursing likemadmen. But not a large force of batallions and infantry had arived und assailed Rod Bobs cavarly divisions on the left and right wings the o conflict increasing with desperate fury on the left of his cavarly divisions then a extending all along his lines and once more ra ing in general fury.

The discharge of musketry increased simultaneously as the enemy tried to break through the cavarly lines the air becoming white t with the thick pall of smoke and the roar of cabrins sounded on all sides and the moments of horror was like interninty.

Mc-Canns men who were not in action now congretated silently in their lines looking at each other with sadh eu eyes that showed detemination appalling to see but nevertheless despite it all the enemy had soon captured this position as we will soon se . Few words were spoken but the looks of determination in every ones eyes told plainer than words that they would fight to thelast man.

On every side men were falling n in the cavarly forces and noe several of th their lines had given wayand at another point a whole division of Bobs cavarly had been annihilated. One of the greay great columns of Clandelinian cavarly forces came charging upon a large division commanded by Bob himself crushing the whole line to fragments by the fury of the impact, huge multitudes of the Angelinians having fallen dead and wounded, Bot was severely wounded but as long as the cavarly divisions under Jack stood its ground it seemed as if things would go all right bjt the center of his force was crushed to pieces and the rest l of the line pressed back by the charge of the enmy and soon Jacks whole line was demolished and crushed to pieces Jack Evans and general Dane narrowly escaping from being taken prisoner.

All his while ominious clouds of white smokehad arose from long likes of hills showing that the enemys batteries were also in action and the horrible destruction caused by the thousands of plowing shells aided to the irresistible advance of the enemy and thousands of thunderous volcanic eruptions like explosions of the great mines and high explosives and other fiero fiery outburst of some greater and more eart hrending explosion.

During the battle a terrible calamity had resulted. One million five hundred thousan men un der Cannon on the north side of moublins creek and a part of Bobs forces were attacked on all sides, and Cannons line of Free Masons coving on were hidden ina sheeted pall of smoke smoke the conflict ra ing with increasing fury dead and wounded covering the ground on al sides.

Improvarished ambulances by the thousands were hurrying tward the lines with their wounded and dying Three lines of christians two miles long collasped under the awful fire from the emy and hundreds of the orderlies were working frantically an to rescue t rescue the unfort unate wounded before the victorous enen enemy should reach them. Thousands brusised and maime maimed or crushed beyond recognition by hurtling shells were rescued and then the heart sicj sickenned orderlies were compelled to give way before the advancing Clandelinians forced to leave the rest behind.

600,000 christians were already ca t captured christians prisoners and on the the right wing of Bobs cavarly forces t the losses of prisoners were terrible numbering 1,111,188., 11,200 of which were officers.

Along the center of his divisions the scene scenne was terrible. Horses without numbers lay mangled and crushed by shell bursting in their in midst and from everywhere along the line corpses were being extri extri extextri an d hurried off in hastily im provi ed wagons dead wagons. The seried lines of the advancing enemy were now gradually growing into one and steadily advancing tward the christ ian cavarly divisions. One ly one the christian columns were literally swept out of existance tutthe main cavarly divisions would not give way. The main line of battalions and infantry were steadily sweeping onward tward his left and right wings, then another detatchment of Clandelinian dragoons under Hategood rapidly advanced to meet and support the others, while a Clandelinian cavarly came on t n dash from the southwest opening fire upon the Angelinians with the most deadly effect and sweeping down myriads of brave christians with well aimed volleys.

Indeed the Angelinian cavarly men were exhu exhausted and it was seen that it was their only salvation to retire for there was no means whatever of checking the Curdes. Messengers were hurriedly dispatched to general Vivian for support while the bloodcurdling yells and redoubled crash of firing warned the awful nearness of the enemy and the threatening of an awful calmity. Then the Angelinian cavery v men , in endless streams pused pushed on steadily tward other piplains where Donalds veterans were in action carrying what they could of their ammunition and arms. The burdens carried told of the rapidity of the advance of the enemy close behind and the haste with which they had been forced to retire. But most of them kept on firing at every step in their recollment. Human nature could not stand the strain and excitement as they Angelinians could and did in this frightful and one of the bloodiest cavarly en engagements in the war. Roads were swarming with Angelinian horsemen who exhausted in their desperate fight fell back slowly jkeep ing watch that the enemy would not fall upon their flanks unexpectedly.

Bei Being rapidly supported by heavy numbers they now made another stand on the wooded edge of a large grassy meadow or series of meadows.

By the booming of thousands of cannon, the earsplitting crash of exploding mines the ratle of millions of musketry and the incessant detonations of shrapnell shells exploding by thousands, Bob knew that the struggle was still raging along general vivians main line. All the Angelinian cavarly men kn ew that, that very day if the enemy was to be checked at all it must be here on the very meadows, though they hated to make slaughter here as the pl meadows looked so much like a large green grw grassy plains of paradise in Heaven.

But the courageous Angelinians agai n threw themselves forward and the struggle was renewed in deadly earnest betwe between the Cavarly and Clandelinian cavarly and dragoons and even with their infantry but of no v avail whatever for the christians.

Time and again be enemy had crossed in frightful numbers only to be hurled back by the christians defending the dre of the woods with crushing losses. But at another point the enemy had succeeded and advanced with irrest ible force making heir lines fairly blaze with the discharge of their musketry. The Angelinians still held their ground but as men without hope. The enemy had crossed and their desperate efforts had been in vain. The Clandelinians only swept on defying the christians to check them and cut monsterous gaps in the lines of christian infantry and cavarly men and fight ing desperately hand to hand driving them back. Then yelling like demons crept to the northwardon the two extremities of Donalds lines and Mc-Canns forces like two huge arms blazing with storms of fire and smoke and ter ible was the struggle the scene becoming like a forest fire. The Angelinians go fought as desperately as their strength would permit, and more fearful was the loss on both sides.

Two thirds of Donalds and Mc-Canns forces had ben swept out of existance and for many miles all along the lines could be seen awful fighting and frightfully torn lines of each army. Indeed Donalds and Mc-Canns armies were caught between two fires and it was only by dint of the most heroic efforts that they managed to hurl the savage flankers from them, the slaughterybeing frightful and the roaring f of firearms and cannons was fearful so fearfu/ fearful that it seemed to defy God himself, and the sight of the fields of dead and wounded lying thicker than the grain on the grianfields, and the an agony of the suffering on the faces of the wounded was enough to thril and touch and horrify any heart if possiblely softened enough. Thecatastrophie was awful and the tremendous cannonading roar of artillery mingled with the earsplitting crashes and thunder of thousands of bursting shells and exploding mines. The Clandelinians were still assaulting the veterans furiously but Bobs cavarly divisions who had reformed their broken lines were now a now retiring the enemy gaining headway. The battle battle raged with the utmost steadiness the enemy now striving to force their way through the linesof christians untill in desperation Donald determined to have his own parrks parks of artillery shell the enemys lines to check their impetious advance.

Zoe Du Bae Bech of Baldwins command recieved his order and soon all his artic illery not cannonading against the other assailants were massed upon Bobs assailants., and rained a storm of shot shell and canister, the awful c havoc causing a part of the enemys lines to ha hesitate and then to give way in some confusion. Then Donald Hanson pressed forward with a, all his divisions soon causing the whole of the assailing line to fall back steadily. Along other parts of the line during the day one great charge had followed followed anotherand the heavy explosion s of hun dreds of thousands of shells, and the quickly placed mines resound in all directions.

The fi ghting at these points was more desperate still and the roar of musketry and the tremendous discharge of artillery more terri ter ific.

The enemy at thexe these point was making awful progress advancing for furiously through a battle torn wood and the christians fairly falling away at them. They struck Maurice Costellioes v cavarly on both sides cut it to pieces and drove it into confusion, and advanced onward through a canister swept orchard, with a dashing charge, the sky from theactive batteries being white with te the pall of smoke smke smoke and the thunder of greater guns broke out to add to the din.

Not only did the conflict raged with unabated fury but increased furiously along the left and right wings of Windernines forces . John Evans had been in this conflict and had sen several great Clandelinians rushing forward with an intention to kill little Angeline and Jennie who were flag signalling to the boy boyscouts. John struck out right and left suending four of the Clandelinians sprawling and grasped a strong officer by the wirst in a vise like gr grip and swung him around letting go of his wrist a nin ,and causing him t to collide with another onrushing Clandelinian and sending them both floundering in into a brook close by. Then he and the little girls who had mounted as at seeing their danger started ther horses forward upsetting thre or four Clandelinian foot soldiers trampling over them and going on at a gallop Evans commanding the men to charge.

"Charge, charge."He cried;K "Kep close together."

"With a bold dash I guess we could scatter their first lines."Said on e of his aids.

These Angelinians quickly started their horses at a gallop and went fairly thundering over the ground delivering a continous withering fire which dealt awful havoc among the enemys lines. The charge had its effect just as John Evans had supposed.

And as the Angelinians drew near keeping up a continous fire at thefirst lin e of graycoats apalled over the slaughter suddenly broke and ran in many directions.

Many fell dead in the cre, thou ands more t umbled over a fence, and scores of thousands of others roo,ed over on the ground and lay there wounded and ye liyelling for revenge. As the Angelinians still dashed on the rest of the Clandelinian infantry and battalions with fixed bayonets spread out in solid lines butthe christians urged their steds at an increased speedfairly hammering away with their carbines. But they could not force that terrible human barrier without sufficient numbers and they themselves formed lés and started an incessant fire which soon seemed to make a sea of smoke. The struggle between the other forces was also raging in deadly earnest and hundreds of thousands of men on both sides plunged at each other with sabre thrusts, bayonets and pikes with awful fury. The Glandelinians had attacked the christian veterans under Roswell Buster Johnston furiously and there was now great confusion until other forties came rushing up to support them while the veterans rallied against the plucky Glandelinians. Seventeen hundred cannon at this point were pouring shot and shell by the thousand along general vivians right wing where the fighting was the fiercest and where Violet and the rest of her sisters were doing great work in the signalling to the officers telling of them of the dangers, of what to do against this part of the attacking columns as and so on. A whole lde of four million cavarly men followed by heavy columns of brigades and infantry charged forward in a thunderous avalanch of men general Richardson Hl Halsted being determined to sweep the enemy before him at one charge if he could. Onward pressed this monsterous surge of Angelinians the enemy opening a withering fire with all their gathling guns tearing large gaps in the advancing line and mangling the whole infantry column in a terrible manner.

The noise of the battle followed all the child captives in another line line of long and high stockade works called Poverty Row and they watched the approaching christian columns from their cell windows in terror. Nearer and nearer drew the christians whol while mimonsterous in lines of the enemy in front of Poverty now stormed withfire sweeping the christians down in mulitudes.

While the Glandelinians were increasing their fire with cannonas of all siz sizes their artillery forces came up and dragged forward the heaviest artillery and ploughed the onrushing lines of christians through and and through with a storm of shot and shell. The christians suffered terribly from the sheavy losses but they thought more of vectory and of the helpless children than of themselves and forgot all about their own safty and were completely reckless.

On and over the fields they rushed despite the deadly and shattering fire. On and on they pressed and drew closer to the works. Then divisions of mounted Glandelinian cavarly dashed upon the Angelinians like an avalanch delivering murderous volleys and another desperate hand to hand fight raged. The enemys divisions were hurled back however and the christians with threatening shouts pressed on. The christian lines were continually plowed with cruel fury with shot and shell from the enemy artillery and one of their lines gave way before the shock.

But this line soon closed its shattered columns and marched forward again with the rest and fought like tingers tigers for blow to blow.

The Angelinian batalion s were now now advancing on the right of the foe from a glen while all the skirmisher forces were thrown out at the center. Then up to the stone walls close so to several farm houses dashed seventy Angelinian artillery batteries, each of a hundred guns, the gunners planting the cannons behind the stonewalls to blaze away at the enemy from there. The full batery of Glandelinian numartillery numbering about ten thousand cannon was now in full action on the Angelinian Angelinian batalions causing fearful destruction, tearing their very main line into many fragments. General Vivians artillery also opened on the Glandelinians with ten thousand one hundred seventy five guns, the Angelinian infantry dashing into the farm gound grounds to open a galling fire on the onu onrushing enemy, and the Angelinian skirmishers pushed above the points just gained threatening to assail the enemys guns on the brows of the ridges. On the right as if moving straight to the point bridge in front of seventy Row marched the Angelinian battalions under a destructive fire which threw down all the columns it struck and mangled and tore to pieces whole brigades.

The whole batle was now in general fury.

A merciless storm of shot shell and canister ploughed their advancing lines to fragments, and destroyed mulitudes of lives time and again, but on they marched with slow and steady strides, closing up the gaps every time they appeared. On up the sides of the ridges marched the christian columns furing at the retiring Glandelinian infantry as they advanced and recieving a fearful fire in reply.

Then down the hieghts as if impatient of the strife at long range, rushed one million Glandelinian veterans wit with fixed bayonets. The christian generals perceived the onward dash of the Glandelinians and the little girls also seeing it from their points of observation signalled to Baldwin to train his guns or have his gunners pour shot and shell into the vain glorious veterans in gray.

Then the artillery under Baldwin thundered continously and fearful was the havoc made among the velveteran s charging down.

Then up against them rushed the impetious cavarly divisions shouting their wild soul thrilling cry and on into the shattered line of graycoats they burst firing a murderous storm of volleys and to deal death and and ghastly wounds with their sabres and lances at every stride. The Glandelinian veterans after fightinf furiously and with no success broke and fled the men throwing away their firearms firearms in their fearful panic as they flocked back to the brow of the ridge. Then with terrific fury tward PovertyRow the cavvy dashed rushing through thw wolid gray lines in their head long charge pouring a galling fire and throwing horse and soldiers into awful confusion. As the cavarly fofc forces moved on in their irresistible attack a other great divisions of the enemy was assailed and made such a furious resistance that the advancing christians nearly swept them outof existance after a terrific sturggle hand to hand. General Hategood with over five hundred thousand of his well mounted and dashing Glandelinian cavarly and dragoons were steadily quietly to the side of the glen while the battle was going going on. The the gallant Glandelinian officer had noticed what appeared to be a very small squ squad of Angelinian infantry in that a most smoke bound glen and the idea came at once to the Glandelinian general that they were only a small body of general Vivians horsemen under probably the vivian girls out scouting and that they were numbered only little less than five thousand. General Hategood then made up his mind to strike them a terrible blow. So the young officer pushed along the brow of the hill passing the Glandelinian voters on before they had dashed down to meet defeat in its bloodiest form. During the whole excitement of the whole insedious batle Violet and Jack Evans kept their eyes on that prowling troop of Glandelinians, in fact had their eyes on every point of the battlefield, for fearful as it was she had a strange fangination of the whole thing and like to watche watch it as such as any one would like to watch a magnificent show going on.

As the Angelinians still moved on to the attack Violet ordered as some of the boyscouts to retire while general Thomas Evans being attracted by Violets frenzied signalling soon learned the cause and retreated with his great force of cavarly men to ambush Hategood and his Glandelinians as he attacke the five thousand, may three million men not under Jennie or Angeline but under his very self.

General Hategood not knowing of his great danger nevertheless suspected something unusual and so moved his his troops with great caution hoping to fall upon the us unsuspecting little troop like an avalanch and wt without warning and to bt ucher them all with out mercy and cut the little girls in little pieces.

Violet was delighted by the flight of the Glandelinian veterans which she had wt witnessed from her point of observation, but she knew that the struggle would not be won by either side as yet.

She cloud see that the Glandelinians were holding their ground stubbornly and that their ten thousand cannon were still hailing away on the Angelinian batalions and on the Angelinians who held the farm houses and farm fields. Violet and Evans then directed their attention to the troop of approaching Glandelinin again and they could see really now more than a million Glandelinian horsemen moving down slowly and cautiously at the side of the hill hill.

"They are going to make a swift dash upon general Evans." Thought Violet to herself; "He Their leader no doubt thinks they are five to one of the force to in the glen but soon they will find out their mistake."

As Evans wanted to join the fight Violet decided to go down there to see how it turned out not to join in the fighting as she abhorred such an idea but just to see it all the better. General Evans in the meantime had ordered themen to look well to their carbines and pistols and to be ready for the charge when he gave the order.

In the meantime the Angelinians who had gotten the farm house were doing golen excellant work and they also were gradually moving up the hill under the full cover of Baldwins artillery and their own at the stone walls. The intreped Angelni Angelinian batalions were still moving to the objective point as if steadily as if on pr parade being well supported by the artillery on either flank. Violet Vivian cast one glance at atn at the moving columns and she muttered as a high explosive thundered several hundred yards in front of her;

"By all that is wonderful, but we will gain the day if these gallent fellows reach the top of those hills above, as the Angelinians are fearful in their dashing charge. But gracious goodness I almost forgot myself. The Glandelinians who are to attack the sup osed force under my two sut sisters are dashing right tward this point instead and no Angelinian force here to repell the,.

The Glandelinians however were not really hading tward her headquarters signal stations for if they were they had no enah chance of doing so for the Angelinian cavarly force were in their way the Glandelinians coming tward them in full swing their younf young general lung flu flourishing his sabre as if he had gone mad. A large open field divisi divided the Glandelinians from the troopers of christians when Evans and his cavarly suddenly dashed at them pouring in a terrific storm of fire.

The young Glandelinian general was as brave a man as ever fought in a war and he at once dashed forward to meet general Evans. The two generals were the first to close in the shock but surprisingly to say was ring purple, and now their horses drew up as they exchanged powerful and slashing blows. On by the struggling leaders burst the christians to cut their wat way through the shatered Glandelinian columns and to charge back again with redoubled fury amid a hellish tumult of sabres carbine cartines pistols and lanche and yelling of fury. General Hategood struck at Evans as if his souls salvation depended on the death of the christian general while both cavarly forces were engaging on one of the worse hand to hand fights of the entire battle.

General Hategood struck at Evans with greater force than before only to find that his young enemy met and parried every effort with the ease of a veteran swordsman and soon sent the young generals satre flying through their.

"Surrender." Cried general Evans as he raised his weapon; "You are my prisoner."

Before general Hategood could reply the Angelinians so diere charged back with such fury that they forced many of the shattered Glandelinian columns to retreat. Between the furious Angelinians under Evans, and theformer were dashing over a low stone wall, whil when another christian cavalry force opened upon them, this at theame instant two discharges of Angelinian artillery went plowing through the Glandelinian horsemen and they were thrown int a confused mass.

Then before general Hategood could rally his men the Angelinians dashed at them with their lance and swordand Hategood seing it in vain to rally and reform his shattered division called on be to help thelaughter of his own troops

"RETREAT, RETREAT, AND DASH UP THIS WAY WITH ME."

About three hundred thousand of the Glandelinians dashed out of the frightful melee in twenty minuten to dash after their young general who was facing tward the mountian the rest beeing cut down or taken prisoners.

"Pursue them." Yelled Evans as many of the Glandelinians close by fell on their knees,hands uprised as if in prayer andand pleading for quarter.

These were also seized and made prisoners, and then Hategood with the three hundred thousand Glandelinians were pursued.

"Hold, hold." Cried an orderly on horseback who had just galloped into the field up to Violet Jennie and Angeline who had just come to the scene when the rout occured; "I General Vivian orders me to ask you general Evans to charge a strong stone wall in the rear of Poverty now and take the one thousand Glandelinian cannon planted there. Our gallant forces have taken the heights, and the Glandelinians driven from it are retreating with great confusion and panic stricken tward Poverty Row."

"Oh heaven be prisoned." Cried Violet.

"Hurrah boys hurrah, and dash with me to the stone wall in the rear of Povert now and carry it." Cried general Evans; "The Angelinians will strike a telling blow for Christ now. Hurrah for the boys. Long live Christ our King." And loud and piercing was the cry and yell of pride to and end of triumph sent up by the Angelinian cavarly sweeping the dashed away after their brave general while down on the panic stricken Glandelinians rushed theothe christian divisions.

The Angelinian battalion backed by the christian artillery assailed the Glandelinian dragoons on the brow of a hill where they had made a stand while the other forces under Pompeonia made a dash for the enemys batteries.

The Angelinians cavarly men were then pressing on the Glandelinian left sending forth thrilling shouts of triumph triumph and pouring a furious fire into the confused multitudes causing a fearful panic. Though outnumbering the assailants the Glandelinians could not withstand that combined and brilliant onslaught and they broke and fled fled tward Poverty Row in an utter and shameful route. Close on after the routed Glandelinians having seized all the cannon on the brow of the hill, passed the light infantry with irrest ible force and fury and yelling like demons while the sturdy Intsilons kept up a galling fire on the beaten and demorilized Glandelinians. Theterror an t stricken Glandelinians yelling and cursing crowded over the shell swept fields tward Poverty Row multitudes fleeing across creeks and plains, and the Glandelinians kept on their flight jamming all the stone trid es they could cross at one time. The Glandelinians threw down their arms in their mad panic tward Poverty Row and many of them surrendered to the brave and dashing Angelinians without striking another blow or firing a single shot.

The Angelinian cavarly forces under the ger generalship of Evans followed by all of Violet and her sisters who acted as color bearers, dashed on through friend and foe the Angelinian infantry making way for Evans cavarly forces who were dashing with full gallop to the cannon defending the stone wall and which the infantry lines had crushed themselves ten times without success.

One thousand nity guns were planted at this ten mile wall and many of the Glandelinian infantry men rallied behind the cannont o support the gunners. On tward the wall in full gallop dashed Evans reckless Angelinians who would rather die than let the oil children perish in the stockades and after them pressed the whole eight whole force of Angelinians who were in persi pursuit of the enemy. Evans and his brave cavavy men thundered straight for the wall like a sweeping avalanche avalanch when the one thousand ninty cannon belched forth round shot shell grape and canister, and more than ten th usand Angelinians were sweptdown by the awful discharge, but yet on dashed the others without halting a moment and blazing away with their carbines mowing down thousands of the Glandelinians who were rallying behind the stone wall to support the gunners. The cool Glandelinian gunners were loading the cannons again when the An elinian cavvly men who survived the first discharge dashed at them in full fury yelling like dd demonsand delivering a galling fore sweeping the Glandelinians down like grass cut by a mow-

The brave gunners fought like he bro heroes they were but they were a ll cut down of taken prisoners by the irre irresistible Angelinians who then dashedat the rallying Glandelinians behind the long stone wall the infantry supporting the rushing charge. Another frightful struggled ensued and ragd desperately and the furious Glandelinians would not yel yeild an inch od of ground the u though those still hard pressed had laid,down their arms and sud surrendered,, many thousands flying away to Povert y Row only to bu halthen fat igue over come them.

GLANDELINIANS WIN THE BATTLE BY BLOWING UP THE STOCKADES.

A large division of Glandelinians under general monument Calhoon after setting fire to the stockades, made a desperate stand and a terrific hand to hand struggle raged/ although all the cordes of hand to hand fights had two sanguinary, the christian cavarly divisions assailing the Glandelinians furiously. General Jones divisions came down upon the Glandelinians like a thunderbolt,but the Glandelinian fought more desperately than ever on the veterans assailed the flank of theenemy and the cavvy doing their best to forces an opening in the lin es of cavarly and succeeding tremendously but the main cavarly division were driven back upon the lavenain of the veterans in their flank.

Suddenly there was a roar like a thousand volcanic eruptions going off simultaneously and a big black cloud of smoke ensued from the long line of stockades followed by a series of million cannon like reports. Dead bloody torn open bodies, of children pelted the combatants so thick as rain followed by a tremendous cloudburst of planks, logs and utensils of every description, leaving scores of broken guns, and muskets by the millions fell everywhere in broken fragments. Even the intestines fell like rain and more overything was a scene of the most indescribable horror, a panic seizing the Angelinian columns and they broke back and fled in confusion back tward the woods despite all the attempts of the officers to rally them.

With a defening yell the whole rallying forces of Glandelinians with fixed bayonets crushed down upon the demorilizedand terrors stricken mass of christians finally carrying all before them and charging retreat into tot l rout. This torn shatteredand beaten divisions millions strong as they were beforenow only hundreds of thousands strong, retreatin retreated tward the main line the little girls narrowly escaping capture their clothes being so badly torn that they were parcially naked.

Even sutan with his main armies marched with all possible speed, with Shoemandia and Bicknell combined, and launched themselves in all their violence upn general vivians main lines. General vivian to prevent his army from being crushed to fragments advanced no further, and stood his ground but he was not to win this this battle if any one knows its General Bicknell the flower of the Glandelinian armymarched marched along thetancks banks of the Blanket river and through he encountered an annihilating fire which tore tore down all the woods in its pathswith the sweeping fury of a typhoon Bicknell unevertheless nevertheless carried all before him the whole of general vivians army finally being worse than crushed to fragments and all along the line themain army of the Glandelinians carried all before them, scattering the whole christian army in all directions cap capturing so many prisoners that the christian loosesin prisoners ammounted to seven millions.

At the moment the tremendous rout of the divisions who assaulted the stockades violet and all of her sisters who were with these men narrowly escaped capture. At the moment the rout began the litt le girls heard a loud deafening, characteristic whoop which startled them at once ones and as they drew back they saw a whole multitude of Glandelinians supp sweeping tward them. Partly covered with the fal fallen intestines and blood and half naked, and filled with indescribable horror at the terrible calamity caused by the explosions, the little girls gave a shrill scream for Evans to fell them, as a thousand lives seemed to be concentrated in that one moment to theme Off they sprinted their horses having been killed at the height of the frays The Glandelinians were after the little girls like hounds after deers and in that dizzy moment the feet of the little girls seemed scarcely to tu touch the ground and a moment brought them to a rivers edge where a lot of half turning rafts were floating.

Right on behind came the Glandelinians starting a fus Glade and nerved with strength such as God gives only to the desperate, with one wild cry and flying leap the little girls vaulted sheer over the turbid current by the shore on to the sl smoking rafts beyond. It was a desperate leap, impossible to anyhing but madness and the Glandelinians instinctively cried out in rage and astonishment and discharged a terrific volley as the little girls did itbut the bullets flew wild.

The huge green raft on which they alighted pitched and cracked as their weight came on it but they did not stay a moment. With wild cries and desperate energy they leaped to another, and still another, stub stumbling- leaping- slipping,-s ring springing u upwards again. Their shoes were gones their stockings turned from th their feet, while blood marked every step, but they saw nothing felt nothing, till dinly as if in a dream, they saw the other side, and purple coats helping them up a bank.

"You are brave little girls who ever you are."Said a leader as he roughly but kindly drew Violet and her sisters up the steep bank;"You and your sisters are right brave girls. I like grit whre ever I see it."

When the other little girls had ben drawn up E Evans came with two men and helped the litle girls along, even even embracing them for his admirations. "There is no one who has courage like you dear little girls."He said gravely and as he embraced Jennie;" If you had not made for this river I would probably havefound you afterwards with your bodies torn open. Those men were Zimmerman in Zimmermaninns and meant hideness as I saw it from the glint of their eu eyes. They are certainly horrible men when they are aroused. They are the worst "lande linians in the army of Olandelinia, even worse than the Omarian murdes."

"It's horrible/"it 's horrible."Moaned Violet ;"They have killed all the children in thoseattocks dee and hul'nts have torn my clothes to shreds. I never saw this happen before, and it is the second time that it happened too."

It indeed had ben a terrible battle. All that day it had raged, and also all that day the roar of sixty thousand common and innumerable muskets had ben incessant. The struggle had ben a fearful one and no our readers preserve charge had followed charge in endless succession, . The olandelinians had practially won the wide field even in the afternoon before this rout occured, and though they had finally won a great decisive battle and routed the whole of general vivians army and kept them on the rout for thirty miles all night long also without a single minute to stop and rest, the olandelinians had nevertheless lost heavy their whole army being badly crippled and shattered by their losses.

Sixteen hundred officers on the sideof the army had ben captured ten thousand were killed and wounded, and thousands of battle flags had ben captured.

The olandelinians though victorious as they were lost seventeen baggage trains three million firearms and nine million prisoners and eleven thousand ammunition wagons also while their loss in killed and wounded was overXI,000,642.

The christian divisions under general _vting had lost IIC,000, Jennings had lost 200,000,, Jobs I85,000 , and another general 250,000.

General Benligan had lost combined with generals Mc-Gan- Mc-Gantler,and nenlad 500,000 and general Grant Henrt185,222 in killed and wounded and 28,000 in prisoners. General Bure-natlie had lost 2XI,000 and Love Friens and Love Child 312,222.

Ninderine had lost 361,000 in killed and 1 500,000 in wounded, Baldwin lost 400,000 in killed and wei wounded and general Evans I00,000. Twoother generals lost 350,000 in wounded and 200,000in killed. General Bot lost _ 600,000 in wounded and I70,000 in killed and the rest3,600,000.

The total loss if willed can be figured as eight million, one hundred and sixty four thousand four hundred fourty four.(8I (8,I64,444) in killed and wounded alone. 7,000,000 had been made prisoners laving l leaving a final total of fifteen million one hundred sixty four thousand, four hundred and fourty. 15 (I5,I64,449.

Twenty four hours later after the terrible rout when the christian army could be gathered again work was begun in attending to the dead wounded and dying and prisoners. Some heavy firing was still hel heard incessantly but otherwise all was still except the groaning of the wounded and the moans of the dying that the victorious enemy did not stop to think of aiding saying that it was better to let the Foolish Foolish Christian Gods in purple to rot among their own dead and go to their old geducer in heaven if they are so crazy about him.

Simultaneously while this terrible battle had ben fought there had ben furious action betwen the christian divisions under Beppo and the olandelinians under olandelinia, and the christians had also lost I20,000 but Beppo had ben a part of Ninderines armt army. The enemy had lost one hundred fifty thousand.

And startling to say all these generals who had lostso heavily in killed wounded and prisoners had fall en fallen wounded, but none of them severely.

Before they left for Marcocino the Boy and girlscouts learned of these battles had had raged during their stay at Santa Fe and these were the ones listed. They were Prunlah, the battle of Hickey Bay, the attempt to capture Island No.Twenty Five, another battle of Mm Marcocino resulting in a disasterous christian defeat, an undecided action at Marcocellio,, and frightful carnage recently on Augustthe twenty eight at Cabbibletown and another disasterous battle at Marcocinio for three days duration, and a desperate desperate plan on the part of some rulers to capture the Boyking. and P lenglglcronean Islands from the enemy. And to top this all was the results of the frightful battle of Marischanio which though they did not witness, they heard a good deal of, and by which ending they arived, forced to be ten days late according to the time violet,and her sisters wished them to arive. And Gertrude Angeline and Mildred Manning still laid up with their wounds and left behind in the hospital at Santa Fe Works. A miserable out come indeed, and which agrieved Susan Farrol very badly as the progressive portion of this chapter will show.

"Oh genera l Evans isn't isn't the situation something awful---this last battle at Marischinio the worst disaster to our side you ever heard of?"

Jennie Vivian, closed her big military geography as she spoke, and spoke bitterly and turned her saddened and discouraged face tward her famous guardian and greatest friend."

"It's a "Beautiful"disaster" General Evans agreed sarcastically"nd And there is something at the bottom of it all. The enemy in resisting this seige of Vivian Wickey is invincible, and has turned the tables on our generals at this spot most disasterously for us.But I'm afraid you must be tired, even if your sisters who remained out wide side are not, you've been telling me a good deal about these battles you know, and I know the results myself having taken a good part in them."

"I'm not a big tired"said Jennie leaning back in the big easy chair, with a little sigh of utter discontent."I never get tired doing anything for the sake of our Countrys cause---I'm so glad you like to lead your armies so strongly and fiercely against the foe--you really do like it don't you Evans dear.?"

"For many good reasons, better for most things in the world I fancy, but you or your sisters mustn't let me be a selfish young general, and keep the news of the victories I can win all the time, even if other generals don't seem to succeed."

"You selfish." laughed Jennie."The very idea of such a thing.As if you were not the dearest, kindest general in the whole world to us and all our best anddearest child scouts."""QQAZ

"There,there that will do."interrupted the general.ll looking immensely pleased nevertheless."ou musn't flatter the great general so much or you'll be turning his head and make him think he's the emperor himself. where's the little girl who ran away from me once in fright, susan Farrol this evening. I haven't seen her since the battle ended."

"Gone out scouting with Scjofield Penrod who wishes to see if he can discover whether the enemy intends to renew the attack or not.He Angeline Riches and Jane Melfert came after her right after supper---I' Guess she'll be back sobnnow..."""

"Seems to me Penrod comes very often to take her out on scouting tours tours----do esn't it strike you in that light..!!!!"

"Oh he's so kind to Susan now, and she likes him and the boy and girlscouts so very much. He's taking ever so much about her training she's coming out with it pretty good now, you know, and I suppose he always likes to talk to her often about Gertrude Angeline and Mildred Manning who have been left so far behind. The doctor I questioned told me it'll be two weeks or more before they'll be on their feet again, and Gertrude though will be sooner.Mildred was more badly wounded. There was lots of evidence against her assista assassins not only for that cowardly act of shooting her through the window behind her back, but also as spies.They stole that strange key you gave her to find out those mysteries, and fifteen important letters belonging to her were found in the possession of ons of the men, and your photograph also.Only that they were not successful spies saved their lives.but they're in life term nevertheless."

General Evans looked a little worried, but he said nothing, and there was a short silence, while Jennie stroked the big book in her lap, with loving fingers.Jennie was still a little paler and thinner than in the old days, but the bright color was fast coming back into her cheeks, and the old elasticity.It was the First of Nobember now, and the whole month of October had passed since that strange anxious night, when Gertrude had recieved her wound during her exploits at the Santa Fe battle, when even now though so far away was still raging as fierce as ever according to reports..It was only this very morning that violet,and her sisters had told Angeline Richee, their best girlscout friend next to Angelinia Aronburg that she believed that this month of October past had been the very busiest and most disasterous too of their lives. nd Angeline Richee had comforted them, and kissed them, with a very bright color in her cheeks, and a light light in her eyes that the Vivian girls saw and slightly understood..

"What are you thinking of Jennie?"General Evans asked, breaking the pause in the old abrupt way.....?"

Jennie sadly smiled.

"I was thinking how beautiful the world would be if this war had never occured....."

A black shdow crosed the generals face, and he laid his hand tenderly on the little golden head....2.2.2. 2.2.222

"Do yotutabutyou o

"Do you often wish you had remained home and your sisters too, and never came here to do your spying work, and direct the christian armies, in person Jennie???.."

"No"said Jennie with decided alacrity."I hardly ever think about it now.I used to think myself foolish and reckless for doing it sometimes, and so did my sisters.Even our aids General Hendro Dargar always came to us trying to warn us to give up our work and let the generals do it, but we wouldn't give in.Sometimes I and my sisters regret it even now, because I thought that we were making amistake, and that it was not our place to be in the army, but our father now drives us to it at his own will and to quit now would be disobey thhim. I used sometimes to wish it, because I thought if I could be home,I and my sisters might be able to help our country so much more."

"And why shouldn't you wish to return home and direct your armies from there even now.wouldn't it be much safer.I'm afraid the enemy will really get you some day.You can play on like this forever and and be safe."?

"Oh because I know that the enemy will have the world under his wicked power, and we must do our bit even if it does cost us our freedom or liven.If we are captured and yet not killed, and our side wins the war we'd be freed anyhow if the enemy wants any quarter."

"Youare easily the bravest children ever known."General Evans said supressing a sigh."Yet you're never jealious, and your sisters either, because all boy and girlscouts have made themselves more dangerous to the enemy than your sisters are.It's your Abbieannian blood through and through.You're never bad and jealious and never sin think Heavenm but if we're so goodwhy should the enemy win battles all the time.Maybe it's because God wishes to test our valor before the time of the foes real defeat comes.But I wish there were every child in the whole of Abbieannia with the disposition and bravery you and your sisters have--it would make the enemy much more afraid of us Abbieannians believe me."

Jennie took Evans's hand and laid her check against it.

"I don't think you quite ought to say that Evans Dear."she said slowly."I don't think I really have good a good dded disposition at all, but my sisters has(She's got a better disposition than she thinks) I'm afraid I us used to be pretty horrid sometyimes."

General Evans laughed.

"Pretty horrid were you!I never remember seeing you that way yet."

"But I was, and am sometimes yet....."

"Upon what occasions then, if I may ask you...???.."

"It was when we used to see the child slavery before the war started." said Jennie gravely,"And I and my sisters disguising as the unfortunates and working with them used to come into their cells with them so tired especially after a hard days work, and then didn't get a moment of sleep because the masters wouldn't let them and us. Then I used to remember way long after the war progressed so far how different it all was before everything changed so terribly, and how the poor country of Calverinia was before Abbieann and many cities were swept away with such dreadful loss of lofe, and how people used to tell me and my sisters Abbieann city was so holy, so glorious, and such a pretty sight, how lovely especially the children of that city were, and so good, and as friendly as a person could be.Foriegners used to say Abbieann was to them like going to Heaven.It didn't seem fair that such a disaster should have to occur, and though there's no evidence, and scientists are forced against their will to believe and predict it was a "Natural "disaster" I and my sisters, and all the child scouts and our specia l boyscout friend Walter Starring, and I know you too still believe Landelinia is guilty of it all.Therefore I desired to get even if evidence could be proved. Yes I'm afraid I did have very horrid thoughts sometimes."

Evans was silent for a moment, and his face was as black as a thundercloud, but then he suddenly changed.

"And how about yourself?"he inquired, with a forced smile."did you never think it unfair that you and your sisters would have to go through all you did in the past, and which you may yet do in the future.?"

"Oh I and my sisters are all right."said Jennie innocently"We always have everything we need, and we never had to go through what we really did did not dare to do.We don't worry about ourselves ourselves.We worry what we don't succeed in finding out the mystery of those Craters. But we never will give up.We're going back there again probably next week."

General Evans said nothing,,but he put an arm al around the beautiful little figure and drew her very close..... There was a moments happy silence, and then Jennie lifted lifted her head from the general's shoulder,, with a little start..

"There's the door bell"he exclaimed."I guess it's susan---my sister Violet, told m she would send her over this afternoo n to keep me company, she's such a funny yet good little foriegn girl, and her ways keeps the blues away."

"All right, run along and meet her, but give me a kiss first, and leave your book(the gook) down here.Perhaps by and by you may feel like explaining some more plans for me."

"Yes indeed, I shall feel like it,,"said Jennie looking much pleased at the suggestion,"and I and my sisters have learned a new song to sing sing for you this evening before we retire for the night."

And bestowing upon the general a very hearty embrace,ghthe little Vivian girl Princess tripped away, humming a verse of one of the simple oldballads her own father and Evans loved so well, as she went..

In the front hall, she encountered Susan, and her sister Joice with two girlscouts Gladys Wenthworth Jennington and Sarah Heidi.

"I'm so glad you've come"said Jennie,kissing the four little golls affectionately."Susan I want to show you the new plans that Evans men captured from the enemy, and which we believe caused our loss of this battle just past if it has passed. The letters of that plan too are all raised, and I don't understand it, and neither does my sisters, nor the most experts I have.even Angeline Riches this time is puzzled. They tell me you understand such things.Won't you come upstairs too Joice(to her sister)"

"No thank you Jennie dear;;I'm afraid I can't spare the time this evening, as my sisters want us to do some work, but I shall be back for Susan qt about supper time, and then we'll all go out scouting. Now run an"she added jokingly"Mind you don't get scared of my sister and run away while I,m gone/"

"We'll both promise not to runaway from the army, won't we susan." Jennie said slipping an aro arm around her tttt friends waist"So don't worry worry one bit about us sis.General Evans is now up stairs with his officers trying to learn why we're licked in this battle, and Violet and Catherine will be at home in a little while.Then I can send for you and the others and we'll all go out scouting, and take the whole band of Penrods boy and girlscouts with us and have a good old thrilling time. If anything happens we'll then show the enemy we can try to be as dangerous as the child scouts."

Joice made no more joking remarks, but salutingbtook her leave at once, and the two little girls went upstairs together into the rom room occupied by violet,and her sisters in the generals headquarters. The only early November sunshine was pouring inat the windows onthe west end just before setting, lighting up every object with almost a golden light, from a canary in his cage, to the row of strane big books on the shelves which ran around the whole room.given the carpet and wall paper was magnificent in color and designs, and a brighter prettier room it would have been difficult to find.who ever owned the place certainly was artistid in his taste.Violet,and her sisters had ola imed over and over again that they felt just like at home living even though temporarily in such magnificent quarters.

"Aren't those Glandelinians horrid to have won this battle,and all the others."said Susan tossing her hat on the bed in the manner that even the Vivian girls would scarcely have approved of, though it was on her habit of always hanging things up."Every body is saying disagreeable things about those. "Mutt and Jeff"spies and believe they're the cause of it.Even paps notices it, and he even told one of the girlscout leaders, whose name I don't know, quite crossly the other day, that he thought she and her followers could capture them if she only tried hard enough."

"The situation isn't always very pleasant, and we can't expect to win every battle in the war."Jennie admitted,"But nevertheless I suppose many of our generals can't help it, and if it is the cause of those spies--it's only just natural that they can't be captured."

"Well I wish they were captured"said Susan crossly"For they're more dangerous to us than thegirl and boy scouts are to the enemy, and when they always cause your good christian armies to suffer such disasters in quick simultaneous sucession like these simultaneous battles I heard of it makes me always bad, and I don't want to be bad."

Jennie thought to herself"he's not one third as bad as she belies herself to be.she just thinks so,Then aloud" "Perhaps if you just could tell Our Blessed Lord that you really want to be good, things might turn out different.Why don't you try it anyway."!"???..,

"I'm afraid it wouldn't be of any use"said Susan mournfully."I guess those two Glandelinian spies were just born horrid.They don't like any christian children.Just because the Christians like good people, like you your sisters, the Abbieannian people, and all the others he re ."

Jennie flushed and laughed a little...

"I don't knowanything about everybody in the army.We all Abbieannians may be really good, but I,m not sure these says who's really an Abbie annian in our midst and who is not.But Susan, I do think all of these boy and girlscouts in the various regiments have learned to love you now,my Governess, Hannah says, your leader told Gertrude Angeline in the the hospital how your friends in Penrods army were dreadfully frightened about you the day you got lost in some wilderness and was persued for thirty miles by Glandelinians.put you sure knew how to take care of yourself, and I suppose the survivors amongst the enemy who persued you all the way fro, Wickey Lansinia, to Kabbible town know that by this time."

It was Susans turn to blush now.she did not like to have the events of any such day mentioned by any one, even Jennie, or her sisters, for despite her vay, and being quite proud, yet she didn't like to be praised either. And too no one knew how she hated the Glandelinians since Mildred was so cowardly shot at, and still lying wounded in the base hospital at ganta Fe. And she missed her terribly and kept begging God to make her quickly recover,and Gertrude too, who she had never seen and wished to know and love also.She too was an honest truthful little girl, far more good than she thought herself to be despite her slightly wilful nature,, and it was to her idea not fair to be unjust to any girl or boyscout.

"Many of them did cry, whon paper found me and did bring me home that night."she said."And when I told them my experience, they thought I was mad and couldn't believe it untill later bulletins were captured stating the immense rward reward offered for me dead or alive, stating I was a killer, a dangerous little christian devil and so forth.But I didn't do it for any praise, and I don't think any one should have mentioned it every single day since, even though this is the second time I shot down so many Glandelinians.I spied on them during the action at ganta Fe behind some rock, when General Evans was attacked, and saw the whole action, before a patrol of Gargoylan Kurds divcovered me.I was a fugitive ever since then till I reached Kabbibletown and saw the battle there. Everybody now keeps talking about it all the time, and it does make me very uncomfortable.Oh Jennie if Mildred would soon be back well and happy, and your friend Angelinia Afonburg too,I know I should be good.But oh I can't help hating the enemy.They're ~~~~~~~~~~t Such cowards to shoot little girls in the back through open windows."

Jennie's face brightened.It was always a great pleasure to her to hear any of her girl and boyscouts praised.

"But they don't seem to get better,"Susan went on in an aggrieved and angry tone"and they're still staying in that horrid base hospital. Oh dear how I do hate it all.Why didn't that Miss Catherine lee. have her would be assiens assassins shot anyhow whether Mildred died or not.I would have.I don't see why all wicked people have so many nice things happen to them, and all you good people have all the horrid ones."

"We girl and boy scouts, and ul Princesses have got lots of nice things."said Jennie soothingly"Justthink of all our good thrilling experiences, how as often as I and my sisters were captured by the enemy, we did things that made them sorry were ev wec were ever within their lines, and I susan we'll all get used to other things by and by.I and my sisters have a good governess too you know, but she's been hurt recently during the time we were at the battle of Marcncino and she's not recovered yet.Emperor Vivian at our request had written to the superintendent of the girlscouts to bring you a good guardian who will train you."

"Thrilling experiences aren't everything when your friends get shot by cowardly sneaks behind their backs, which I believe never happened to you and your sisters."said Susan ignoring the latter part of her friends speech."but though that didn't happen to you or your sisters, you yourselves instead of having had ever so many more nice things than others have had gone through lots.I've heard a whole lot about you in particular.There, you are the most loveliest of all little girls I girls I have ever seen, Evans says you're the most beautiful and good little girl in the world, but didn't I hear that the rat Augustinia St Claire kicked you in the side and mouth, when he had struck you down in the med and while you lay there..There's your great guardian general Evans,he's had lots of bad luck too, though I did once used to be afraid of him, but that was because he mistook me and my friends for Glandelinians, and I know even now how terrible he is to them, for I can see it, and he never really scolds you, and lets you and your sisters do everything you want to."

"Oh no he doesn't"said Jennie laughing."When we any got any military work of great necissity to do, he makes me and my sisters go to bed every evening just when we want to read or play, and th he's so dreadfully dreadfully afraid of our getting into too much trouble with the enemy and has us shadowed secretlywhwever we go.Gertrude Angeline once said, he worries a great deal more about My sisters and me than there's any necessity for,but we wouldn't tell him so, fo we love him so very much..nd though we don't want to tell him so just yet he's sort of related to us you know, being our Unkle.."

"I wish Mildred and Gertrude were well though"said Susan with a sigh. "They're so nice they say.I would not mind about other things if I could stay here all the time and see you and your sisters, but Angeline Richee told me I'll have to go back to Ganta Fe work soon as the bif Fracis there is over to go into proper training, and if they're not better yet, and all the girlscouts and boys remain here wo' well it'll be so horrid, and I shall be so lonely.."

"We're going to Big Girl Knool too by and by after we make one more trip near Abbieann you know"put in Jennie cheerfully."Evans sent a message to the christian general Concentrating there that he was coming to take com command, as the Glandelinian armies under the Manleys and Myletze is approaching the territory with intentions to striking a terrible blow there. He wants us to be there to help in preventing the enemy from getting through Kittens Plecherts Run and we certainly will. John Manley was once a friend to us but now ain't he double crossed us and so we show him we can do the same..Oh susan the size of the armies concentrating there is the most immense more bigger for one side than all the two opposing armies here at Vivian Wickey.Won't it be dreadful if they should fight. My sisters are so worried."

"You and your sisters are the prettiest people I have ever seen."Susan said."I just like to sit and look at you and them, and so does Evans."

Jennie looked surprised and pleased.

"Penrod does too."said Susan"He ad mires you and your sisters very much.You know I coaxed Catherine to give me one of the full photographs that has you sen seven in it, and I put it into a frame on my table so I could see it all the time when I sat to read or write. I've seen Penrod looking at it every time he came into my room and this morning he stood in front of my table t so long, that he delayed me in my work of studying out a plan Angeline Richee ha gave me to work on, and when I spoke to him asking him to let me sit at my table and work, he didn't seem to hear.I had to pull his coat to make him look around, and then he was so startled I thought he would have jumped across the table, and when I asked him why he kept staring at the picture of you and your sisters all the time, he got quite red, and said little girlscouts mustn't ask foolish questions.I think it was rather unkind for I didn't mean to say anything to him that I should not have."

There was a little pathetic quiver in susans voice, and Jennie noticing the fretful sound in susans voice said anxious to change the subject as soon as possible;

"What plan do you want me to show you how to do this evening?"

"I don't care "said susan indifferently.

Jennie proposed the "raised letter"plan, but though Susan consented, she herself couldn't make it out, h r her interest soon flagged, and before they had been at it several minutes, she pushed the plan away saying that she couldn't make the puzzle out.Jennie looked a little distressed.

"you can study on something else then."she said as she gathered up the plan.

"I guess just now for your ben efit I'd rather talk."said susan."Because of this I don't feel like studying anything this evening, and besides I want to talk to you about something very important, which you can tell your sisters later.Do you think we might shut the door and have a special guard placed there so nobody we don't know gets near there or cones in.It's something very private, even which if enemy scouts over hear, would be disasterous to us all..... .."

Jennie Vivian feeling very much surprised, and not a little curious as well, hastened to place a sentry outside on either side, and then hastened to close the door, and then came and sat down by Susan, who was looking both worried and excited.

"It was something Mildred Maxwell said."began Susan in a rather unsteady voice"It was late this afternoojn afternoon when the enemy blew up the stockades, and I've been thinking about it all the time ever since."

"Tell me all about it."said Jennie in a tone of deep interest..

"Well it just was at that dreadful time, and I went into the pantry for a drop of water.Angeline Richee and Mildred Maxwell were both there, and as I drank the ra water I overheard all this for I stayed to hear it was all so at first interesting, and then so shocking. Mildredwas saying that everybody now has a queer way of blaming Glandelinia for everything that goes wrong, because glandelinia has already done so many wicked things to the Galverinian States States. she said Glandelinia is to blame for the evil consequences of this awful war.The greed of the Glandelinian rulers and the monumental jealiously of their wicked generals against you and your followers, the lust of power and the destruction of all Catholic Nations, and the longing for domination, has she said plunged our nations into a suicidal conflict, and all the world she said is talking most despairingly of the failure of Christianity, for Christianity was opposed heart and soul to everything Glandelinia did that had brought about the war.The ruthless destruction of Abbieann and all other places and the closing up of all Galverinian seaports"went on" "so Mildred said is plunging the whole world into a most terrifying depression or what you will it.Money is failing everywhere she declared accordingly to all news papers.Depression is gripping the markets throughout the whole world and millions and millions of beautiful homes that have been have been built in the shadow of those markets are gone to naught, and she said that now many of the nations begin to doubt poor God because of a disasterous war that has been caused by neglect of Him, of His Laws, and of the principals on which His Church was founded by wicked Glandelinia .I some wonder if there is such a thing as a benevolent providence of God, asking if there was really any sure and merciful, watchful Fatherly God at all. and if there was why He allows such a good nation like yours tobear the brunt of all this dreadful Catastrophe."

"It is all dreadfully queer, the situation seems twisted and upside down."said Jennie."you must know however prosperity is always paddttitide man made.The depression if there is one raging is to be blamed on Glandelinia, and certainly it is not God's fault.What are those nations thinking of. put Susan was Mildred reallu sure.Is such a disaster as you said she declared to be really a fact.That seems incredible."

"Mildred said it is"answered Susan, and the depression is so much of a fact, and a gripping paralzing fact, and so many hundreds of millions of people may many nations face it with terrified troubled eyes, that everybody is losing hope."

"But then"said Jennie"It may be interesting to see just what God may play in the things to led up to the depression, and perhaps what part he is playing in the depression himself.Are there in this simultaneous greatest catastrophes, for surely our war is a greater, any signs of God's love for His children, and especially our own nation and a watchful providence that drawe for us all good out of evil?"

"There surely must be"said Susan. "But Mildred said,"The world a few years ago, and the world to day could hardly present a greater study contrast.Not only are the landscapes in all nations different but everywhere in those nations the very mental and spiritual atmosphere is s sadly changed.Those proud pennons of smoke that flew from billions f smokestacks and chimneys no longer wave against the crimsoning skies. Factories that sucked in countless thousands of laborers and disgorging endless trains of manufactires now stand empty and silent with many broken windows gaping like blinded eyes over so many deserted yards. They say the whole world is afraid because of this devastating war.Throughout the world the cocky step of men and the pleasure bent footsteps of women they say have taken on a new, depressed hesitant rhythem. No longer does the rich men strut like a conqueror.He walks like one tread ing fearfully on the edge of a chasm into which the next blow may throw him together with his shruk shrunken possessions, and the tottering buildings he has built so hopefully.Probably Jennie , many of the nations through out the world out side of your nation may deserve a good portion of this but why should your big State Galverinia be so afflicted. and in part particular Abbieann the biggest and best city your whole nation ever had.Five years ago so I read, Abbieann city had reached the summit of its glorious power, and the pinnacle of its unusal righteousness.Men women and children gathered inside and outside all the Churches at not only Sundays but week days for every Mass with a credulity never given to the most famous stock tickers or oracles by the most credulious of peoples elsewhere.It seemed for the goodness of the people fortunes sprang from nowhere and the people gave the fortunes more than three quarters to the poor, and for the support of your nation, fortunes for which no one planned or labored, or which they planned and labored, itt was and still is the same everywhere in your nation, fortunes written on paper.All great Churches were the only shrines of the nation, and chapels and holy pictures statues and every kind of Saints Sevamantal were seen and is seen in Factories to bless the buildings in their work.He was indeed a poor and pitiful and foolish clod hopper, who claimed he did not like to see a crucifix or a holy picture in a fattttre factory and they usually were some of us foriegners.

You in this nation always admit with emphasis and with ingenuous pride that there was nothing that our Blessed Lord could not and would not do.Editorial writers always hammered into the public consciousness the power and glory of God and His Blessed Mother and illustrated God's achievements, with holy pictures innumerable.Nature the giant they often times make pictures of bending her back subserviently to the commands of Our Blessed Lord.Electricity and steam, and the winds and the either, served him as no slaves had ever served the mightiest of Kings or Masters.within a generation every one in your nation, and especially in Abbieann were told, that righteousness ought to be able to walk a conquered earth that held no secrets from its conqueror, and yeild everything to God and His Blessed Mother for which They might yearn.

In Abbieann city, so History said great skyscrapers rose, and on every main floor was a chapel where all the workers went to pray three times a day. Over them flew the clouds and the blessed rain.Even there flew space ships conquering baloons and airships, and winged religious and poly words of pleasings and Thanksgivings to God leaped distances, first along a copper wire, and also on the waves of the ether.I heard never anything here like songs in other nations.All Love songs are to God the Saints and His Blessed Mother including Church songs.

Corporations grew and swelled in Abbieann, becoming in vaster shapes and beauty, showing no conciet, no vasty pride of their great achievements and wages were more than fair to all laborers.Gold poured into the banks, and half into the hands of poorer people.Grain was piled in elevators, and poor people recieved half or more of their share.Storehouses bulged with manufactured goods,, and instead of sitting astride all this flaunting over your greatness, your nation humbles itself and offeers all to God through their strenuous help of the poor of all nations.Fortunes Stocks rose, and were hurled upon the poor of other nations grew too fast for the count of an adding machine, and went fast to the support of the poor.Buildings elbowed one another in their eagerness to rise closer to God.Cities were born here as at the touch of Aladdins lamp and became holier still.When I was in Abbieann one week day and went to Mass even as early as four oclock in the morning,I had to be there half an hour earlier than the time or I would have been crowded out.Pleasure however was housed in magnificent buildings dedicated to God and His Blessed Mother.Poverty, all the Rich hoped for would disappear from the nations and if it didn't they would make it so as they said everybody as equal rights to their share, and that no one should suffer because of the avarious of wicked persons.wickedness too In other nations they said should disappear from the earth, and the Devil and His followers should be tied to pillars and forced to look on as their victims were snatched from the brink of hell and saved for Heaven. The Abbieannian leaders were pointing the way to paradise brought once more into the midst of mankind, and that God they wished most ardently would remain closer and closer and never leave.For precisely that ardent hope lay back of all striving and achievement.This nation for not the whole earth of ours was to become so sweet and satisfactorily a paradize, that there would be no need of the devil interfering,, and that the Heaven promished by Christ should be the most striven for. The good Kingdoms of the Abbieannian nation were to be beautiful enough just to prove that we should not forget the Kingdom of God.When Abbieannia had became an earthly heaven, Heaven would above be still shown to be more than necessary for mans happiness. But if your nation no matter how rich it became, and no matter how more righteous it became should have over all this glory and righteous power and wealth, a grim and ugly shadow of Abbieanns coming down all.Few recognized the danger of course, for it was the shadow of the Golden Calf of Glandelinia, the Devils plan to hoodwink I suppose Both God and Abbieannia. They say some of the authorities of Galverinia, saw that menancing shadow, but that her shadow was unheeded because they didn't believe Glandelinia could do anything so diabolical.None of us can even prove it yet that glandelinia did it.go little did those foolish men of the Galverinian Governmet however observe the shadow of coming horror that they failed to notice in that shadow, there had grown up fierce and ugly things, devastating war, brutal massacres of children, rabid robbery of money and provisions, destruction of towns by fires, your now big forest fires threatening the whole world with darkness because of all the smoke, contempt for the christian poor and the weak, vicious battles that locked countless millions of men in a deadly quarterless strife. and the lust of landelinia that paraded its shamelessness before the priest of the "God of War "that Glandelinia worships instead of our blessed Lord Himself.Dark and ugly and repellent things crept about in that shadow of the Golden calf "Glandelinia".The incense, sweet and dross they rose in clouds from Christian temples, and lovely women who were in Church discerned the coming disaster through some reason and offered themselves to god to avert the coming disaster.But why did this go on.In Abbieannia even now God is the only one they Love, and never since the days of Haughty Rome had so many people loved god like the Apostles did and still do.Men, even offer the soft purr of the dynamo, giver of power, and source of energy to God evet every minus of the day.Men offered holocausts of spinning machinery of all factories to God.The flames that tortured steel into mystic shapes and glo glow scarlet and yellow against the night sky were the flames of sacrifices giving up to God and saving mens souls by honest well paid labor. Man was on his knees to God, breathlessely worshipping him before they start work, awe struck at the thought that he could dream of such God Given Wonders an at the poo power and speed of the machinery He had shown man how to make.Temples grew innumerable to Honor God and His Blessed Mother.People here I see never even think of a sin to comaitt, and once when a foriegner said a verб very bad word he was tar red and feathered and made to ride the rail, and got a good strog strong soap mouth wash also.To worship in the Catholic Temples men paid vast fortunes.Skyscrapers housed the devotees of god and His Blessed Mother, and commerce was offered to Him as a Thanksgiving.Towers holy and beautiful scraped the clouds not merely to Honor God and His Blessed Mother to also but to also glorify Him and His Blessed Mother, and keep it on the lips of every one.At every street corner in a sort of grotto is a imagine of the Sacred Hearts of Our Blessed Lord, and His Mother.Great Central Temples spawned thefsmaller houses of worship as great corporations added to their magnificent cen tral plants, smaller assembly plants, each of which gathered grateful villiages around it, promishing to be the cause of their prosperity and thebeneficent dispenser of all manner of good things. And over all these buildings and shrines, are even many high priests men whom their followers knew must be a sort of imitation of St Peter, Vincent or the like.They were indeed the Favored of the men for their rightne righteousness. Children everywhere mind their parents in a way which I cannot ever understand, they never quarrel or fight amongst each other, always play games fair and square, do not look down on strangers, and if strangers do something not right they're quick to correct you.

Last year has now almost passed into the beginning of a new one and as you know Jennie the change is little short of appalling. Abbieann is no more so they say, and because of that, throughout the world the ticker tape lately telling its fairy tale of quick profits and mounting fortunes has become like an enveloping chain pulling men down to failure, despair, even ultimate suicde.The dynamo even stands silent and helpless.The war has come to create a new hell upon earth, and in every nation the great machinery are going no more. Like another moloch it consumes the very men who made it. Jobless scores of millions lift their hands to curse the Abbieann disaster that has caused all of their misfortunes, and believes Abbieannia is a fool to stick to a Creator who they believes disowned his own good people.Other many millions find. the joy of craftsmanship ended forever in the sullen soul destroying service of a machine that all day long in other nations monotonous never changing regularity beats out one tiny part of a job that none of its workers will ever see completed or recognize with a sense of achievement as the creature his brain concieved and his hands executed with the most affectionate skill.

Suddenly your beautiful temples have been wrecked.Even in your own country factories no lonu no longer call gor their millions, not because of depression but because so many men have joined the army against Glandel inia since Abbieanns destruction whether we're sure Glandelinia did it or a natural cause.Railroad yards because of the destruction of so many railroads become on land in all cities and towns not struck by the disaster another great Saragossa Sea, choked not with deserted ships,but with millions of empty freight and passenger cars.Only one line is open and fortunately tward Abbieann too and that is the Mic-Hollester and Pandora lines(A,b,c) lines).Throughout all nations in the world seats on the Stock Exchange that for many years were worthhalf a million each are now offered so they say at a tenth of that sum, with no takers, it seems the seats of the mighty rich in those nations have lost their glamor.And those outside our country with the Midas touch find that it has gone as quickly and as mysteriously as it came.Their hands are powerless to make or find gold, scarcely can they even make bread.Leaders who strutted arrogantly uttering wise prophecies of endless prosperity of continued conquests, of mans supremacy over all things, now scuttle about cloaking their ignorance in silly excuses, blaming even each other for the very faults of all, and realizing they have only words to offer to those who need food, and excuses to substitute for the failure of a boastful science, without knowing that maybe Glandelinia it is who had dragged a hole world to ruin.All machinery in the world is silent in their grease and oil, more powerless than the very men who made them.And every high person looks about for someone to blame some one to charge with the fi failure of their prophecies and the futility of their ritual, and of course Jennie with one voice I heard they blame God and even our Nation.My father has told me that he heard that people outside of our nation ask;

"Is God really the provident Father he claims to be if he permits Glandelinia to carry on as she does, and allows her to do things that cause this world wide depression through the destruction of Abbieann?Christ His Son said of Him that not a sparrow fell without His knowledge.What of the Crash of the worlds money market and the fall of stocks in which men had sunk their whole future, the source from destroyed Abbieann? If he He clothes the lily of the fields and ponds and rivers, and feeds the birds of the air,His He c no concern for the innumerable twisting breadlines, that curl and shiver in the worlds Bewerlies?How can all this panicbe, this dreadful wholesale sungunity loss of fortunes, this collnapse of business, this laying off of men and women by countless thousands, who depend upon work for their bread,If He is the Kind and Loving Father His Priests say He is? Papa told me that they foolishly say-Does He "some s the doubting taunt reallly, exist atall?Certainly if He does,He seems to care very little about the World He claims to have made or the people who scratch about on its surface.But with your Nation Jennie it's different.There is no doubt or despair.They know God is much concerned with His World, and they're more concerned about God and His commandments than ever befores.Your Government believes that Glandelinia is a delusion that has failed Abbieannia, failed God, and. failed the world in general.The present situation in all that Galverinia now knows.And the attitude, has followed the collnapse of mans property so swiftly that a perfect chorus of blame rises as suspicion against wicked Glandelinia.I've even heard Abbiannian generals often say about Abbieann"I'll bet my own eyes Glandelinia is at the bottom of it all." Over the typet typewritters or near the water coolers in the offices. of the buildings of your survived cities, clerks and stenographers grow bitter in their attacks on Glandelinia, and fear dreadfully that God had been dreadfully insulted by the enemy.As the crumb disappears from the lunch box, factory hands and mechanics grow theological blaming Glande linia for their last ten per cent cut and the laying off of another score million of men.

Yesterdays captian of industry, who never in the days of His goodness and power to help, ever thought of wicked Glandelinia, now lays heavy responsibility on her and look on her in suspicion of the loss of Abbieann.Directors look up from their red inked ledgers and their rapidly descending graphs to sneer openly at glandelinia, and even said gently and sorrowfully"How can the Good God help to fail to bless big and small business or put His approval on any good stock market when His Arch enemy Glandelinia puts out an interfering dirty diabolical hand.

If Our Blessed Lord Jennie could be astonishment,He surely must have been utterly dumfounded to Find Galverinia His Beloved Land here suddenly dragged into this sorry Abbieann business. and if any one had ever been kept inside of Abbieann's Holy and Righteous "Wall Street" and all Abbieannian Tribunals, if any one had ever been first invited a place in the councils of Abbieannia or the directors of meetings of all Business, that Person was the Almighty.The prayers uttered while the saddended, legislators ducked or bowed their heads in respective silence and joined in was a full Rosary and Litany of the Blessed Virgn and Blessed Lord combined. God and even His Blessed Mother was offered more than any one else a full portfolio in the cabinets of Abbieannia and her cities.He was welcome in all Schools and Universities and welcomed First.He was unusally heard of and His Councils considered First of all when directorates interlocked a little more closely.Had any big business man in your country paused in the midst of a directors meeting or any senator interrupted a debate in the Galverinian Government to inquire what Glandelinia or her wicked generals thought of the matter under discussion, he would have been regarded as either stark mad, or for Glandelinia, or as so utterly lacking in good taste that his colleagues would have turned their heads aside to his a blush.No one can wants to hear Glandelinia ment mentioned.

Any say what has caused this disaster no one can say.I asked Mildred Manning once, and she said"What Nature had to do with the whole wretched business of Abbieann that culminated into this depression is pretty hard to see, as even Scientists are doub s doumfounded.

I read in Histories of your country that as long as the nation was known by other nations, in public affairs, and business deals,God has been treated pretty much as if He were a part of the Business and the beloved people themselves, who at every meeting would be permitted to sit in Stae State, and who was pol politely recieved when anything really important was being considered or, and was gently invited to remember, that He was completely in full control of all, and that all they asked of Him was His help in everything if He willed. it, and well--if not--"THY Will Be Done."God was perfectly all right even for all the Factories, Homes and any place, for even to show Him respect and Love His picture of Statue was and is to be found even in lowly barns and sheds, and the world of finance and science in Abbieannia always did e feel sure and still feels so even politics and education, that it cannot shift for itself, and that it needed Him most of all, and couldn't say "wouldn't do without Him. That is why to me it is simply utterly impossible to consider this disaster and depression.And too the seeds of immeasureable sadness and horror has been sown on the bloody dreadful battlefields we now know often of the enemy himself do not shoot millions of dollars into the air day after day to blast the lives of hundreds of thousands ofyour soldiers between dawn and dusk ithout some day sitting down to reco reckon how much the fireworks and the massacres have cost.We ourselves Jennie so they say are o total ing that ledger to day and still the war rages on.

It have seen that every month God is practically ruled into the intellectual and political life of o your nation.Every writer even admits more and more of His Existance.Literature simply ignores the Devil and His followers.The popular philosophy denied him as a devil, saying that he was not even fit for the name, that such a name was too good for such a wicked Evil spirit, and that the Devil and His followers ought to be no longer remaining in a world; whose property was Solrely belonging to God alone.That there was more and more the Head of a Cttttt Cra Creator, and I've seen imagines of Christ carrying His cross on every building spire dttt or, dome and the Stations of the Cross in every town I was in.When I heard of Glandelinian Generals mer meeting for really wicked business such as banishing Sisters of charity, supressing Trappist monasteries, and sacking buildings then I knew what Abbiannia's cause is.In your country God and His blessed Mother has been more and mo more invited strongly into school systems, the walls of all law corts are covered with Holy Pictures ,and a great crucifix, and in the necessary gathering of taxes, enacting necessary laws, and increasing armies God has the First Place and Invocation.He is invoked to bless all banners and Standards, the invokers telling Him in prayer what they are for.No ono here denies His right as law giver. Divorce, the wicked ancient novelty called birth control, Ha I'd dare any one to start that once here, sex freedom, the right of the strong to take what he can and the right of the laborer to cheat His employer untill caught does not exist here, and nothing contradicts God and everything Christ has taught, and God commanded..The rich in your country firmly believe unshakingly that God's laws must and shall under any conditions come first before econonic necessities. Because of whatwe are, no ma wonder Jennie more fair minded nations when all this horror is now happening because to accuse Glandelinia for everything and think your nation is a fool not to seek satisfaction from Glandelinia always saying"Why don't mighty Abbiannia pitch in and crush glandelinia and drive her from Calverinian soil before it is too late." Many writers of tha those nations wrote fiercely of the failre failure of Calverinia to resist the "Devil Nation Invader"and the collaspe of Christianity before them and the destruction of the Churches and cities and of the big forest fires.

They forgoet that the two nations at war were the very nations, who attack t like Leeches to god, on the one side, and on the other who ruled Him out of their own hearts Glandelinia.Too late all nations are calling for Help upon a God, whom Glandelinia hated and discarded. It was the Devil not the Christ of calvary who rides at the head of Glandelinia's most devastating armies.These two nations as you know Jennie are locked in a desperate struggle to prove which of them had the right cause.They are putting(Abbiannia forced) the theory that God's cause is just, and the enemy claiming otherwise to " laboratory tests" and these laborties are the battlefields of this war. I have heard that even only here at Vivian W ickey not counting all other battlefields, billions have been burned in the smoke and flame of bursting shells, billions that can never be salvaged, while the great heart of the vicar of Christ, broke in pity over tortured Calverinia and her sister states. Meanwhile the best young men of both nations are forced to be gun fodder in this great drama, and recently last year the Pope planned in vain to knighty wicked Glandelinia for peace, even i on the day of Christ's birth.I know you and your dear sisters remember that Chttttttm Christmas horror at Evangeliniq Crania or Delight's junction.The war is worse now, and often I've seen solemnly about council tables sits those who are to try to do a thing or two to crush Glandelinia's haughtiness into the dust.God's name is invoked more urgently upon the deliberations of all the Abbiannian deligates.The represintive of the vicar of Christ if he cannot come to the meetings, causes the meetings to be postponedm while if he happens to come the representive of the Devil has the door slammed in his face,for there's no place for him inthe assembly of the deligates.All the deligates has the most savage mistrusts of glandelinia, as the hand of one nation closes in death grip upon the throat of ours.Lands belonging to your FairyCalverinia are torn asunder as greedy fiste each pull for their share of a picture in a book. In your country as God made the earth, so that much more He is allowed and even asked most pleadingly to have all part in reapportioning it.Christ the Savior of the World, is frequently consulted every day, and His vicar is deliberately invited oftener than he can come.but in Glandelinia there are tyrannious dictators, the rule of hell, tariff walls higher than the highest mountains, smouldering and outward hatreds of the christian countries, butterness that only wait for the chance to be revenged. Glandelinia surely is not a nation of God's making, but a nation dict ated, and patched together by men worse than those read of in Vanity Fair, of the Pilgrims Progress, by advocates of Satan Himself, who had not alloed allowed god to be even their friend Friend.They alone have fashioned this dreadful war that moved swiftly into chaoes, despair, distrust, increased armaments, this great seige, all these disasters disintegration of Calverinias forests, and what we now know as the awful depression.With perfect justice God could have washed hHis hands of Glandelinia, and the king and leaders who had misled her.Yet with us in Abbiannia, there is no depression fortunately.We righteously hold the purse strings of the world, and your nation gives freely to help all who are in the depression.We still see wealth piffed up, and stocks leaping from peak to peak, and factories not being able to fill their orders, and fot fortunes growing strong, and yet not deminishing despite all is doing for the poor.And in all this you see God adored more than the wealth.

God has it would seem a very hard time to make Himself heard above the roar of destruction, the purr of machine guns, the thundering of ex ploding shells, the roar of many big battles raging simultaneously, and the chorus of the enemys awful Indian like yells.Yet how can all this be and when again I have seen and know that it would be very interesting to find that all professors of economics in any school of Abbiannian business, commerce, or finance, always stoutly declare that back of the risking market is a provident god who should be served first of all.It would be in vain not to see a picture of Christ looking down from the beardwall rooms walls of any corporation in the land, or a crucifix or a statue of the saints, or of the blessed Mother and Child cand that precise places in the business world was ot allooed by its captions to the indwelling Holy Ghost.The principalso of Christ are used everywhere in your nation as the basis of dealings between capti capital and labor.Never here do the employers drive their workmen as under the lash, or scold and find fault with and never was therecan employee who gave as little in labor or interest in return for their pay checks. The crucifix and even Holy pictures hang over the stock exchange in your country and God is always invoked in Rosary and Litanies and even in Masses and novenas before the directors of Banks and the this like plann a new stock issue.If questioned they would say;"Yes Why should not God be in all this.He is the creator of all and without His Help we could do nothing.It's not our Gold, not our Riches, all belong to Him, and he loans that to us.We are His stttds Stewards. God is invoked and loved dearly in the banks, and senate chambers, fat factories and department stores, the army and scientific laboratories, state school systems from kindergarten to universities, to growing chain stores, and even oil fields.

The Abbieannians knew and believed that Our Blessed Lord had created the world, and had First alled it into being.But it lookod to the Abbieannians, that now He was needed to run it much more than ever before.That job was asked, of Him pleaded and implored of Him to supreme and good satisfaction by Abbiannian politicians and fina financiers scients men of letters, educators, and newspaper men, capitalists and labor leaders, who had thoroughly trusted in Him, inHis Goodness and help to almost an outgrown way. Politely but emphatically Our Blessed Lord h had been asked to draw closer to His World.More correctly He was and is treated as if He had come as a most important and Highest official guest into their own homes.And yet Glandelinia herself seemed to be getting along beautifully without him.

As far as I can see Jennie it is a little difficult to see what under the circumstances, God could do except withdraw from Glandelinia. He is treated as if he had withdrawn, as if He didn't exist. Only in your country, Abbieannia, there are all your people all faithful righteous souls men women and children loyal sons and daughters of the Ha Heavenly Futher and His Blessed Mother, who always and still welcome Him and His guidance in the most important personal affairs of their lives.But then they are not Glandelinians.All your leaders, and even you and your sisters everyone here loves Him, Consults Him, and strives in a militant way to do His will, and succeeds.But for all of us kneeling in prayer before battle, there are countless legions of glandelinians, God and Saint haters, who resent any suggestion that they ask counsel or guidance of a higher power. So though the sustaining hand of God continues to uphold this immense universe and must continue so if the world is not to slip back into the nothingness from which creation summoned it, we may rightly believe that God did withdraw the special providence by which he guides and guards the destines of wicked nations.He has left Glandelinia to her own conciet.He handed her over to the Devil whom they trusted.He let her rest contentedly upon their dishonestly made and ill gotten gold, their machines and the shrewd judgements of leaders who knew so much more than He did. He stood aside, so to speak and let the wicked Glandelinia run the world as she dares to try to run it.

And if He had heaped the Glandelinian nation with fire and brim stones,He would hardly have done a more terrifying thing.God we know has a way of punishing men of a wicked nation when they go and deliberately turn from him in contempt or make war upon Him and His Christian nation like yours in particular in hatred.One proof of the suspicion upon Glandelinia is the flood that swept Central Calverinia clean of its beauty, the flames that destroyed clean holy cities, the explosions that destroyed Abbieann by shock fire and flood, the collapse of many good cities by the same disaster, the wicked conquering armies that swept upon sectors were a sign that glandelinia was bent upon making a most disasterous war.But why should the Abbieann disaster sweep upon the whole world if this time there seems to have been something of irony in god's treatment of Glandelinia's contemptuous neglect and fortright hatred of Him.The downward rush of a stock market caused by the destruction of Abbieann, swept away fortunes as not even the biggest Calverinian flood or forest fire has ever done. Fires died in foundries, and factories, and owners and workers stand looking into cold furnaces, knowing that in those dead ashes was the burned out slag of their ardent hopes, ambitions, and fortunes.

Upon the nations there fell almost that same sort of muddle that fell upon the builders of Bable.They now stand about the vast buildins but buildings they had made and spoke to one another in tongues they could not understand.Everything was suddenly topsy turvy, and no no man trusted a stranger for fear he was a disguised glandelinia citizen in their country.The workaday world had suddenly gone mad.Statemene statesmen make prophetic speeches that could not be proven true.Rulers of finance stood hands in pockets watching their corporations catinacting down as go house of cards had ever fallen.It is all utterly beyond understanding.Never had the granieries of the land been so bursting with wheat, but mysteriously they're set afire, and besides them starving men and women lay down and die.The treasuries of many nations have even lost their gold, banks everywhere big or small, National or not, failed with the regular rapid succession of shots from a minute gun and are still failing.Factory houses took inventory and found themselves glutted with luxuries, yet they mysteriously go up in smoke by hundreds, keeping unpaid firemen busy putting out so many dangerous fires. The most brilliant adver tizing councel, far from luring money from the pockets of the purchasers sent the possible buyers scuttling away to bury their coins in broken teapots or the barren vaults of a bank, so that robbers can break in and steal it..Never was there so much food burned by incendaries and so many hungry, so much wealth destroyed producing dire poverty even amongst the rich, so many office buildings and none to fill them, such gorgeous shop shops and no buyers, such vast farms lying fallow and cropless, such brilliant advice, and soothing reassurances from the leaders, while the followers scampered away in abject panic.

And the countless bread lines carved, and the factories nailed accross their doors by men have to do so"No help wanted" and the rich are suddenly poor, and the poor and rich alike have turned to casual bitter charity, and find "Charity" is only in the Dictionary, and the leaders of all other nations who had tried even inspite of wicked plans to make of this a heaven of this world wondered why their gods had failed them, and why their Midas touch was gone.

Yes Jennie many nations believe the destruction of Abbieann caused all the depression. And as any one could watch men as they clutched their barren gold, measuring their rotten wheat, reading once more with mingled hope and despair their engraved stock or certificates, inventorying their silent factories, red inking their tale tell tale ledgers recalling the leaders promishes of just yesterday, they could hear them turning wrathfully against Glandelinia, and blaming God as well, saying He placed such a nation on the earth.Depression of course it is said brought out many or all of the ugly things we had failed to notice.The rich were wicked in other nations, but it is absolutely true without the slights slightest doubts that in your country the richest in the whole world even there is no greed, no lust to dance upon the attendance upon riches.Here there is no cruel or any kind of oppression upon the weak, or no grinding of the honest workman, and themore he does the longer hourw of work he might have to put in the bigger the money, and even the very rich producers and employers takes all his or her employees with families and all upon the very same vacations they take, and allow them extra vactions of their own besides, with extra pay on those vacations and a raise every year when they come back.Over elsewhere in the world big nations oppress smaller ones, but yours and smaller ones against the big.

Your country is an ugly figure to atheism, for if an atiest comes to your nation, why I wouldn't want to be him or her.I saw one one time in one of your city streets walking about shouting in c vacious tones"There is no God, you Abbieannians are foolish, crazy" and making hedious faces at the Creator of the universe, and he as seized upon, hauled before a tribunal found guilty of hedious blasphemy and scourged and burned at the stake. Athests keep out of here since that time. I've been in many of your publick Livararies and never found a single wicked book of any kind, all the books are pure and worth reading and the pictures are lovely.Picture shows are beautiful and worth seeing by any one, the vaudwvilles are clean and screamingly funny, and never in any country have I ever heard such beautiful music.I've listened to one piece on one of my records untill I played all the needles out.Your people everywhere big or little have a dreadful horror a frightful sickening horror to do what Christ refused to do.Even They fight temptations if any come like a child fights against bad tasting medicine.The very capitalists and diplomats and writers and scientists in your country and actors and work men now either denounce Glandelinia and blame the wicked rich of the outside world for Glandelinia's fall into sin, and claim they must have turned from the Kingdom of God to buy at any price Glandelinia into sin and cause her to bring on this dreadful unholy and frightful war"

"No doubt"said Jennie if there is such a thing the depression if Abbieann's destruction caused it came in time, and that God was good in allowing it to sweep down upon all nations for it would bring them all on our side in the end and have the whole world down on Glandelinia. He did not cause the depression, but the destruction of Abbieann probably didn't either.No one can really prove that. The Rulers of the states in our country, had invited as you said the homes to God and His Saints had allowed hhim full possession, but whether they say God brought the Depression or not, or punished the World by q asceding to its wishes, you and every one should remember this"How can our fair and Good Calverinia, and her northern or southern states be expected to escape all this sorrow and horror, if Our Blessed Lord Himself, though being A Fairly righteous man and God Himself would not even refused to han on the Cross, Innocent of all that he was accused of.He has given our nation gold, and righteous power, and pleasure and things we need ,He had given us liberty to use all these things as we see fit and as you say because of the goodness of our Rich even there's hardly no poor in the land, and despite the disaster through all these rich people the progress of restoration,(Abbieann excepted of course, as nothing will be done there untill the real cause of the disaster is known,) has astonished the nations of the world. And they're doing their utmost to break down that depression if they have to go broke doing it. We alone of our nation are Fair with god always.In so far as the depression is an evil and a terrible thing, is it is made by this war and nothing else.This is history's most savage war, and has run as many think because of Abbieann being wiped out into a World catinstrophe. "

"It's a wonder"confessed Susan most bitterly from what glandelinia is, the the very King of Devils and all His followers are not within an inch of falling on their knees besides the Glandelinian Rulers who had turned from the Kingdom of God to buy at any price the Kingdom of God, and this world, and ruin and destroy all Christianity ever existing."

"There is no question about that"declared Jennie."but the Abbieann dis aster what ever caused it came upon Calverinia just in time t wake the high government officials of Calverinia up.Disasterous as that horror might have been I will have to say that if it is possible that it awakes the whole nation to make preparations against disasters in the fiture God as good even for allowing such a disaster to sweep upon us.He did not cause much a disaster, and I'm sure it broke His Heart to see it happen, and I firmly don't believe Nature did it either.The scientists declare they think it did, but when they are questioned more throughouly they only shrugg their shoulders, and say what they believe don't amount to anything, as there's no clues to a Natural disaster either.That they're bamboozled, dorfounded and flabbergasted..The Rulers of the world look with suspicion on Glandelinia even though evidence has not been founde to prove it was her design.By Glandelinia however Hod had been shown the door of His own Creation, He therefore as to say had allowed Himself to be pushed aside, and standing back, had watched glandelinia fumble about in her vast wickedness.God had not by any Natural disturbance brought on the destruction of Abbieann nor Calverinia's central states full of cities and towns, and rivers, nor had he He even brought on these awful forest fires raging that threatenes to smother the whole world with its ever increasing smoke clouds and flames..He cannot even be accused to punishing the world by acceding to its wishes, even though it has gold power power and the like and the liberty to use it and all t other other things. In so far as the destruction of Central Calverinia was an evil and most record breaking horror ever known in all History,I and my sisters, and even the flabbergasted scientists, though the latter reluctant ly claim it a natural disaster, declare it surely must be made man in every detail and result, and all look upon gGlandelinia..but you must notice that in no far as the disaster was a terrible thing, it didn't seem to have any bad results for despite the disaster, instead of discourag ing the Calverinians, they instead of finally turning from God as many be lieved they would, have gone to Him more than ever in their Distress.

That is inevitable for Calverinians.They know when the leaders of a wicked lation drag a civilization down into horror and disaster, the good and bad people throughout the world will and did suffer in their dfall.We are bound together in a social union, andcwe who suffered their leadership must suffer in their full.

Even though yet the innocent suffer with the guilty, and the faithful suffer for a time with the insolent, this disaster no doubt is godwisest way of saving the whole of Abbieannia and her States from disaster, complete ruin and defeat at the hands of glandelinia, and if we ever discover the cause of the disaster, it'll really be such a result that we will need to say instead of "Let's have m pity on poor Calverinia"

"God help Glandelinia".Nothing kills a nations reputation, so quickly as continued mounting horrors as Glandelinians have been doing.You've never seen the massacres of children I have seen even though you may have seen nd ey and been with a few dreadful ones as you and your sisters say. nd God alone knows only what will happen if this orgy we call War continues another ten years.It is as ridiculous to suppose that a wicked rich nation is necessarily a happy nation as it is supposed that a rich nation is virtuous or strong without right courness.The precise opposite is quite too frequently true.

How can it be though that a nation so rich as your can be so holy and righe righteous.Thousands of men are rich and prosperous beyond the dreams of Croesus, even more than Rockefeller, Henry ford and The Morgans put together, and if it had not been for them and their desperate efforts wou what would have become of the refugees produced by the disasters at Abbieann.Because of those Rich men, there's no sign of wreck and ruin at any of those cities now, except the wreckage windrow at Hildred Greenburg and that's left just to show the world what the disaster did. All your soldiers could have been uniformed in gold and yet they give liberally to the poor and wear the common uniform they have, and see to it that all your little girl and boyscouts have the most beautiful and expensive uniforms money can buy.I know it is because your people know how to use wealth.Lust and luxury does not come of wealth here, no sins of the flesh that corrupt a man, a race or a world with too much money at its disposal.Rich as people are here there is no leisurely idle lazy hands, and nobody feels here that money can and ought to buy a repeal of the Ten Commandments and whose name figured with disproportionate frequency in the headlines of the tabloids.Even their morals do not collapse. and there's not the slightest moral decay anywhere about us.There is not the slightest filth in the mark of the best sellers,there's no loose women flaunting on moving picture screens, your art and music is worth while for the Angels to look upon and admire, and vulgarity is not known here nor any worship of sense. Puriety doesn't suffer here like it does in other nations, there's no free fales love being preached in the open squares, and divource is looked upon as such an evil that Divource is destroyed, and persons divourcing meets a death penalty, and mistresses become and are like "Little Flowers" of Jesus, there's no gambling, and there's no loss of any kind of virtues, that makes a nation great.No one here gambles as they do in other nations. on the up turn of a stock which a person does not own, and stake the future upon their falmies families on the rumors of a pool or a merger of two firms which make we know not what, to sell to we care not from who.Instead rapidly your nation is becoming one despite all its riches, a nation of workers, and tremendous charity concerns.There's few orphan asylums here, because people adopt so many homeless, and only orphan asylums have been builded more no because of so many child ren rendered orphans by war, or because of rescued child slaves.work has made your nation the greatest of all--hard sweathy tireless work.Gambling is not known here, and finds no recievership here.The clerk instead of gal gambling his weeks salary gives more than half to the support of church school and the poor, and the maid her wages,the young father buys his children their education and other things needed, and the young wife does her goodly share even times men and women risk their very savings for the sake of cttttttttttmy country home and the poor, old men the small sum that is to provide dependent old age, some times the old women the very roofs over their heads, and yet gets returns a hundred fold. But Susan the curse of Glandelinia with her easy stolen money, wrested from the labor of child slaves seems to be upon us easy child slave gained money that puts the gamblers fire into the blood of glandelinians and makes them shrink from the thought of hard honest work. Some may say"Only fools worked"& hen one could grow rich through lucky margin investments or a quickturn over of stocks that never so much as touched the fingers of the man who bought or the man. who sold. Our la nation would never been lifted so far if we have and had the nervous furtive hands of gambles and gamblers.Our people could never have grown deep or rich in soul through living by our wits. The world needed the depression to knock from their heads the thoughts they had that glandelinia is not a dangerous nation, or that anything can be had for nothing. They needed it to put back into their very souls an appreciation of an honest job, by which bread and milk are put on theirs and our tables, and a roof is preserved above the heads of all.

.Yet before the eyes of the nations, with the Abbieann destruction seeming to destroy wealth beyond measure for us, with the apparent fall of triumphantal ust yet righteous and beautiful soul and God Loving capital, and the triumphs of righteousand honest labor, and all done by the righ f rich for the poor, our country seems to be losing the dreadful war, and that Glandelinia has already won.Why our father Emperor Vivian, laughs and says and had said often to us to encouage us"Why we have'nt even begun the war yet."The conviction grows in the hearts of thousands, that Abbieanns destruction meant the undoing of the good and beautiful Abbieannia.Why there's not a man of that state in the war yet, and if there were any coming soon, Calverinia would soon be singing hyms of praise as Glandelinia would be out of here and running south.But these States felt sure so far they could fight alone because it is necessary to do so.But we wonder what will happen if any one descoversthe true fact of Abbieann's sorrow, and it reaches Abbieannia.glandelinia will dread the aproach of that day I'll bebound. Abbieanns destruction if glandelinia did it, just dug the trap for Glandelinia a little deeper for her ultimate full.All the clever trickery in the world she may try out and accomplish will b then be powerless to withstand the southward swoop of the Abbieannian State Armies, that will appear like the da dragons of our fairy tales out of nowhere. to crush Glandelinia between steel jaws.

We Abbieannians believed that honest work might not always be the swiftest way to vast fortune, but that did not bother us, but we know and see that the honest God Loving worker does not fall with the speed and certainity in even other nations, that has marked the fall of the worlds outstanding shady bankers, stock manipulators, and the whole famb flam- oyant and now threadware race of wallingfords, that couldn't exist in our country without quickly finding themselves behind v bars first, and then disgracefully deported.

Fales standards do not and are not allowed to grow up during any period of our own prosperity.We know the wholesome necessaries.We do not allow luxeries to take the place of everything, and if there is any luxury it has to stay in its place and Heaven help it if it does. not do so.We know nothing here but honest vegetables, and life giving bread and homely pleasures of life, and little is known of spiced food carbonated drinks, which we look upon as posionous. That is why all our folks are so strong healthy and the like.Most of us kids here in this country single handed as you have seen yourself can handle two big Glandelinian soldiers despite the rifle he may carry. We have happy hopes even though they may be beautiful.The wild urge to go to church every time there's a service has taken always precedence over anything else, and the only shows we care for is wholesome ones and plenty of of ible scenes and nothing else.And we like that on Stages better than the so called dirty movies in other lands.silk is the standard of dress also here, jewels also but that is used for good occassions only and not as Gods asthe rich people do.If jeel Jewels and silk cannot be had, well that does not worry any one, they're content what they got.

The poor and the rich here do not envy and hate one another.some for e foriegner once brought some Jazz music into this country and our offic officlus made a mistake, and the unfortunate boob had the most terrible time proving he was not insane.He's never invited jass or jazz music here ever since that day.

The love of god at all costs is our ~~dominant~~ dominant goal, and success in that is not measured in terms of what shall we do first and next, and is added by a calm and peaceful home a growing family of healthy saintly God and neighbor loving children, a well stocked library of books worth reading, a circle of congenial friends, perhaps a servant or two who are treated as members of the family, good country clubs of everykind where everybody is invited and allowed free of charge, no place that bars the entrance of babies and the like.Face the facts Susan.Isn't that all precisely what we have been taught to love and desire and ambition whether other nations liked us for it or not?Wasn't that the dream of the average Abbieannian, even though the disaster came, and swept half of our good and holy things down the gutter.?does that makes the Abbieannian discouraged and think god is doing wrong to them after all.? Not one bit.They all say,"Who suffered like Our Blessed Lord?No one."

The simple things of life are loved here and not considered stupid. God women are never considered dull.Here children are loved next to God and not considered a nuisance.We love our homes better than a showhouse beach and so forth.If we love the mountains then we must have a home there or otherwise the mountains can stay where they are.and the career of everybody is the same, and rich and poor alike share the same. HOW istorically we know that no people in Calverinia or of any of her good northern southern, western and Eastern States has developed the habit of the dangerous narcotic called"Overconfidence".Not hing less than a complete cutting away of the very possibility of ra reaching such a foolish idea saved Calverinia from a bigger disaster than it recieved. Had the disasterous consequences of the Abbieann sorrow gone on, with the big floods, and famine, glandelinian no doubt many nations believed could have made an easy conquest of our beautiful states.This is precisely the conviction not only of religeous enthusiasts in other nations but of educators who have stood baffled in the presence of our gigantic flood, our big and record breaking forest fires, and of war correspondents who were able to see such dreadful cruel massacres as to make these young men unwilling to write of them, causing the callous indifference of the Glandelinian public to all kinds of graft however to be exposed, predict of the very elements elements from which come in rapid succession national decay, conquest of the good and inevitable despotism of the Infernal Regions.But if the depression soon sweeps upon Glandelinia it'll sweep much of that out of her reach.The way the depression in the world you tell me of, and which is blamed on Abbieann's destruction, necessities are becoming once more then very precious and most important, and lucky is the man or woman who still has a job to which he can and does turn a willing hand, no matter what kind of a job it is, even if withsmall pay.And lucky is the woman who is certain of the next meal for her family. And thrice happy the family whose roof is safe over its head, even if its garage is cattat carless. Plain food must then be surprisingly sweet to the taste. Entertainment too is being found to be acceptable without expensive over and cover charges, and sports in the open air, on golf links, neighborhood corts and back lot diamonds takes quite satisfactorily the places of their night clubs which is unknown here, and the what you call it, the---the---the---de lux or or"----"The de luxe theater.Thank s then to the depression even if Abbieann and her destruction did cause it young men and women are rediscovering their himes, and that too is a discovery that should promise to rank with the discovery of Columbus's of a new world.They have not the cars now in which to escape from home and family as rapidly as possible.They have not the pi pocket momeny to buy admittance into elaborate places of wicked synthetic gayety. And by the way, probably father has given up his expensive

This depression Susan, and we can really give it credit where due,tight ens the family circle again in those nations and makes it still tighter here, and history will gratefully thank the depression and our Sid Abbieann for saving the family homes in many a nation nearly disrupted or strained almost to the point of a complete break by too much pleasure too much drink, and eating, too much luxury, too keen a competition from outside, too much pocket money that they can't even spend, and which robbers would like to get hold of and a sort of absentee fatherhood and motherhood. I don't know what it does too to such a thing as Divorce going on over there, Susan, but that de depression should cause it to fall offremarkably.Our own husbands and wives in this country of Fair Abbieannia always hold together desperately in the face of the most overwhelming obstacles, who now face the sudden need to struggle against this Glandelinian foe.Never was it heard of that in our country husbands and wives fight each other, like like they do in other nations.Whether rich or poor too, they shoulder to shoulder turning their fighting ability, and their fighting spirit against the enemies of our Blessed Lord, that threaten their homes and their happiness.

Certainly because of the Abbieann disaster, vast fortunes throught the world will never again seem the firm and lasting foundations we once or the people of other nations once thought them when they had seen them melt like summer clouds, and drop countless millions of men and women and laborers combined and whole families by hundreds of thousands into the depths of oblivion and despair.Our real value however is neither the money we all have acquired, the power we can yeild and so forth, but the main thing to save our souls.And the cheapest diamond, or the cheapest grain of sand in heaven all the money and treasures and jewelry in the whole world of the past or to come couldn't buy. And positions will seem less precious now that all the more foolish rich nations outside have watched the wolves of their big Wall Streets and the hyenas of wicked Societies rend to bits the leader as he fell.Perhaps Susan this has been merely an ocular demonstration of Christ's warning so hard for these foolish nations to hesed in time of prosperity,"Put not your trust in riches."We all ourselves keep over and over again this story in our minds which consists of these terrible words"And God said to the rich man,This night I shall require thy soul of thee."And I know what that means. There's no such terrible place that can be found to even reach one third the awful measure of Hell and its dire miseries. And too the great and beautiful Standards of Christ, which after all are the only ones that endure in prosperity and depression in success and failure is not forgotten here while our nation rides the crest. "We all remember"Blessed are the poor in spirit" which is a senseless and foolish phrase in meaningless jargon to the wicked, rich and the ldoooso others, but which is music to our ears.Another warning"what doth it pfo profit a man to gain the whole world, and suffer the loss of his own soul."I suppose this sounds stupid to all who sell foolishly their souls to the Evil ones and with the profit concern ing what or oky rocketing the steel market."In those nations "Take up your Cross and follow Me" is strange advice, to I supposeou suppose a generation that sweeps past in luxurious limousines, extra fair railroad trains, and all other kinds of transports, whi whether on roads, ships, rivers or in the air. The whole comprehensive cycle of Christ, and his Standards, in all other nations so our very priests say were widely forgotten as tickers clicked to the rise of oil and jazz bands deafening the ears of the crazy merry makers and powerful motors responded to the touch of exquisitively booted toes, and the shouts of the buyers and sellers rose high above the sad voice of Him, who only spoke to the listening heart.No one that millions who really loved and served him Him, and followed Him and his Standards yearned and strove to come over to our country, and that our Government knowing their character, did not look upon them as strangers and allowed them in passport or no passport. But even in this case is there any question, whether Abbieann's destruction did this or not. Grace of God seemed more abundant, despite the fact that gold was at hand.Prayer had no hard task attracting their hearts , and all riches and horrors of sin looked terribly dreadful, when the triumphant Kingdom of god was wished for at hand.No wonder that even the most faithful of faithful, when disaster sailed upon our lands, and the boats of early victory among glandelinian leaders rang high and shrill looked for the Kingdom of Heaven almost longingly enough, to grow sick with yearning, and felt that Our Own Blessed Lords Lot was unnecessarily hard because of Glandelinia. Yet out of the depression which is believed to have been caused by Abbieann's destruction God is we hear be bringing with Fa n Fatherly hand a new and deeper spirit of religion, even in our own holy land, a realization that Christ was right, and Crosses for all his bragging and bonds,, and billyhoo ous and is utterly wrong."Our L rd said"Lay up not to yourselves treasures on Earth, and was sound business and magnificent spiritual advice."Or Seek ye first the Kingdom of god and His Justice and all these other things shall then be added unto you.But the wicked rich of all kinds that that all"the Bunk" till countless banks crashed, and billions of dollars worth of gilt edge securities vanished to air. The Grace of God alone endured, secure and stable, whether stocks rose or fell. "Vanities of Vanities, and all is vanity, save only to Love and Serve God.They say depression is driving the World back to God, in faith, hope, and humility..In Faith? There must be a world beyond this most unsatisfactorily one, and a Good God whose Laws cannot be flouted and whose presence cannot be ignored. Did the same God who sent flood and flames and plague to punish stiffnecked and wicked rebellious people send or permit the Abbieann disaster, which through its financinal loss has struck the world to its knees? No We are sure Glandelinia did that.If when we are forced to pile riches mountain high, build our cities and homes and universities and all structures as men have never before erected halls of learning, fashioned our business to colossal proportions, heaped luxuries and conveniences, and books of all kinds within the reach of all, and through their righteousness are doing all they can to fight the world Depression, and aid the stricken portion of Calverinia, when everything suddenly failed, is it not perhaps proof, that we have not here a lasting habitation"and that Christ was right, when He insisted that all this earth would pass away, but His Word would endure forever?

It seems as if the very world has failed us.To whom else can we go, save to Christ.For He alone has the words of eternal life.God alone remains for us. Christ alone is the rock on which our nation stands firm and unmoved, though the heavens fall, and the earth collapse under our feet."Pray always always"said the Savior. In so many nations prayer in time of foolish prosperity is rare if not at all. It would be interesting and sad for us too to discover how many said even a short prayer of gratitude when the world was riotous with wicked wealth and pleasure walked or rode the boulevards.But I believe it would not now be difficult to hear the voices of prayer lifted up in hope to God. "Give us this day our daily bread"I believe has now taken on a new meaning."Deliver us from evil has a deep significance.Man is on his knees now with a new sense of his dependence upon God. Proud man is slow to prayer.A man humbled, as every one has surely been humbled and as we ourselves have humbled our own selves all find themselves turning instic instinctively and gladly to God from whom comes all that is worth having. Of course, many never pray, in times od goodies and luxury, but they do when disaster sweeps. The depression has filled churches throughout the world, which had been almost empty before.Men there have time now for Mass and Holy Communion, even for the needed retreat.Novenas have ceased entirely to be a perfunctory routine and become a sincere cry from the heart of a needy world.Young men and women disillusioned by the misleading promises held out to them by the world, are turning to the security and calm certainities of priestly and religious life. Perhaps even the most consoling of all natural blessings Has been the glorious outpouring of charity throughout all nations that has marked the depression.Surely God and even His blessed Mother must and does smile with glad approval on His children for that.All the latent generiousity of the nations everywhere rose in a powerful surge, and the surface callousness that with time would have hardended the heart of the people of these nations broke in an our outpouring of gifts.Cities canvassed every citizen, who could give, states are developing large charity funds, neiborhoods are turning pityingly, toward their poor, and surely the poor with the grand camaraderie of poverty,gave out of their poverty for the support of all..

The whole world, and even we need the depression too, to show us all the inate goodness of our own hearts.We all needed the depression to teach every one of us the beautiful thing called Charity.Fighting through the depression untill the day when the norma normal currents of life flow once more will I suppose though in those nations still be two distinct groups of people. The first group, thoughtless, self ish, po proud, pouting over their lost "toys" and aching because of the pennies that slipped through their fingers, will come from the depression still blaming God, throwing their contemptous insults into the face of Heaven, a eager to follow the next misleading leader, and waiting only for the minute when they can rush back to the petty trifles that the depression snatched away.

The second group will come through it with a deepened realization and the full fact that they are God's spoiled children, who must be chat chastized as well as loved, punished as well as rewarded, treated sometimes with all the gentleness of the Sacred Heart, sometimes with the stern justice of an offended Father.They will know susan that even a catastrophe like this may be His own way of reminding that they are still His beloved wayward children.They will realize that though the days will find them poor, they still are not so poor as Christ and His Mother were at Bethlehem, at Nazareth on Calvary. They can realize they ought to and will offer up their privations and sufferings in union with the suffering Savior for the salvation of the world. They will be busy piling up for themselves the treasures of eternity, that know nothing of any collapse of stocks or devastating wars, and depressions and other great great catastrophes... And though the wicked world leaders run about in many silly circles mumbling vague promises, and bogus prophcies, they will remember always the power of simple prayer and offer that prayer humbly and hopefully to the Heavenly Father, who strikes only because He loves, and punishes only that He may save.They need not fear ,though poverty, unemployment surrounds them with want.God does not forget His children who trust in Him.In all great catastrophes the innocent suffer with the guilty, but with what a difference.The wicked and guilty only find in any catastrophe, the ugly blows of a cruel blind fate to be born sullenly, resentfully or wickedne wickedly, or increase their wickedness, they'll desire revenge on Heaven, and therefore be without merit.I The innocent see in the catastrophe their share in Calvary— and through Calvary, now as in another day, the world will be saved. .The results of our own disaster will bring its fruits by and by."

"Anything else which I wish to say"declared Susan if an experience which I went through this morning.It was just after break fast, and I was went into the pantry for a drink of water.The girl scouts Sarah and Lizzie were both there, and as I took a glass to fill it with water Sarah came up to me, and said something to me about Abbieann.I told her she was mistaken, and that paper said that Abbieann was not so really totally destroyed.She said she didn't care to hear about any new fangled ir ideas from foriegn men, and that if I or my father didn't believe anything about Abbieann why we should go there and see for ourselves.She declared the situation was still very disagreeable,and as I gave her the glass so she could get some water herself, she said the destruction in Central Calverinia was found to have been far more horrid than at first said, by all laborers, and all army officials and the like are pressing many prisoners at work in the restoration under guard. I told her I'd see papa and ask him what he thinks, and I said Glandelinia was a nasty thing. She then didn't say anything more---she never does you know--but just walked out of the pantry.I stayed to try and coax Lizzie to give me some better information but she wouldn't either, and when I told her that it couldn't be possible for so great a city, she just shrugged her shoulders and said in the most saddened way you can possibly imagine" You just wait till you ever take a trip to Abbieann with us Miss, and see if you'll have doubts then.We saw ourselves.I guess so won't have long to wait either, from the looks of things."I was so angry I wouldn't stay there any longer, but when I came to her later and asked my Governess Gladys what Lizzie and Sarah meant, she only said that little stranger girls like me shouldn't talk about or disagree about things with girlscouts that I don't understand, and that if I had seen as much of Abbieann's destruction as she had ly I would have more sense not to argue with them."Susan paused to note the effect of her story.Jennie was looking very grave, she took her little friends hand and squeezed it sympathically.

"Do you know anything about the destruction of Abbieann?"Susan inquired after a pause.

Jennie shook her head.

"I've seen only a small sector of it."she said,"But I didn't see the whole of it."But some of my sisters seen much more.Jack Evans, Walter Starring, and Gertrude Angeline has and can tell you all."

"If Glandelinia reallly did it, then that nation is very cruel."said Susan with a catch in her voice.."Oh Princess Jennie,I don't want to really hear that glandelinia really did such a wicked cruel thing—I don't I don't."And poor little Susan burst into a passion of tears.

Tender hearted Jennie Vivian was terribly distressed,she had both arms around her friend in a moment, and was kissing and soothing her as best as she could..

"Don't cry so Susan dear, please don't."she pleaded tears beginning to stream down her own cheeks."why you don't know yet even we don't know yet that it is really true.It may have been a freak of Nature you know, as Calverinia is a great Volcanic country, and Mt Calverine is only eighty miles northwest of Abbieann.And then too if your father says the disaster cannot be no big, and your papa is so good, and so fond of you,I don't believe he'd tell you anything if he wasn't sure it's true."

"He couldn't help it, ------oh he couldn't help it, he never was there, and therefore doesn't surely know"wailed Susan"The scientists never proved the real cause of the disaster, n they never can."208

"Every one of the girlscout leaders called "Bright EyedEd Mary" knows a lot of Abbieann, and she told me all about it what she said she saw. It was dreadful. he had three sisters of her own, a nd they are gone. She had been broken hearted for two months.she said her father and mother were very g ood, but they're gone too,—and—and—and—oh it was terrible."

"B ut I'm sure the disaster couldn't have gone as far as all that." urged Jennie."I don't believe the disaster itself is as bad as many inv "investigators say it was."

"I don't believe another d isaster c ould be any worse."said Susan mournfully"Oh Princess Jennie how lovely it would be if you and your sisters could go to Abbieann and take me along, and try once more to discover what made the disaster.You and your sisters are so nice and pretty, no one would try to interfere with you there, and if it was only an act of Nature then we could not need to be so unhappy."

Before Jennie could a nswer, some one turned the handle of the door. Jennie went to the door at the call of the guard and unlocked ut it. "What in the world are you two little girls doing with the door locked?"inquired a well known voice, and Walter Starring—an unusually bright color in his cheeks, and still wearing his uniform hat and jacket inhis excitement forgetting to take the hat off in their presence, came hurriedly in. He gave one glance at the two little solemn faces and then his manner changed, and he added in a different tone as he hung up his hat"

"Why what in the world is the matter////?"———Has anything happened.?"

"Susan is very unhappy"said Jennie solemnly...2.2.2.2q

"Unhappy? The poor little girlscout.Surely she will tell me all about it and perhaps I can help her."

Starring had hastily hung up his uniform jacket, and sitting down on the sofa between the two children, s he drew Susan to his side.At the sound of his sweet good natured symphatic voice, and the touch of the kind boys arm around her, susan broke down once more, and burying her face on Starring's shoulder began to cry aga in as if her heart would break..

"It'ssomething Lizzie one of the girlscouts said"she sobbed."she says she says—that—that Abbieann was—was reallly destroyed by the—the—Glande———Landelinians.."

There was a pause.Some of the bright color had gone out of Starrings facebut his arm had tightened about the quivering child, and when he spoke his voice though and low and not quite steady, was very kind...

"Would that really make you so very unhappy Susan, even if it were true?"

"Of course it would"said Susan lifting her head, and speaking rather indignantly."If Glandelinia did it, then she's a dreadful thing; I've heard all about what her armies under the Manleys do, and I knew some one who knew Manley and his generals well. Oh B oyscout don't you think you might be able to persuade some of the scientists to try and make a real discovery and she see whether Glandelinians reallly did do it—ask Jennie's sisters to go and find out themselves———— they like you so very 'm ch....""QQAASDFG

"I might try(pinch me inthe eye)"said Starring smiling"But perhaps it it wouldnit be of any use.Abbieann is quite a distance from here and takes twenty four hours to get there on the fustest train."

"Oh yes it would, I'm sure it would"said susan eagerly"that is it would if you could tell your elder sister y oice, that you'd come along with them, and if you would go too.Oh dear Walter Starring I and all the boy and girlscouts and even The Princesses love you so very much.If you'd only go there and I come too,I know I should be good, and I'd try to not give you any trouble like other foreigners may make a mistake and do, indeed I would."

Starring laughed, and all the pretty color came back into his cheeks.... "You funnily funny little girlscout. "he said kissing the flushed tear stained face"Supp ose Jennie's sisters were to say hetttu she would go there only one one condition, what would happen then?"

"what kind of a condition? " inquired Susan anxiously.

"The condition is that—that—"and now it was Starrings turn to hide his excited happy blushing face on Susans shoulder———"oh susan Don't you understand?The condition that Angeline Richee will be our guide.?"

For one moment Susan sat and stared in blank amazement, but Jennie Vivian, who was very shrewd and cunning, and who had caught the note of gladness in Starrings voice, had already grasped the situation and flung both arms around Starrings neck.

"Oh susan"she cried, half laughing and half crying"Don't you understand what he means."We are all going to go on that expedition, and it won't be a dangerous hard and difficult trip this time only the best and the most adventuresome one we have h ever made yet.and you are to come along for your first experiance in scout life.but We're to go on furlough not a military duty this time.Papa has left us off for a while.

"I Susan, are you not happy.?"

"Happy?"repeated Susan, still somewhat bewildered,"You mean that it is true—that you and your sisters are reallly going to Abbieann,—to find out this time if you and your sisters can solve the mystery...?"

Starring, who now had an arm around eachchild, and was hugging them both tight, only nodded.

"But you,and your sisters, are so young and pretty--and I thought such trips are dangerous.Oh Princess Jennie are you quite sure it is true."?

"It is absolutely quite sure."said Starring himself, kissing both."You will love us and your adopted country, won't you darling.The whole Country will try to be a good Mother to you, and you will then be living in the most beautiful and righteous nation onthe face of the earth."

Walter Starring got no further, for with a shriek of uncontrollable delight,susan had seized the boyscout chief leader in an embrace of such fervent enthusiasm, that he was for the moment rendered quite breathless. Ten minutes later, Starring and Jennie looking extremely happy, though Jennie's eyes were red, and with a little brave sister clinging to each hand or trotting along beside her, entered the reception room, where General Jack Evans, and also general Mansion were sitting together, engaged in earnest military conversation.At the sight of general Evans Susan halted, but violet and her sisters, sprung forward and each in turn, threw themselves impetuously into his arms.

"Oh Evans dear, Evans dear"cried Jennie, hl half smothering h im with kisses,"I'm so glad, so glad—I don't know what to do;I feel as if I'd like to fly,"

"And what has the little new girlscout Susan Farrol to say to me now?"said the great general, drawing the little girlscout to him after he had kissed Jennie, and her sisters and embraced them most heartily.. ..."Is she willing to have me for a big friend, and let me help Gertrude Angeline and her followers to take care of her.?"

"Yes indeed"said Susan, raising her face to be kissed."I can hear by the voice of violet,and her sisters that they are very very happy, and and of course that make me very very happy too... And how strange to think of you being a Guardian of us all."Continued Susan clapping her hands, and skipping about the room in the excess of her excitement and delight."why if all of us girls and boys serving in the army are to be all little soldier boys and girls, that will make Violet and her sisters my prince princesses too—oh —what fun, what fun." And she went off into peals of laughter, in which she was joined by all the others .

"There's just one difficulty in this matter"said general Evans, who did not look quite so radiant as the rest of the party, and as he spoke he slipped an arm about Jennie and Violet, who had left general Mansions side, and was now leaning lovingly, against the great generals knees."And that is concerning Gertrude and Mildred Manning. If you all go toward Abbieann you'll be compelled to leave them far behind here and with the regiment of scouts all gone, they may then be in bad straits and the enemy may get nervs enough to come in disguise and do them harm.Therefore is the regiments go along what's to be done about Gertrude and Mildred whom the surgeon says will be wooks yet before being well enough to come out of the hospital.I hope I'm not going to be asked to send out of here so many regiments, for I must just as well say in the beginning that Ishan't do it, and I cannot accompany any one to Abbieann, as Emperor Vivian gave me orders recently to forward myself to Big Girlknool as soon as possible as Manley and his Confederates are advancing that way with the strongest armies ever yet mustered."

A slight shadow crept over every face.

"As they are really the ones who have as much to say as their Father the Emperor,I think either one of the Princesses must decide that question herself"said general Mansion,"Though I am afraid there'll be a great deal of trouble to persuade The Princesses to give up any plan they set upon to do, and to ask them to give it will be resulting greatly in their disfavor. What do you say Princess Jennie?"

Jennie's only answer was to slip one hand into Evans, and the other into her sister's Catherine, for Catherine and her other sisters looking suddenly pale and troubled, had come quickly to her side as if unable to bear even the thought of a coming seperation.

"What to you say Jennie dear?"repeated general Mansion, looking anxiously at the child Princess,"Every one here wants to know you know"

"I couldn't leave my sisters"said Jennie slowly, but decidedly,"We have always been together, and I love them so, but I don't want to leave Evans either, for I and my sisters love him too.As for the Scouts, I had no intentionn and having any go with us, except Starring, Susan and Angeline Richee.The others must remain here untill Mildred and Gertrude are on duty again."

"Let's all go to Abbieann together."[illegible] Susan."The Princesses have rights and power to temporarily cancel Emperor Vivians orders and we can probably learn the mystery thilorthere.We can also communicate with Big Girlknool."

"Even invite me the "Terrible Jacksonia Evans?"Said the general laughing."I thought you were under the impression, that I was fonding of scaring little girls out of my grounds.?"

"Susan blushed.

"I never thought that."she said indignantly."You know I couldn't have been so silly.I was afraid of you only once ones, and I'm afraid I would be again, when you would mistake me for a Glandelinian girlscout for I heard how terrible you are to Glandelinians who snoop around your camps no matter who they are and what they be.But I found out how nice you reallly are... ....."

General Evans laughed again, and so did General Mansion, but Violet, and her sisters still looked troubled.

"I'll tell you something"exclaimed Walter Starring with a sudden inspiration,"I have thought of a solution of the difficulty.Tward Abbieann the only railroad line open is the Bondinia Culverinia or Mic-Hollester and Pandora as it is called.I met my great girlscout assistant Jennie Turmers sister Maud in the Company Street yer yesterday, and she told me that a train goes that way to morrow morning at nine sharp with a long line of cars filled with well armed soldiers.Another car for us alone can be attatched.Then we can all go together as Susan proposes, yet every one will have time to leave for Big Girlknool by the same trainroute if we get bad nnews from Big Girlknool, and we can then come back to try our quest after the trouble there is over."

"Good "Exclaimed General Jack Evans looking immensely relieved."I'll notify that railroad this very afternoon to have the car attacked to that particular train, and have an interview with the agent.So"

So the matter was settled, much to the satisfactory results for every one, and two minutes later after he was through telephoning Evans brought the delightful news, thatnthe coar coach he had asked for would be a special one forward for his purpose alone, that He and the Princesses would not need to wait for that train, but that an engine would be sent with the couch, and they could start on the road for Abbieann as soon as it arives.Susan jumped for joy when she heard the news,, and Violet,and her sisters were too happy for words.

"We couldn't abandonthat expedition, Joice even to please poor Evans" Jennie whispered.

"And I and my poor sisters couldn't have done it either my pet." was her sisters prompt reply."

"And so it is all settled"said the general li lifting Catherine onto his knee."And as General Mansion insists that Starrings plan is a good one we can--------"

They were interrupted by a loud pounding on the door outside by the hall entrance and a voice that sounded like Penrods shouting as at the top of his lungs;

"WHO EVER IS IN POSSESSION OF THIS HOUSE OPEN UP OR WE'LL BREAK THE DOOR DOWN. WE'VE GOT THE PLACE SURROUNDED AND YOU CANNOT ESCAPE."

Every one jumped on their feet and ran to the windows.

"that's wrong"Gasped Violet."The boy and girlscout Rangers about a hundred I believe have surrounded the house."

"OPEN TH IS DOOR I SAID" I WON'T TELL YOU AGAIN""

Violet ran out followed by her sisters into the hall, and were surprised to find the door barricaded by heavy implements thrown high and carefully against the door, and the door nailed shut with big spikes.

"Somethings"wrong."cried Susan.

"Let the scouts in by the windows"suggested Mansion."They don't know we're in here and probably think were spies."

Violet threw u open a hall window and locked out. One of the scouts gasped and called for Penrod who looked aghast at the sight of the Princesses.

"What's wrong she asked?"

"An enemy despatch bearer is hiding in your headquarters."He answered.

"Good gosh I didn't know you Princesses were here."

"Enemy dep despatch bearer?"

"yes."

"The door is too heavily barricaded to get it open even by a battering ram."said Joice."Well"ll open the windows and let your followers in."Then to Susan."We must ourselves round that man up.Youre a dangerous shot so you take the lead.We'll seach every room in this place.Funny he didn't come into my room."

Penrod said"I was leading my boys down a company street about nine oclock this afternoon, when there came the sound of a carbine shot,then another and another in quick succession.'I heade a bugle blow down in some woods.Tare followed more shots one after the other with with such rapidity that I could not count them.Then all was quiet. While I was wondering whether there had been a skirmish,I was startled by some one running along the side of the house, and suddenly stopping at the window.I urged my party on horseback for the house sounding the alarm with a pistol shot. The party of persuers then came up, Abyssinkilian soldiers, and they told me the man they persued had verbal dispatches for general Manley from Purgatorian.He rode through the christian lines with ten others accompanying him, but he was the only one who got through alive."

A throughout search of the house was made but the man was not there, having escape when hard pressed.But nevertheless he met his death. He had been escaping down a certain road nearly alongside the river when he came smack into a party of the Burrough girlscouts who had been at that time out riding on a free time lark. Seeing the gray uniform, and the wild speed speed with which he had been riding, they ordered him to surrender.When he saw the path closed by the girl soldiers he quickly turned the horse down a side road in a desperate attempt to escape, but he was too late.No one had ever escaped child scouts yet.A volley of long rifles of the child scouts did the work.The horse was killed under the Glandelinian soldier, and before he could rise to his feet, a bullet had pierced his head and heart.They searched him for despatches but found none he having destroyed them, in the basement of the Vivian Girls head quarters, the latter having found the pieces of paper and put them together. The despatch was a warning to general Manley not to advance toard Vivian Vivkey but to head for Kittens Pieckerts and stop General Concentinian Aronburg who was advancing for Little Girlknool on the Hiedi Creek..

The battle of Red Jose Junction.

Having reached the territory of Abbieann news came to them after they had alighted from the train of a great action at Heidi's Creek between Sesemann and Red Rose Junction.A large portion of general Manleys army headed by the "Hero of Lebanon "as we can scornfully call him general Clancy swept through the Heidi's Creek Valley, and forced a goodly portion of the christian army back across the stream. Heavenly creatures alone could describe the violence of that battle near Little Girlknool/.The storm of war broke fiercely and savagely there.It was reported that the mountains were echoed and reechoed with the sound of thousands of cannon, the noise of innumerable musketry, the strange noise of machine guns and gathling guns, and the hissing and crack of shells bursting in the air as frequently in sound as raindrops on a large roof.The Christian troops as they fell back across the stream had hurled curtain fire after curtain fire of shells at the Glandelinian army as it advanced.The battle was as fierce in that one day as the whole entire World War itself and immeasurably horrible. Every hill, field and plain seemed to either be on fire or in fierce volcanic eruption, long blue clouds of smoke hung along the base of hills, and innumerable tongues of flame had been said to have shot outfro out from the midst of the bluish smoke, and shells tore innumerable limbs from trees or splintered thousands and thousands of big trees altogether or burst admists great showers of dust and smoke in the fields.

The Abbieannian and Angelinian artillery rumbled along many roads and innumerable soldiers though under a severe fire were pulling down the fences in order to reach hills on which to plany their batteries.They heard that upon Alto's Pass, general Leonia Mildonia Picknell's cavarly were trying to hold back the Winkie Abyssinkilian. cavarly and a most stubborn and bloody cavarly fight had raged. One Glandelinian cavarly man was said to have by a witness to have rode through the fire of a christian battery, and saved the Glandelinian colors and the general.He had also carried an important verbal dispatch at night straight through the christian pickets and with them firing at him.It was claimed the sound of cannon had extended along also a portion of the Big Girl Knool Yellow Brick Road, proving that Manley and one of the christian generals were fighting near Lavillie picknen Village, and that as the morning went by the firing grew steadier and louder and louder, and sounded like distant thunder in an unceasing distant drum drum roll added by uneven rolling sounds which proved that volley after volley had also been added along lengths stretches of the battle lines.One of the christian officers was reported to have rode through the fire of batteries a hundred times during that battle, and had been countless thousands full dead or dying.

About nine oclock in the afternoon Violet and her sisters with Evans guman, Starvink, and Angeline Richee took up their headquarters in a half ruined farm house near one of the big explosion craters.Violet had just closed the blinds and lit an old lamp she had found, when there came from afar off across the crater, the sound of a rifle shot, then another and another, followed by a scattering fussilade. There followed more shots one after the other.Then all was quiet.

While they were wondering what had happened and questioning each other in awed whispers, Violet looking out of a window was startled by some one running along the wall outside of the farmhouse, and suddenly stopping at the door.There was a quick sharp rap at the door.For a moment Violet and her sisters were undecided what to do.If he was a foe, they'd quickly make him prisoner, but was a fugitive of Glandelinians.? A bugle sounded down by some stream.They understood the notes of the bugle.A Glandelinian bugle call.Then the fugitive was from them.The rapping became louder.

"Farmer, Farmer, please, open, open, open.In God's name let me in.The Glandelinians are after me."

The bugle shrilled at the gate.Violet with pistol in hand hurriedly sprang to the door and as the man came in she hurriedly closed the door.The fugitive was dressed in the gray uniform of the enemy.He stood looking amazed at the sight of one uniformed man, and the child scouts, and violet and her sisters, and then he said;

"Out with the light or we're all lost."

In a second the light was out, and they stood trembling in the dark, but with their pistols drawn.He put his hand on Evans sol shoulder, nodded pleasantly to the little girls and whispered;

"Sir look these over.You're a general I can see.The Glandelinian Omerinn cavarly are after me.I didn't think Glandelinians were in this territory.These are very important despatches for general Concentinian Arenburg whose army is marching for Big Girl Knocl.We rode through the lines of the Glandelinian army, five of us, the other four are dead."

At that moment a bugle sounded right in the garden, and there was a clatter of hoofs on the brick path down by the stable.They could hear men shouting, and calling to each other.Then followed a loud knocking on the front door.The fugitive heard it and he pressed Evans hand and addressing them all said softly;

"General, and your beautiful little girl friends here are good and next to Our Blessed Lord and His Mother my life and success of this trip for me depends upon you.You sir are disguised as a Glandelinian, but I believe I recognize you as general Evans.Go speak to the Glandelinians and try to hood wink them.If you don't succeed we'll have to fight for our very lives.There's probably fifty of them out there."

The knocking grew louder.Evans unbolted the door, and began to talk with a Glandelinian officer, while the fugitives and the children stole quietly to the basement, and there stood with pistol in their hands, wai waiting to see if the soldiers really knew the fugitive was in the old house.The first Glandelinians who would put his foot on the steps would die.By and by they heard the front door close.Violet quickly motioned to the fugitive, and the others down the hall, and stepped into the darkness of another room.The fugitive could see by the faint gleam of their pistols as it was pointed tward the door, then they waited.They could hear the old clock in the hall which they had set to going when first they took possession of the place, ticking, ticking the seconds away, and their very hearts seemed to keep time with it.

Then the bugle blew a quick sharp command.Through the open blinds they could see quite a squadrom of Glandelinians riding furiously away, and they knew the fugitive had been saved by Evans trickery. After a few minutes Violet pulled the curtain down, and lit the lamp.The despatch carrier looked at the children without saying a word and then he smiled and held out his hand shaking hands with them all.

"ell my good friends, they did push me hard, but my good horse was too much for them.The old horse saved me at the last moment when he took the wall at Crater No.Two and made straight for the shallows. I left him hidden in the willows beneath the wall of this place because we couldn't climb the bajk bank without being caught..Now will some of you kindly see if the road is clear.Some of those dirty skunks in gray may be prowpling about.I will meet you in a minute down by the stables."

Three of the Vivian Girls with Guman walked through the garden,

"ed around the stables, and went as far as down a part of the road.One of them climbed over the wall, and after a short search in the willows found the horse standing quietly. Everything was dark and silent from so much distant forest fire smoke in the sky.They led the horse up the bank and around the wall, and waited for the mans coming patiently.When he came he stood for several minutes looking at them, and the others, and then he shook hands with each.

"My dear friends good bye.I may never again meet you in this world. You have been kind faithful friends. Pray for me.Good bye friends.May God Bless you, and make your own adventure here whatever it be a wonderful success."

With that he sprang into the saddle and was gone...

"Since this scene is now over with in this great drama I'm going out right now to have a view of one of those explosion craters we were almost speaking about."said Starring.

"Which one do you mean?"sked Angeline Richee.

"The one Violet, and her sisters indicated to me early this morning."He answered.

"That great big one that looks like belonging to a volcano submerged into the level plain and surrounded by glens and forests."?

"Yes."Admitted Starring.

"Oh I know "said Jennie Farmer who also was with them, looking at Violet who nodded... ."But that one is so far away."

"Oh Posh Jen.We got fast horses and can get there in a short time. There are no Glandelinians around worth worrying about so why be apprehensive.The results of the Abb battle of Abbleann Ian Creek had cleared the region of most of them."

"But there are so many fierce forest fires raging that I feel nervous about it "explained Angeline Richee with a toss of her pretty head. "We can out step or out ride those blazes."Put in Violet."Of course no one is obliged to go if they don't want to.Starring and I and my sisters suggested going, but invited no body.Is not that true,?"

"Yes.But I do not like to go alone.There's no adventure that way. But if I have to go alone I'll do so.But I'm not the one to ask people to go anywhere where I am afraid to go myself.Angeline Richee I know would be willing to accompany me, and the Princesses with guman but you Jennie I'm afraid cannot go.Your duties to day here to guard our things in this house prevents that.One of us have to stay behind."

"I'm afraid so"said she reluctantly."But why not pospone it untill to morrow, when we can get some regiment of soldiers to camp here and guard our property.Then we can all go,."

"All right.That's a good plan."

The next morning arrived and also the regiment of soldiers sent for.As there however did not seem to be any enemies around, they didn't deem it possible or necessary to put on anybdisguises.Angeline Richee was glad she had been selected by Starring to go with them as a guide.

They could not tell what time it was when they really got up out of bed, but it was three hours after that before it began to get daylight, and their breakfast had been half an stttt hour before.Then they started off as soon as it grew lighter.But it was even further off than Starring or Violet, and her sisters had ever believed it to be, and when they finally got there, though their horses were fast endurable ones it was nearly noon.

It was indeed a huge depression torn in the ground, and whether it was that large or not, they estimated it to be about tqenty miles across and twenty four miles longer, and so full of water up to half way that it appeared like a filthy sunken lake.The inward slope was steep almost like a precipice precipice and was mostly of clay and earth, and at other parts it was slanty but also steep.While they stood there taking in the view of this huge blasted hole, they ate their noon day lunch.

"If an explosion reallly accomplished this, then it was reallly wonderful."said Starring."There's never a volcanic crater as large as this."

"It almost makes me feel as if it did happen from an underground volcanic eruption."said Violet looking at it critically.

"Yes and if it was, every nation in the world would think strange of us to fasten the blame on the enemy."declared Joice.

"I do no one did yet."added Angeline Vivian."She's suspected, but no one says Glandelinians did it."

"I wonder how deep it is."asked Jen Jennie Farmer.

"Go down to the bottom and find out."said Starring jokingly.

"You'll have to en excuse me I haven't no diving slut suit"she said hauntingly."If you bring me one I'll go down."

"Be about searching around for Volcanic debris."Said Angeline Richee, to violet,and her sisters."I and even you seven Princesses have often been around and within ever active volcanic craters and know such rocks."

"You are right, we have."said violet.

"All right"declared Starring."Let's do."

Their search though most illigent availed them nothing.There was not the aligh est slightest sign of any volcanic debris.All the debris found was of earth, clay, ordinary rocks, sand, mud gravel grass, turf, and limestone fragments and shattered remnants of trees and bushes and weeds. It was always proven by volcanic scientists that where volcanic eruptions of any kind, even from Mud volcanod volcanoes occured, volcanic debris absolue absoultely would be found, even if there was no outflow of lava. Starring climbed down the slanting part of the Abyss carefully to the water, and found the water cold, and muddy and even full of floating debris from houses furniture and the like proving the flood had filled the crater, and that it had partly drained through some underground source.

"What ever this convulsion was that destroyed Abbieann and so many other places and made the world record breaking b flood was no volcanic eruption."said Catherine Vivian most decidedly.

"I'd give anything for clues as to the real causes."said Daisy."I hope the Masses and Novenas we continually offered up will bring us success and the clues must be discovered for the good of the nation and the whole world."

What they would have seen had they looked more closely would have been been of great interest to them.It was a thick black covered eletric wire sticking partly out of the gravel and debris, but if they did observe it they may have thought it was something else or of no importance. Maybe they suspected it to be a tar covered rope. As it was also near to what had been left of a tree they no doubt might have mistook it for a long thin black root.Of course they were not close enough to observe what it really happened to be.They had spent a good part of the noon now resting, and taking in the scene of the great "Explosion Crater" and had made some considerable examination of the region without avail, and felt sure it was not a disaster created by Natives.

"What do you think of it?"asked all of the girls together in one breath of Walter.

"Whether there's any evidence of the disaster being an eruption or not not I believe I'll give it up.What's the use to trying to fin find out anything.If the scientists cannot discover anything how can we expect to.The recent floods which have receded by now has washed away all clues."

"I don't know whether it is worth trying or not any more"said Jennie Turner."Buthwe can leave the matter up to Jennie Vivian and her sisters, "The Darlings of the Nation.What do you say Jennie?"

There was some moments of silence, then Violet spoke for Jennie.

"It seems she believe believes that we must"she said"As we cannot discover a single thing.I must admit that it is our first failure.It may have been a natural disaster for all we know, and we might as well write it down into our Diary as such and have it declared so to all the world, and wash glandelinia of the blame or suspicion."

"But there's no pi positive evidence of that either."pclared Joice.

"How do you mean?"

"There's no lava, volcanic debris or any signs of an eruption, and all volcanic scientists said the same thing.whatever this is makes it the greatest mystery of all times."

"Yes"admitted Jennie vivian."But it comes to my mind now that even Volcanic eruptions can probably occur and not hurl forth volcanic debris."

"Impossible"said Starving."Where's there's volcanic eruptions, there's signs of it by the materials.Mud from volcanoes would give evidence of volcanic oder so would other substances even though there be no lava works rocks.And volcanic mud you you know is not true earth mud, sand, or slime, but ashes made wet by water or rain."

"But are we sure we know all the voncal volcanic debris there is?" asked Hettie.

"How do you mean?"

"Earth rubbish has really also erupted in volcanic eruptions.You've read of the eruption of Mt Pelee that destroyed St Pierre and fourty thousand people far away on the island of St Martonque."

"But such peculiar craters." insisted Daisy.

"Yes I understand.They are in level plains, there has been so far as we can see no cones raised, and the effects seemed to have form these big depressions here, and they've not cresent in shape like volcanic craters are."

"What's the use of arguing about it"said Catherine."I'll guarantee they're meteoric tions, but whatever they came from they came.Come let's play a game of tag or something for a while.There's plenty of hiding places and we got plenty of time.Then to morrow we'll return but to Pig girl Knowl.Evans wants us to go there to help the [illegible] there....."""

"You'll be [illegible]"asked Starring.

"I will"""said Jennie....

The game progressed for quite a while with considerable excitement Will I came Starrings turn to try and catch Jennie.And she sure was in good manner.That supposed to be root was close to the craters edge. Jennie despite the fact that she was running fast had seen it in time and jumped it, and Starring was close behind her almost at her very heels.Both Jennie and Violet screamed"Look out for that tree root" but though Starring did see it at that instant it was too late, his foot caught under it, and tro tripped him and he crashed into Jennie's back head first, and both were precipitated headlong into the crater,Starring just barely missing falling on top of her in the water as they both landed simultaneously, and were floundering in the muddy water.Starrings foot had drawn the wire a great length out from under the debris. Jennie sputtering, sank once from the speed of the fall and coming to the surface swam to the slope and between gasps cried;

"Don't mind us------We're all right----- we can get up ----again--our selves------go see---go see---what---hit--Starring tripped on---hes foot pulled-----pulled--it---it---up.It's looking to---m---like a wire,---it's too long to be the root of a tree---to narrow-- go see."

"Where is it where he tripped?"Jennie Turner yelled down for the distance was considerable about more than a h undred feet.

"Close to by what is left of ----that---popular ---tree...."""BeSAQA

"Poplar tree?"

"Yes"thundered Starring to make himself heard for the distance down, already half way out of the water.

"All right we'll investigate"cried Violet herself, and Starring looked up to see the edge lined up with the beautiful children.

"Do you need help"Angeline Richee bawled down.

"No I guess we can get up alone."yelled Jennie.

After they had been up one quarter of the way Jennie asked;

"What in the world did you do to yourself Walter.Skin your hand and left arm in your fall.You're sleeve is red with b lood."

"Yes confound it. And my foot is badly wrenched.I'tll be luck, if I can walk at all."

"And you gave me an awful bang in the back with your head"she said.

"I'm surprised you didn't see that wire."

"I did confound it but not quick enough to stop."he complained."Ouh my foot sure feels as if its broken.If that is a wire and belonged to mining engineers of Glandelinia, a number of Glandelinians whether they put it there or not is going to pay dearly for the injury to your buoy, and my foot."

They reached the upper edge of the crater after twenty five minutes laborous climbing, and Starring found he could walk, but not without a bad limp.His arm pained the most, and to that he attended to immediately and found he had torn a lot of skin off deep.

"It's a long thick eletric wire, embedded in the earth debris"said Violet to Starring as she herself bandaged his wrist, hand and arm."I believe in tripping you pulled up more than a hundred feet of it."

"An eletric wire!Are you sure."

"Positive"exclaimed Violet."But we did not touch it.We left it as it was for you to see.I'm wondering how long it is."

Starring limped painfully up to it, and examined it carefully.He b believed that about one hundred and sixty yards of the wire had been pulled out from under the earth debris which was soft, and as he pulled forward on it and saw more come sliding forward he felt sure a great length of it still remained under neath.He first took care of the injury of his foot to see whether it was only a sprain or broken and finding only that it had recieved a bad wrench but, he got onto a horse brought to him, and lifting up as much of the wire as he could as ge was helped to mount the horse the continued releasing the wire first tard tward the crater.He pulled it up and found it circled a portion of the great depression, and continued on untill he reached another verge of it where the wire abruptly ended as if cut away by the blast.

"Maybe after all it may be a fallen trolly wire, or tape telephone wire"suggested Jennie Turner."And besides I can see from the poles still standing even though broken that a trolly country car tracks ran through here here."

"Cud'll be possible"said Angelina Richee handling the wire.Jennie looked carefully at the wire, and so did everybody else.They observed that it was too thin to be a telephone or a telegraph wire, and had no cross wire connections to be a trolly wire.

"I g it ain"she finally admitted.."It's a different kindaltogether.Suppose we follow it in the othe r direction.I wonder what we will discover.?"

They followed the wire on horseback, Starring always drawning more and more up. And the more further they went, the longer it was until they began to believe it was made to be endless entirely.

"Why not take a trip around the world several times seeking the end of this wire?"suggested Angeline Richee.

"Yes why not???""added St Starring..

"Maybe it creates itself as we go along."Declared Jennie Turner.

"Wev'e gone seven hundred yards, and we're still going said Violet."We ought to have wound it around on a big spool as we went along?"

"Why?"demanded Starring.

"Because it would take longer and delay us."she answered.

"Who would carry the big spoo spool?"asked Joice.

"I would if I'm Hercules or Atlas."answered Angeline Richee.

They still contin ued to follow it along, finding as they traveled that it lead somewhat southeastward tward Abbleann.For a time as they rested. their horses they believed after all that it must be a new kind of fallen troyy trolly wire for why should it be so long.They now had traveled four miles and a half or more, and it had kept coming up. They didn't give it up however, and finally after several hours more of this sort of travel they came to where the wire stopped coming up, and resisted the pull of all very successfully.But they almost pulled something over in a sort of mount or small hill of debris and gravel.

"I wonder what that is"declared Starring.

"Let's go and see."sugg ested Violet.

They dismounted from their horses almost at one time as if on drill, and went for the spot at once.It didn't take long to uncover it, the earth earth covering proving to be the debris from the blast having fallen deeply even this far for the mound was not made by human hands and was six feet high.By digging with broken fragments of boards found in the pile, they soon unearthed a gigantic automatically worked battery. It had in back of it a certain sort of clock work which ran as a clock, and which by the time hands could be sent to run and stop at any given hour indicated to send an eletric current of powerful voltage enough to kill a man throughthe wire.

"Why this is suspicious indeed."said Starring excitedly."Why's works on Why it works on 25,000 voltage.guch a battery."

"Look"said Jennie Turner ."That wire on its rear. "It's connected with another wire up there, that Trolly wire."

"Where?"

"On that other car line there not injured bythe disaster."

They all looked and observed it was true.

"What is the battery, asked every one of the others in a chatte ch orus.

Starring looked at it closely for there was some wording i wording on it.Susan herself could not read the words though she was able to speak. the language but Starring exclaimed;

"It's a time set detonator.It says all you need to do is push back the hand the big hand an hour or so before the time you wush to the the blasting to be done, and when the hand works forward to the desired time it'll stop going, and the eletric then goes through the wire.Why it's even got",ttttttttttt Manufactured in Vainity Fairy City.Glandelinia..Glandelinia Province No One."

"It sure has "said Jennie.

They all observed the words printed on a small sheet iron placecard elvated on the battery.They began to feel positive now with great appreshension that the Glandelinian authorities were at the bottom of the whole disaster, for otherwise what would this battery, and the eighteen mile long wire be doing here..

"What shall we do about this discovery?"asked Starring."Ism I I'm a powerful fellow to tell the truth, nearly as Strong as Jack Evans but I don't believe I and him could lift it together.But We'll try eh Evans?"

He nodded and they both set to work.Maybe in this story Evans may be the strongest man in the world, but both of them couldn't even move the hure battery it was so big and heavy.

"If we leave it here"said Evans we'll have no proof of our discovery.

"What the heck shall we do."?

"I know the best thing that can be done."declared Violet."I'll go and bring a number of our generals of the army stationed in this town here to see for themselves.They can get lots of men to move it by ropes or by a dirreck then.The rest remain here.In case you might be attacked, we'll come back with a strong force of cavarly."

And she mounted her horse, and rode off at a gallop. She was gone an immensely long time, in fact they feared she might have lost her way, met an accident or was captured by an enemy patrol, but fortunately no Glandelinian soldiers appeared in sight, and the only visitors they had was several curious country children who looked at them with interest, and gazed curiously at the big battery and the wire, and asked what they were going to do.Jennie Turner told them they were going to take it to the christian army.Finally Violet returned with General Aronburg, a numberof other generals, and a strong squadron of cavarly, and a number of men with powerful ropes and a big wagon pulled by fifteen horses..

"I see you were not molested"said violet. as she dismounted.

"I see you were not molested."said Violet as she dismounted from her horse.

"No Glandelinians ever came in sight."said Angeline Richee.."I don't believe there is any in sight.."

At Violet's direction, the general and his officers went to the battery, and gave it a critical examination at every part.

"Where does the wire start from?"asked the general /

"From one of the craters eighteen miles and three quarters from here?" answered Angeline Richee.

He looked at her like a man would who knew his childwas telling him a lie.

"You say the wire is eighteen miles long."He finally gasped.

"Yes sir "put in Jennie Turner curtly."She is right in what she says, and what do you expect orcan you expect of Glandelinian engineers who wants to make sure their work issafe for themselves regardless of how many christian lives of women and children their diabolical explosion may wiped out."

He so looked at his officers, and they looked at him.It seemed to them as if they were seeing ghosts.

"Well have to bring all this in"he finally said."But we'll have to to bring up an army derrick and work on it to get the blamed hure battery into one of the wagons providing it is not heavy enough to to through the wagon floor."You sir Your Excellency General Evans that you and Starring strong as you two are couldn't even budge it," ?

"That's so general.I wish it transported as soon as possible, but if it is so heavy i I doubt if any wagon will hold that thing.It might break through the floor."

"Well try it anyhow anyhow sir?"

Evans advised general Aronburg to command a large number of men to scatter, and with picks, spades axes, and shovels and other tools to dig and tear around to examine as much territory as possible for other clues, then general Evans himself, took out his paper tablet, and marked down the size of the battery, where it was made, its voltage, how it worked, and other indications.

"Emperor Vivian your father must see this."said Evans to Violet.

"He'll be interested I know."

"You bet he will and how."said general Aronburg.

After this it took nearly two days and considerable labor to roll up that long wire on a sort of electric wire spool obtained for the purpose, and bring it and the battery to the camp in a strong motor truck.Some of general Aronburgs generals were quite skeptical about the find thinking that some one might have left them there as a lark or joke, and that the battery was a fake and not a live one..The proof of the length of the wire however by an eptttttttt Eletrician which was found to be over nineteen miles, and the examination of the battery and a test of its powers in exploding dynimite finally convinced them of the fact that the find was a most important one.They were a dumfounded and greatly scared by this.But then some others feared it might be a trick to throw the investigators off the track.

"If it is"said Violet."They surely wasted lots of time, money and labor to fool us with such a long wire, and expensive battery.I positively believe the explosion failedyto cover it up deeply enough or otherwise we would never discover it.The fact that Starring found the wire by his accident which has really laid him up in the hospital for both his arm and leg proves the wire was there.Therefore I cannot see how it could be a trick to throw us off the true clues.If it's a trick, then the joker surely went to some awful big labor and expel expense."

"You are right sister Dear."exclaimed Joice."They wouldn't pay the expense and take the time and labor to fool us with a nineteen mile wire, and leave such a good expensive battery behind."

"Did the scientists say the battery was any good?"?..?..!.Asked one of the generals.

"The battery is in splendid condition."answered Jennie.
"Then you sure did make a good discover, and have caused it to be known that Nature was not cruel of its own self upon poor Calverinia.We will for your sakes then at your command and desire make further investigations.If there was this one clue, there surely is others."

THE OTHER DISCOVERY,. THE MINE...

The morning after the wire and battery had been brought into camp they through another accident made another and more important discovery, which proved without the slightest doubt that Glandelinia was reallly guilty of the disaster.On searching further that is only three of the the Vivian girls, the ground beneath their feet suddenly gave way and precipitated them none too gently upon a sort of tunnel under a rock in a glen some distance from the crater.The shape of the tunnel showed it had been made by laborers and not by nature.

After recovering from the shock of their fall, they investigated the tunnel.In the tunnel, a little nearer the explosion crater, was a large cave, about five hundred yards in extent and its ceiling about fifty feet up, but heavily boarded up on all sides and the ceiling like a strongly made room without the wall plaster.In that cave which examination also showed by formed by laborers and not by nature, was an immeasurably large stored of high explosives of the most dangerous kind.Jennie sent Violet for the scientists and others while she and Angeline remained to examine everything. Some officers came wity with these scientists followed by Jennie Turmer Angeline Richee, Susan and the other Princesses and Evans too.

"This is some find indeed"declared one of the scientists nodding.
"Yes said the other. "The contents are not marked on the boxes but I can tell by these"and he held out some of the arm length green colored sticks"Are T.N.T and gun cotton, besides Nitric Glycerene and dynimite. There's enough here to cause a "Believed volcanic out burst.We have to be careful in handling these however.They might explode by falling."

The greatest surprise and horror of all was that there had been found so much high explosives of every variety in that huge cave that it took ten thousand men with wagons and trucks nine days to bring it all into camp to be examined.By having it all carefully weighted by box weight, it was estimated by the figures added up, that there had been 10,000,000 pounds of explosives in that huge cave.

An electric wire similar to the one that tripped Starring and finally sent him to the hospital tent, had been found attatched and connected with a battery similiar to the one found before, but not quite so big and heavy but containing the same voltage, but the wire had been bent, or for some reason unknown to the scientists had failed to electricify the mine and cause an ex extra explosion. The battery was examined for defects but none were found, and therefore the wire was investigated.It had a default, th that proved the reason why that big underground mine failed to be detonated.

Violet and her sisters were quite scared at thisbig find and yet it was evident that it was only one third of what had made the vast crater half a mile beyond.Most of the advertizing papers on the boxes of explosives had been torn off, but detectives who know how to detect things found evidence through their own detective appliances that all these boxes had been stolen from some Calverinian munition plant.Several munition works in various cities had reported great robberies of their explosives in the days before the great disaster.One box was found to have been from a munition works in Pandora Calverinia. They therefore know now, glandelinia had been responsible for all this, but how long had they been at all the worst work and danger and work too, to do this, and to do it so secretly without detection.

They knew they couldn't have performed this in a short time with even any great number of men.But though this work may have taken the enemy probably over a year with an immense army of workers, machinery and derricks and so forth it was not worth while to try to solve.The most interesting part was to find glandelinia guilty, and capture the ones who did all the work in person, so they were the greatest bloodiest and most wholesale murderers on all record in the world, and the greatest vandals too.And now it was positively evident that the craters were not formed by any volcanic eruptions.Violet and her sisters had notified the generals not to say a thing of discovery to the army of men untill Emperor Vivian knew of it, and the soldiers who had also worked in bring the things into camp were ordered to keep silent on the discovery under any conditions untill further notice.

"How in the world did we have the good luck to come across these witnesses?"asked Angeline Richee."But directed Starring to trip himself on that wire.?"

"Don't you remember?"demanded Violet with a smile."didn't we all make offerings to have High Masses sung for our success at discovery, and didn't we attend as many of those High Masses as we could, and said many Rosaries and other long prayers with the greatest devotion we could assume.?"

"Why yes but I forgot we made the offerings.Our prayers and Masses were answered then.There are no prayers that are not answered if it's worthy and for your good."

"And we must not forget prayers and Masses for Thanksgivings."said Jennie surmor.

"What's already paid for"said Joice.The first Masses were sung this morning.They were those we attended."

"Goodie.Goodie."""

Later on the closest investigation of the whole territory by labor of diggers was now made by thousands of men for more clues to discover and discoveries came fast.Old ragged Glandelinian uniforms were found. A torn up letter belonging to general Manley was found but it was too fadded to be read.A big round mine was found in a underground pit which could have been exploded by an eletric shock.A wagon buried deep in earth debris and mud was found full of digging tools, working uniforms and engineering tools, one battery, old working clothes covered with grease and oil, a role of wire similiar again to what Starring tripped on, a plan of the whole territory, a written statement telling the size of Abbieann and its population, and some old geographical books.There were many other descoveries too many to be relae related here, which proved that Glandelinia was the "CREATOR OF THE """ABBIEANN HORROR""".

"I'm positive now with out the slightest doubts that Glandelinia is guilty"declared violet with a pout...

"I too."said Joice..

"We'll notify Father" said both Angeline and Jennie together.

"Let's hold a council about this situation."declared Catherine.

All the others agreed to do so and especilly on what to do next.To get the evidence through to Emperor Vivians army seemed an impossibility and they wished to have the Emperor and all his royal Officias and even up Bishops and the like to see the evidence.The council was held late that afternoon. It was like a meeting.Angeline Richee was was chosen president, Jennie Turmer was chosen the "Objective" and the Vivian Girls were judges.. The meeting as is always the case was open with prayer, the Litany following the Our Father and Hail Marys and Glory be,s. They first reported their finds and commented upon them.Starring was present too he having been brought on a wheelchair. Jennie Vivian reported that the find really was accomplished by Starring tripping accidentally on the wire, and ending with the report that she and her sisters heartilly regretted that it had to come out so bad to Starring for such a reward, but he declared that he's be willing to suffer anything to see Glandelinia's wicked guilt exposed to the whole world.. Then Angeline Richee popped the first question . She asked; "Shall we write a noitce of the find to Your Father first, or shall we give the news to the Angelinia Abathia News Paper war Correspondents or newspaper man."?

"Some were for giving to a reg newspaper reporter, but the majority were for Emperor Vivian at Vivian Wicksy seige lines.The motion was seconded, and carried and Emperor Vivian was the man.... . . .Decided Joice was elected to selected to send the message, by secret wireless.

It was also seconded to send the news to Abbieannia, and circulate it throughout the world. to let all nations know what sort of a nation Abbieannia had to contend with.Violet, and her sisters however were not fearful, proud, or elated with the finding of the many tttts. clues.. They were not ever charigned or angry.They were frightened. This proved that Glandelinia was exceedingly dangerous, more wild indestructiveness than all the elementsthe world had been combined into one since its creation.They were terrified, even though they did not show it.If something wasn't done to curb Glandelinia, Calverinia State and her neighborhood provinces would be no more.They knew too that Glandelinian would go to any dastardly means to win the war.They also felt more apprehensive for there was danger that Glandelinia would do something worse in the future, and too they themselves that is Violet and her sisters would be in greater danger if the Glandelinian generals knew they had discovered the guilt of Glandelinia.Glandelinians would bent their greatest exertions to prevent the clues from being reported throughout the world. Therefore they must act and pretend as if nothing was known untill Emperor Vivian learned of it himself.And something must be done to prevent Glandelinia doing anything dradful in the future.Joice at once by code sent a message to Emperor Vivian, while Jennie Turmer was engaged sent a message to Emperor Vivian, while jennie Turmer was engaged a war correspondent found in the army and supplied him to secretly have the news sent to newspaper and other writers throughout Abbieannia, and other states to arouse the nation.Hmmm.

Everything that was necessary was accomplished. A map was made of the spot., were all the evidences were found, copies made and sent to be circulated throughout the world:. Starring wrote this report to have it published. It ran as follows;

"To the world in general;

The supposed Volcanic Eruptions, that destroyed Abbieann, and other cities throughout Calverinia by concussion, and caused almost simultaneous country wide floods, and record breaking loss of lives, and property destruction ammounting to thousands of billions of dollars, as had been investigated so continuously and desperately, that at last the evidence of the true facts have been discovered, and proved without the slightest doubts.The Craters one hundred and fourty nine of them have been torn in a wide expanse of country by hude mines set in the ground, the explosion quanity of which never will be known.Only over 10,000,000 pounds of the explosive explosives that failed to be detonated, have been found.100 eletric batteries have been unearthed under the explosion debris, and one thousand miles of eletric wire f connected to each in a net work.Glandelinia is proven responsible though what her purpose is for creating such a huge calamity has not yet been brought to light.Clandelinia though means to carry on a war of huge destruction the like of which has never been heard of or ever seen before. The thought of the disasters being of Volcanic origin can now be a thing of the past. e can announce the guilt of Glandelinia in every certain made of mistory.Though poor Calverinia is prostrated by the awful disaster, means is being found to bring her to her feet again restoration is onthe way and with the rising of Abbieannia by the. news we hope to obtain enough armies coming through Calverinia to crush Glandelinia.I will not put my name on this announcement as Glandelinia must not know who the real discoveries are from. Signed,

Abbieannian investigators and scientists."QQAAZ"

"Hello Jennie Turmer.what to ride to general Aronburgs headquarters with me.I'm going to bring Mildred Mance home.she's been wounded by an enemy picket while she was out scouting. "

"Certainly Violet dear,I'll go along.Do you expect they'll bring Mildred on the wagon train."

Her captian of the Firefly scouts notified me they would send her to her tent on that if they can get her away from the danger zone indected.The girlscout captian said everything was in such a state of excitement since we discovered the guilt of Glandelinia by uncovering the clues it was impossible to try to go anywhere for the enemy. know it too and are now very dangerous."

"I suppose that is true."eturned Jennie Turmer, as she mounted her horse, and rode beside her Princess Violet. My own father wrote me by telegraph that it looked as if something terrible must come after all .that a shame that the Glandelinians couldn't fight a war without creating such a dreadful disaster."

"Glandelinia could but she doesn't want to give the Calverinias an Calverinians a chance."Burst out Violet as she urged the horse down the road at a swift gallop."The whole trouble is the Glandelinians don't care what they do as long as they win the war, and we won't have it so."

"I suspected Abbieann s destruction was Glandelinia's work.Lake Calicia's flood was her making and for that I thought the trouble was at Abbieann for the same cause."

"Well you can put it that way if you want to.The Glandelinians have excellent leaders, and think they have a right to carry on a war in any way they please."

"I don't know if they'll ever win in anything that way.When the final restoration comes we have got to help or have help to do it and we could make lots of glandelinian prisoners work there."

"I don't know about that.As the Glandelinians stole all the children they had made slaves, and believe they have a right to do with them as they please,I reckon we have a right to work the enemy prisoners to make them help restore all the damage that their comrades have done in the making of the disaster.But even then the Glandelinians who are put to work ain't worth their salt."

"That may be true.Still I don't believe any human being let alone a little foreign child ought to be a slave--it's barbarous."

"There's another thing"added Violet."More than four months ago I had suspected the Glandelinians had discarded all their slaves, but do you know what I myself discovered what they did.Put most of the child slaves at work, under armed guard to help the men form those mines that wrecked Abbieann.Rescued child slaves told me that.Now we will have to look out as those glandelinians will want the worst way to stop us from getting information as to the disaster to emperor Vivian."

"I don't believe they can do that exactly"Violet."I don't think they can stop even the extension of the slavery."

"It seems as if they are trying to stop the very same thing."

"But they can't persecute you and your sisters for that."

"I say they can.The Glandelinians will try their level best to capture or kill us now--but we won't have it, we won't let them do it, Angeline Riches says so, and general Evans, and all of them--and they ought to know.They may even attack Concentinian Aronburgs army here to get us.To prevent anything happening we advised Evans to take chief command of the whole christian army here."

The words were spoken with great emphasis, and as she spoke the Vivian girl Princess, glance defiantly in the direction of the Glandelinian army under whom she had not learned yet.

"How hot headed you do get against the enemy now, violet.I trust you you are not expecting a battle bi battle over our discovery.That would do the Glandelinians no good."

"No, but they'll attack I believe to try and get me and my sisters. General Aronburg will fight like fury if he is called on to fight.I believe we all ought to stick up for each other stronger now than ever.couldn't you fight for the sake of poor Abbieann and her sister cities."

"Certainly. But the enemy army confronting general Aronburg, is immense strongly equipped and am in strong positions.If a battle occurs here which may afterwards then be called I suppose the "Battle of Abbieann" it will be a bloody savage struggle. Great numbers will fall, probably greater numbers than in any battle of the past."

Violet, drew a long breath, and urged her horse forward a little faster.

"This thing has been brewing ever since Starring discovered the wire by his fall. when he accidentally knocked knocked Jessie Jennie into the water and went in with her.Emperor Vivian and his followers have tried their best to straighten matters out on the discovery, and the glandelinians know we ourselves are here, far away from our regiments of child scouts whom they fear, and if they do come at us and catch us off our guard it will be the fault of I and my sisters for being so foolish as not to think of having them all come with us after all."

"I think you are greatly mistaken."was Jennie Turmers quiet but firm answer."It would have been more dangerous to bring so many along with us. And however"went on Jennie Turmer, as she saw Violet's face darken,"It is not too late.Let's send for them and have them come here.Penrod and Groveton knows how to get here the paths are well familiar for them."

"Oh I'm not making this a personal affair for them."was the hasty response."I wouldn't them to come here now for a good deal.That would increase the enemys suspicion.But hand it all, I wish we had brought them before on the train."

"And I wish we had myself "laughed Jennie Turmer."We're as bad off now as the mice who is watched by the cat.But I tell you one thing" Jennie Turmer went on gravely."I'll never stand for having our Glorious Abbieann, and other holy Calverinian cities and towns, and others wiped out by flood, and all Eastern and Extreme Western Calverinia so dreadfully devastated and burned out by these big forest fires.Out forfathers fought to hard against other enemies to allow anything like that to happen."

"Well it's a dreadful shame in more ways than a million Jennie. Our discovery and its results will learn glandelinia to keep from making such disasters in the future if she want's any quarter in this war which probably she won't recieve now if pope decides--must learn to leave our Calverinian cities alone."said violet with as much spirit as before, and now the road became so rought from debris that it made further conversation just then impossible..

The christian army under general Concentinian Aronburg ma lay in a position near the southern sector of devastated Abbieann, at a point where the Pengall State was bounded by the Mullencatt State by a stretch of less than twenty miles.It was the most immense christian or Angelinian Army yet ever mobilized, and it had batteries of various artillery of no mean proportions. General Concentinian gronburg had advanced into the Abbieann Territory from the territory of Jennie Turner City some fifteen weeks before, and he was in consequence prepared for any move the Glandelinian army now confronting him would make. He knew that the Glandelinian army was under the personal command of general Andrew Arlington, and his army was one of the oldest and most well trained of many a Glandelinian army ever mustered. General Arlington had fought with Manley during the earlier part of the war, and had followed him in his campaigns.The generals son George Arlington had lost a leg at the memorable battle of Trinoque or Evange line St Claire..The position of the Glandelinian army was very extencive and strong.Jennie Turner early this morning had gone off alone to see what the enemy was up to.She had wanted some of the Vivian Girls to go with her, but some of the boy and girlscouts of the Fire Fly Regiments were wounded in some sort of dangerous adventure recently with a party of Glandelinian horsemen, and violet would not permit any of her sisters to go anywhere just then, and they had to remain behind to give advice concerning the regiments.Jennie Turner had then been spotted and fired at, but in her easy escapade she had shot several Glandelinians down.She had then been standing near the highway, reloading her pistol, when Violet came along and invited her to take the ride to the camp where Mildred Nance lay wounded to take her home to her own head quarters barracks where she could be properly taken care off.

That a big battle threatened even on the scene of such a big disaster a few months before there could be no doubt.For many weeks all Abbieannian Scientists had worked desperately hard over the disaster mystery, and over the equally important question of how it came about, and a settlement had been further off than ever untill Starrings accident had caused the discovery.Since then the leaders of Angelinia State which had recieved the news had actually called a convention for thepurpose of deciding whether or not Glandelinia should be recieving quarter.That convention was to have met at Big Girlknool but as that city and its territory was threatened by the most immense Glandelinian army ever formed yet, und as a portion was entrenched at Marie Ornmann town the convention was removed to Angelinia Agathia, to deliberate there behind closed doors.And while this was going on, Abbieann ian statesmsmen andpoliticians at Pandora Calverinia, and elsewhere were plotting to do something to Glandelinia that would terrifyin it not shock the world, whenever the favorable oportunity arived.

"Look Princess something is up." cried Jennie as they rode up the main company street of the encampments."See what an excited crowd of soldiers there us at the Signal Station... . ."

"Hurrahhurrah for Calverinia."was the sudden cry which reached,,, their ears."She's the state to stand the test before the whole world. Hurrah and may gullent Angelinia Province and Bengall State soon follow her."

"What What is it colonel Andrews?"cried Violet as she drew rein in front of the signal tower."That's all the shouting about.!!!!!!"

"Did you not hear the news///? Princess Violet."Calverinia State is to be glorified by the orders of Emperor Vivian your father because she stood the test in the face of the whole world, and held firm in spite all Glandelinia did to her.They're now having the greatest jubilication ever heard of down there.Won't be long before Angelinia State will follow them I reckoen."added the officer.

"But the enemy know everything.?put in one officer.

"The enemy knows everything !"repeated Jennie Turner."Oh that's too bad."

"Bad, did you not say bad."interrupted a tall foriegn looking man who stood by, whittling a tree branch with his jackknife."I reckon you don't know very much about it girlscout.Why it's just the best all fired news I have ever heard of for years.It'll make a great war out of this conflict now."

"That is where our opinions differ."answered Jennie Turner coldly. "In fact I don't see how the enemy can learn of anything, unless spies are work everywhere within our lines."

"You don't eh.Say ain't you just a bit hot headed on the question now."and the foriegner squinted one eye suggestively.

"I am standing up for rightful means if that is what you mean." "Thought so.And you don't agree with me.Think my ideas about child slavery and such a in't no account."

"That is up to the Abbieannina aurthorities to decide."

"Well"the foriegner paused long enough to transfer a piece of cracker and cheese to his mouth"All I got to say is we foriegners ain't getting on our knees to save this Infernal Christian country so there!"

"You who are a foriegner ought to be ashamed to speak of our holy Nation as an infernal one"burst out Jennie Turner."Our country is the greatest and grandest on this globe, and I for one will help uphold it to the last.If you say any more such remakrs I'll order you under arrest."

"Oh don't talk so much Jennie."put in Violet with a swift rush of blood to her face."The crowd of refugees around here is exceedingly excited and there are some here that I don't like the looks of.It is best to be careful what you say just now."

"But that foriegn Englishman called our country an infernal one—"

"Don't pay any attention to him.I know him and he is going to be deported soon as an undesirable.His name is Jack something, and he never did a stroke of honest work in his life, and once when he thought couldn't understand his language he swore and cursed to Himself some thing awful.I hit him across the face with my riding whip and he's been afraid of me ever since." Here comes a wagon train. Let's go over and meet Mildred Nance, and see what she has to say. She has been discharged from the base hospital yesterday.?"

Leaving their horses tied to a near by tree, and placing guards to watch the horse, the beaut two beautiful little girls made their way through the crowd,, to the edge of the signal station platform.Soon the wagon train rolled in pulled by four magnificent horses for each covered wagon, and the first one to appear in sight assisted by a soldier was the firefly girlscout Mildred Nance.

"What's the latest from the hospital,Mildred"cried half a dozen voice and in a twinkling the girlscout was surrounded, so that Violet and Jennie could scarcely reach him.

"Some one discovered that the Abbieann disaster is the fault of the enemy and that is causing Calverinia to be glorified"that's the main news——"began Mildred.

"Yes,yes we know that.But what do they all say in the center of our great army here."

"Most of the soldiers and the officers cannot hardly believe it.The crowd around general Aronburgs headquarters and other places is tremendous and there's a regular mob around the headquarters of the Princesses"

"What does general Aronburg say?"

"Hasn't said anything yet.But there is a rumor that general Beppo Evans his special assistant is to be sent for."and Mildred Nance shook her head gravely, for general Aronburg was still dear to his heart.

"General Beppo Evans.Then the enemy under general Arlington are going to fight it out here over the question of the discovery...???""QQ, A.ZZ

"It looks that way comrades."

A deep murmur arose, and half a dozen began to ask as many different questions.Inthe meantime the wagon train had rolled away... Mildred Nance answered the questions as best as she could, shook hands with the brave girls, and ten minutes later moved over to where a horse was left standing.

"I must get some provisions before we go toard our part of the camp"said Violet, and hurried into the army canteen,..

"Mildred dear, do you really think we'll have a big battle on this sad consecrated sou soil of Abbieann?"asked Jennie Turner, when she was left alone with the girlscout.

"It looks so Jen; although I allow I don't think it will last long if it does come.I think the enemy will try to get at the Vivian Girls, and that will be the end of it.But they must not succeed."

"But that will be too bad to have a battle here."

"That's as how you look at it.The whole territory of Abbieann now is considered sacred ground and general Concentinian aronburg will be considered far much better if he will drive the Glandelinians off this consecrated ground and keep them off.One thing is certain We'll soon hear of dreadful results as soon as the news of Walter Starrings discovery reaches Abbieannia."

At this Jennie Turner said no moar.Finding Violet did not return,Mildred Nance presently leaped from the back horse to learn what had become of her. As Jennie Turner sat alone she noticed half a dozen strange men not in uniform gathered across the way and talking earnestly. In the crowd was the same man Mr gam something that Violet spoke of, and presently the little girl saw this man point toard her.Five minutes more passed, and Jennie wished Mildred and violet would reappear.Then the crowd moved over toard where Jennie was sitting in the saddle of her own horse.The men were dressed as if they were mountaineer laborers and appeared of the roughest class.They were good men in fact but hoodwinked by the Foriegner.

"Say you're a little girlscout from the Glandelinian army are you not?"scoffed one.

"I am from any Christian army that I choosed to go with."answered Jennie Turmer.

"Oh yeah.Get a big head on ye for your size, about what the dirty Glandelinian girl vipers are going to do to us because the Princesses discovered the mystery of Abbieann."added a second of the group.

To this Jennie made no reply but she realized at once the strange foriegner was an enemy and had told these men lies about her.Her silence seemed to anger the entire crowd.

"Get down from that horse."suddenly roared the man called Sam Sam catching Jennie by the arm and trying to pull her from the saddle.

"Let go .What do you mean attacking a girlscout"Cried the girl trying to draw away.

"We are going to teach you meddlesome Glandelinian girlscouts a lesson coming round here spying on us."cried another of the men.

"You won't betray the Princesses to the enemy because they made a discovery of which is none of your business."Come down"and he too caught hold of Jenie Jennie.

But the girlscout was fairly aroused, and striving with the butt of her sabre she managed to wrest herself free from her second assailant. Then she suddenly caught up her horsewhip.

"Let go of me you meddlesome fool."she commanded to Sams."Let go of me or I'll let you have this across the face."

"Indeed yes I'll let go—I sure will"roared the man and pulled pulled Jennie to the ground.Yet as the little girlscout went down the whip swung around, and the lash took the man across the whole face leaving an ugly ridge behind. But the next moment Jennie found herself surrounded.In vain she tried to reason with her captors. The man Sams felt as if he could fell her to the ground, but to do so then would arose the men against him, for the Angelinians don't stand for any man even hitting a glandelinian girlscout with his fist, but nevertheless two of the men caught Jennie up by the arms and feet and bore her off in tru triumph twerd the stream close by full of cold muddy water.It was the intention of the men to duck Jennie in the c icy water of that small stream.This man called Sam had dil ated upon what Jennie had said, but he had told lies saying that Jennie was a disguised glandelinian girlscout bent on frustrating the news of Abbieanns disaster from reaching Abbieann, and as she was a stranger in these parts, the men had been fooled, and now all agreed, that while they did not intend imprisoning her that a good cooling off and then a quick sending out of the camp on a fast horse would do the little glandelinian girlscout viper good..The spirit of fury of over the fact that Glandelinia was responsible for the disaster had already gone through the army, and Jennie was to be the first victim of the bamboozled soldiers.

As the little crowd wades its way around the signal tower to whe re the narrow but deep stream was it caused immediate attention, and soldiers and others came running from all directions, want to find out what in the world was the matter. To all these Mr Sams in as good Abbieannian as he could assume explained the case in his own peculiar lying way, untill half of those assembled felt certain that Jennie was about the worst Glandelinian girlscout that the christian soldiers had ever captured..

"Duck hiht her good and hard Mr Sams"was the cry."Cool her off completely.Then ride her out of camp tied to a horse."

"Trust me for it."puffed Sams as he felt of the face that was belted by the whip."I'll souse her four times for Abbieannia, and as often often on my own account."

It must not be imaginedhowever that Jennie submitted tamely to the proceedings.As soon as she was able she began to struggle with might and main to free herself, and so vigoriously did she haul and try to draw her weapons that soon one of the men holding her feet recieved a blow in the stomach which made him falter and loose his grip.But the others closed in, and in a moment more the place where the icy bath was to be administered was reached. In the meantime violet, and Mildred Nance had come from the Canteen.Seeing Jennie Turmer was not on her horse they searched around for her.

"They brought the girl you're searching for to the river Princess" piped up a refugee child, standing near.

"They are going to souse her in the river."explained a soldier.

"To souse her, souse Jennie Turmer."Gasped violet."What for!"

"Jennie Turmer!"exclaimed the soldier."Is she Jennie Turmer!"

"Of course she is"exclaimed violet almost savagely." Didn't you under stand that"and away she sped for the stream with Mildred Nance limping after her as rapidly as her still sore leg would allow.

"Here,hereyou fellows let my friend Jennie Turmer alone!"cried violt violet indignantly, bursting into the crowd."What means this Mr Sams. Up to your dastardly work again I see.Telling lies on people.youre my prisoner."and she drew her pistol.

The man said nothing but another said;

"We're going to give her a souseing, as she deserves.she's a glandelinian girlscout?didn't you find that out Princess.'"

"She is not a glandelinian girlscout.she's my second aid to what me and my sisters do and this fool has flabbergasted you.she is my friend and helper and you must reason and let her alone.As for you Mr Sams you'll answer for this."

"but ain't she a glandelinian spy and telling things against us and trying to reveal the fact you and your sisters discovered the truth of the disaster."burst out one of the mountaineers.

"We don't yt yet find out but that she's a spy disguised as yor friend."added Sams determined on account of thw the blow recieved to tell the worst sort of lies against Jennie Turmer.

"A spy.Are you crazy"answered Violet."She's Jennie Turmer.Let go of hi her or I'll shoot you down where you stand Mr Sams.Youre under arrest on the charge of creating a disturbance within our camps."

And Violet displeyed both her pistols in such a determined fashion that the ll foriegner fell back(put in the slack), but the Mountaineer s and soldiers did not, while Jennie Turner struggled to her feet.

"There is certainly the biggest put up job here I've ever observed in any army."said Mildred Nance herself with a deliberateness which instantly commanded attention."We have a thousand proofs that this is one of the best friends of our Princesses, and I can vouch for her through the testimony of even the Imperor Himself, and that she is no Glandelinian spy in this neighborhood, trying to find out anything about the discovery of the true cause of the Abbieann disaster.In fact she helped the Princesses in their efforts of solving the mystery.I am as loyal a girlscout as any of you are loyal soldiers to our country but we have not yet reached the point where we must be on the watch for spies after such information as that, and besides any one who would even so much as converse amongst each other here about the disaster without aurthority to do so will pay dearly to the Vivian Girls for it.That foriegner is an imposter, he's a great resemblance to Hero Eunia whom I have often seen in various christian armies myself. Come Miss Turner we'll ride home and you can depend upon it that you shall be safe as long as you remain with me and the Princesses. If these soldiers because they don't recognize you cannot trust you we'll see that you're safe anyhow."

She ranged upon one side of the girlscout, and Violet ranged upon the other side forcing the prisoner to come along.There were half a dozen murmurs now but against him, for the Abbieannians don't relish being told things about somebody that's not tur true and had they had their way they would have seized him and flogged him tied to a tree. Having reached the horses with the men scowling at Violet's prisoner Jennie mounted and the others followed, and soon the murmuring soldiers were left behind....When that section of the christian line had disappeared from view Jennie Turner drew a log long breath.

"IT l seems as if affairs were getting far too hot down at this part of the christian camps for my safty."she said with a faint smile."I never dreamed of being assured accused of something I ain't and being asa ulted in that fashion.If that man gets away he's going to be a lot of r trouble to me."

"You will find hot heads wherever you go now Jennie"answered Mildred Nance.Then after a moments reflection she continued."ut all told I don't believe that you should stay too long in a christian camp now where all are strangers to you, for they may not even believe Violet suspecting that she too would be fooled and believe you're all right. No one here is ever acquainted with any one called Jennie Turmer and therefore it's saftest to go bac on the return to the christian army where every one is acquainted with you."

"I promished Penrod I'd return as soon as possible and I believe it'll be wise for me to start to morrow if possible.It was very good of you and violet to come to my aid.I don't want you to go get into any trouble with even your own christian armies on my account.The Christians are so upset by the Abbieann affair that now they're suspicious of any strangers they see.Mdaybe even my accuser may not mean wrong and probably was decieved himself.He seems a right good sort of follow and not an enemy."

"I understand, but those Foriegners are hardly neighbors to us and have no accounts to see settle with either side in this war."said Mildred Nance."nd we have never invited them to either come over to this country, and if the seas were open and free from enemy Subs, we'd deport every one right now.They have no business over here.They are very impulsive, and generally aching to have the chance to quarrel with some one amongst each other, and even tried it on us, especilly especially a new comer.When they tried it on us, they found themselves in the guard house before they could write their own name.This suspicion of a battle threatening here has stirred them so that many of them have lost their heads completely, and they'll want to go shooting at something by to morrow.But I'll bet when a real bt battle starts they'll be the first to go to the rear as far as it is possible to be safe.They're usually a lot of cowards.I've had my experience with them and found them out.I remember that one Englishman who was a coward and Penrod had to do the thing that the coward was afraid of.No,no we'll see to it that these foriegners stay in their places and mind their own business or they'll find out something."

"Well if they shoot at me."answered Jennie Turmer"They,ll find themsel themselves shooting at a wilf wild cat.Once more that foriegner starts with me and I'll treat him the same as I would a Glandelinian."

However she did not dream of the perils so close at hand.That man called Sams was really not a foriegner but a Glandelinian spy posing as one, and as he was well acquainted with Jennie Turmer he pulled that lie, to try and get her out of the way. The vide to the main portion of the christian line was q soon at an end, and the two girls Mildred and Violet, strode into the Rowe(de mowe) to be warmly embraced, by Angeline Richee, and the pretty Vivian Girls,Violets sisters.In the meantime the soldiers soldiers brought the prisoner violet had brought with her and saw to it he was in the prison tent under strong guard.He never got away but he had accomplices who after wards made trouble for Jennie Turmer.A man who ever was made a prisoner by any of the Vivian girls, may have gotten away alright, but was always dead afterwards.To try and escape was absolute and a true fact, suicide. Then Jennie Turmer joined Violet, and her sisters down in the military stable yard, to see that her own horse was being cared for properly..

"I believe I'll leave directly after supper instead of waiting till to morrow."She said to Juice."Penrod will surely hear of what is up and they he'll be anxious about me"And she told the whole story.

"You'll stay right here that's what you will do"said Jennie Vivian very decidedly."you must understand Jennie, that if you leave the camp this way you'll be then surely under suspicion. There is a real fault in the reason of that man being able to accuse you of that misdeamor. A Girl spy of the enemy is in the camp, for while you were away with Violet, I and my sisters and the Fire Flyies were searching for her. No one not even ourselves can leave the camp was we passed that law exc exempting no one.That spy heard of our plan and must not escape. It's too dangerous, we can and will not cancel the order for fear she'll escape.They didn't mean to mistreat you, but the worse of it is, you resemble that girl spy a good deal.Any of the soldiers admit that.The very ones who mistreated you are really sorry and wanted to apoligize but violet in her hurry didn't give them time.We must all stay now. I was going to go with my sisters ourselves to night but now that's out of the question.We'll show that no one can be an imposter and by impersonating you cause soldiers to accidentally mistreat one of my friends."

"You are a Princess chum worth having, and so are your sisters."laughed Jennie Turmer, and they returned to the house arm in arm, never dreaming suspecting of how soon the cruel battle coming was to separate them for three dreadful long days, and cause them to go through some unusual unusual adventures.

Gracedelinia Jean who was commander of the Fire Flies had been questioning Mildred Nance eagerly about the course of events and when Jennie Turmer appeared she lost no time in pouncing down upon her. "Oh Jennie dear is it true, are we going to fight the enemy here in this consecrated country around Abbieann!"she burst out.

"Well I'm sure we won't be the aggressor."she repeated with a smile for deep down in her heart Mildred thought Gracedelinia just the best and most lovable girlscout leader she had ever become acquainted with. "I don't understand about that--if the enemy does it just because you and the Princesses discovered that the enemy made the disaster at Abbieann"she pouted."If they fight against us for that purpose that'll only prove Glandelinia is guilty more than ever, and then we'll declare Glandelinia is very mean."

"You wouldn't want it to be true that Glandelinia was guilty would you Gracedelinia"? demanded Jennie Turmer herself.

"I should say not, but if it is so how can we prevent ourselves from fighting her then, when we are so entu entirely in the ri right?" and she bent a reproa reproachful pi pair of brown eyes on Jennie Turmer in such a way that her heart gave a big jump, and she was forced to turn away...2.aa Atthis moment violet interupted the brief-tete a tete at this point, and in a little while the conversation became general.Soon supper was announced, and once again Jennie Turmer found two of the Vivian Girls at her sides.But sw she was on her guard, and they all conversed about everything else but of the disaster, and the threatened battle because of Starvings discovery. The evening which w followed, full of songs and music from Violet, and her sisters, who could play any musical instrument and play on pianos and organs as well, and filled in with righteous war anecdote by Mildred Nance was one which Jennie Turmer never forgot, and which was the first time she had ever eaten "with the Princesses. What a happy and good natured bunch of girls they were and what a truly jolly girl Gracedelinia, Jennie Turmers oldest acquaintance was. After this day many were the times she remembered every detail of the scene, as she experienced adventure after every adventure following battle after battle, year in and year out. But the best of times of course must come to an end, and at eight bells the gathering finally dispersed and Jennie Turmer went off to sleep her last sleep by the side of one of the Princesses for two perilous months to come.

Early morning before sunrise found violet, and her sisters stirring. They strode to the barn, where Jennie Turmer saw to it that her horse would be ready for her immediately after the morning meal, in case she would be going out on an adventure with violet and her sisters through the camp.The morning meal was more elaborate than usual, and during the progress of the meal Mildred Nance expressed the hope that after the capture of the girl spy was accomplished, that violet and her sisters, and Jennie Turmer would have no trouble in getting to Big Turmer run near Trinoque Stream.

"One of our Fire Fly Boyscouts George Gill tells me that the news that the Abbieann disaster was discovered to be done by the enemy has traveled everywhere during the night, and in consequence the country people are growing suspicious of all strangers.Therefore I advised that you Violet, and your sisters, and Jennie Turmer better go straight on through Maryland River by boat without stopping."

"I wonder if Miss Hermonda will join us if it comes to the dreadful news coming that far!"said violet.

"Of course she will join."answered Mildred Nance. The morning meal over ,Violet, and her sisters felt that they must be on their way for the trip through camp.They were to dress in their full regala so that they would not be suspected as one of the girlscout spies they themselves wished to have apprehended. To prevent her getting into unecessary trouble Jennie Turmer was to accompany them.There was a winding turn in one of the Company Streets leading to the Abbieann River, and this crossed there remained a choice of wo roads, one almost direct but very hilly and stony and the other a serpentine was way several miles longer but much more easily traveled..

"Well good by for a time and God be with you."were Jennie's parting words to Gracedelinia, and the t o embraced each other, and Jennie expressed the wish that when they met again, that the battle would not have happened.Yet Jennie Turmer found the parting from Grace harder than ever.There were tears in the eyes of the little girl, and Jennie could scarcely say a word o to her because of the lump which arose in her throat.But at last it was all over,,, and she had mounted her horse beside Jennie Vivians, which one of the boyscouts had brought up to her.She and violet, and her sisters were about to tip their heart shaped hats in a parting ddiee adieu when on glancing tward a side road pp passing the main company street to the left in an oblique fashion Jennie's eyes caught sight of half a dozen men galloping swiftly tward her and violet and her sisters. She notif notified them and they of course did not start off.

"Maybe they're after me believing I'm the one"she thought to her self..Had they really been enemies there was a chance to escape these approaching horsemen and yet they were Angelinians, and therefore why should she attempt it and cause them to suspect her still more! He tipped her hat.

"They certainly means to stop us to see who we got with us."cried Violet, as she watched them coming."I wish they'd come with the news that the spy has been captured.."

She had scarcely finished, when violet, and her sisters discovered they were her friend Fred Nance and his followers.The men ttddit rode straight for them.

"Well my n dear friend Fred, what brings you this morning?"demanded Violet,, as the general, and his followers came to a halt...

"We came to have a conversation with your girl friend called called Jennie. Turmer.was the sudden answer."The men have sseen matters over and want to apoligize for their foolishness yesterday afternoon."

"Your men did not do that yesterday"said violet."They were others."
"Yes but they sent me and my followers in their place."
"So you came here to represent them for an ogilgy did you?"
"Yes. But we also came here to find out what is a certain strange girl who appeared to be her yesterday doing in these parts."put in a second of the new comers.
"I told you yesterday she was here on a suspicious reason."
"Everybody believe she's a glandelinian spy."
"Nobody is too forward entirely in their belief.I did not put in my word for it or my sisters only men, but we' have gave orders for no on one, not even ourselves to leave camp untill that one is apprehended. The time is not yet ripe for that time.If we were to cancel our order because we wish to go out of camp, the spy may slip out through us."
"there is that spy,?"
"didn't any one find her yet."
"no?"
"where is the girl?"demanded Joi ce.
"She has left."
"Gone away they say"came in a chorus."
"Gone away!"
"Yes."
"You mean to say escaped from our camp despite all the precaution?"
"We don't say that Princess,she may be in camp but no one can find her."

The faces of violet,and her sisters fell. They had not forgotten the blow one of the glandelinians had given her once across the face because of her slapping him once for blaspheming, and she was longing with the aid of her sisters"to square accounts with every glandelinian that came her way."

"which way th did she go if she didn't have camp?" said Jennie vivian.
"no one can tell, and that committ confounded fellow you marrried made a prisoner of Princess Violt, would tell a thing even though he was grilled and cross examined.."

"There is no use in trying to catch her now" declared violet ruefully."she has has gone out of sight but if she tries to leave the camp she'll surely be nabbed for I and my sisters gave the orders to capture any child scout leaving camp no matter what he or she wears for she could try to get out disguised as a boy too..But don't worry pred she'll never get out. But you better have the number of sentries and other guardsdoubled."

"I will said Fred.We'll do anything for you and the Princesses and for Miss Turner too who was accused at first of being the spy.Come comrades."

Violet and her sisters, Jennie, and Susan Farrol, saw Fred and his followers consult together at some distance for several minutes and then ride slowly away.

"It's too bad they didn't come half an hour ago."said Jennie Vivian regretfully, in which her sisters readily joined. "But I suspect that even if the sentries and other guards may prevent them from getting outside of the christian lines, she may have a chance to do something on us yet if we don't watch out.They are fooled now and we may be too for all we can see."

But were Fred Nance and his men fooled? Let us wait and see... 2.2.2.

As Violet, had said, the battle between general Arlogtons army and that of Concentinian Aronburg because of the Abbieann discovery had been brewing for a long long time since then, and the news of the discovery had brought to the surface many men on the glandelinian army who were hot tempered and hasty, and too the last persons inthr the world to settle any difficulty over that question, although in many cases these Glandelinians mostly generals and other officers thought they were the very persons to settle the difficulty. Ha Hearing if the discovery which many of Manley s generals wanted to prevent at all costs, these Glandelinian officers of all sorts gathered on the the company streets of their encampments and elsewhere, shouting to get even with the Vivian Girl Princesses for bringing to light the real cause of Abbieanns destruction, and demanding that the army move forward and in a few short a days if possible to put to an end forever of the Vivian Girls,and the christian army confronting them. They were perfectly certain that no battle no matter how big or great could last more than two or three days at the most and were equally cettain certain that they could sent the "ChristianDogs" flying as if they were a army of the most "timid "sheep.When the battle with all of its horrors did come these ranting Glandelinian officials who had never yet been in a battle were in nine cases out of ten scared out of their wits, and the bloody battle of Abbieann one of the most bloodiest battles of the war up to that time was a most dreadful dreadful nightmare from which they never recovered.

The Glandelinian army sure did have its share of foolish and almost insane hotheads, and all these fellows were perfectly certain of immediate titaty vittory victory, and who thought that after the Abbieann government disaster the whole christian government of Abbieannin and her sister States and provinces could be turned upside down in an equally short space of time.Well the Abbieannian government was certainly turned upside down, but not in the way the enemy had hoped for.The christian generals confronting general Arlinton and who were cooler and more far seeing, and feeling that a great battle was slowly and surely approaching they began to prepare for it, and more and more vigorously as the time for action drew near.At first all connections were severed, and this accomplished the christian leaders began to form signal stations for militar military and cavarly divisions.Some of these doings was reported to the chief glandelinian generals, and outside of some of these signal stations being constantly fired on, never untill the actual opening of the battle was it suspected how throughout these christian preparations for battle had been.General Concentinian Aronburg understood his "Onions" Men disguised as animals would creep forward to scout on the enemy and going forth in unfrequented and out of the way places.In the districts about Abbieann River, several military companies, and one troop of Concentinian Cavarly has thus far been out on frequent patrols, but discovered nothing suspicious about the enemy yet. Mildred Nance herself understood violet when spy words were thought of, but she was satisfies that who ever the girlscout was who impersonated Jennie Turner during her stay had discovered nothing of importance. But the girlscout had slipped out of the christian lines immediately after she had been discovered and before the vivian girls had been informed and given their rigid orders to the generals to let no one out of the camp, not even they themselves untill the spy was apprehended..... On and on along the winding road, galloped this girlscouts faithful steed named Bess after her cherished aunt in Bengull State.And she was ot ready a spy against the christians.She made it appear so , so she could cause it to appear as if she was in peril from the christians so she could do her duty against the enemy better and easier.The day was cloudy from far distant forest fire and other conflagrations, and on rising on her horse the girl had felt that one of the fires was not far off....

Presently she is not two miles from the christian lines when despite the forest fires raging it began to rain.At first the drops came down scatteringly, then followed a perfect deluge, and she was glad enough to see the chance to reach a an abandoned house of some sort stand ing on the edge of a large clearing.She had occupied the shelter for less than two minutes, when on glancing out one of the windows she saw something which filled her with astonishment not unmixed with dismay.A band of boyscouts of some regiment were approaching, boyscouts that appeared to as if they were Pan Rangers , but wearing uniforms very much different.At the head of the crowd all on horses which numbered probably eighty rode a pretty girlscout, but whom she had never seen before.

They were accompanied by a party of soldiers on horse in the rear, and to the left and right, about eight hundred inall led by a colonel.

"Left wheel!"came the command from the girlscout, and leaving the roadway the whole squadron set out for the old abandoned house.Then followed the order"Double Time to the house"and on came the child scouts and the soldiers at increasedcspeed.

They must be some patrol party of christian scouts the two columns of them.Was the thought which flashed through the girls mind.For a moment she allowed her horse to stand still.Then as she had on the uniform of a Glandelinian girlscout, and not wishing to be seen by these, who might open fire first and tell you to be careful afterwards, she wheeled about; dashed out of the rear doors of the house and entered a small stretch of woods two hundred yards away.By the time she had tethered Bess, and come down to the edge of the clearing once more, the company of strange soldiers and boyscouts had entered the house, and having settled themselves here and there,were stamping around as if in search of somebody.She wondered if she had been seen, but as no effort was made to to trace her, she concluded that she had succeeded in getting getting away without being noticed.

The rain was now coming down more furiously than ever, and the little girl in gray was quite content to remain off the exposed highway untill the storm no doubt produced by the heat of forestfires should abate.ed instead of quenching them they were only increasing the density of the clouds. As she waited her curiousity arose concerning the strange body of soldiers,and the child scouts, and at length despite the danger of being discovered and subjected to capture, she left the woods and approached the house from the north side.Here there was no regular opening, but several boards were loose and through the c opening she could plainly hear and see all that was going on inside.

Patrolin around to day didn't last long."She heard a soldier close to her say."But I believe it doesn't matter much"he've got the movements of the enemy down fine.I don't believe they're preparing to assault our army yet."

"You're right James"came from a comrade."Captian Grace there out girlscout leader and companion sure showed us how to put that Glandelinian patrol we encountered on the run and no telling stories either.I wonder always why they fly at the sight of a party of boy and girlscouts."

"They're afraid that's what."

"I wonder how long it will before we're called on to fight the enemy confronting us.said a fourth soldier."I'm tired of all this scouting and patroling when it doesn't do no good, and to have such an enemy on consecrated ground is a regular taste of Sulphur and faults to me."

"Yes I wish we could get at the dirty Glandelinians--we'll teach em a lesson and show them what we do when they let louse such disasters on our countryside.And they call that Fair War.That's wholesale murder. and I don't mean maybe."

"It won't be long now Conby---with the news of the enemy's guilt of Abbieann spreading fast.Others of our army will come up in short order and then the enemy will have to fight or give up and run out of here."

"I understand our leaders intend to seize all the Glandelinian fortifications along the Abbieann River."added another man."Will be a good job done to my way of saying it."

"We ought to seize the arsenals too."put in the first soldier who had opened the conversation....."If we do and the enemy------Hi what's up outside."!

He stopped short, and in company with his companions and a goodly number of the boy scouts and their girl leader(sneader) made a rush for the open doorway there to behold three of the company in full persuit o The girlscout ho[illegible] who was racing to the group of trees with a speed which would have done credit to a most professional runner of her size.The girlscout had been suddenly surprised by the sudden appearance of the men.They did not come from the house either but had come down the road on horse, but she had time enough nevertheless to to step away from the side of the house and run, and she was still thirty yards in advance, when the first belt of timber was gained.

"Halt you little Glandelinian devil or I'll fire."called out one of the men, for the Angelinians would do so, since Glandelinian soldiers treat their own child scouts even worse.He thought the threat would be sufficient to bring the girlscout to a stop, but she continued on desperately.A score of rattling shots followed after her but in the fog and rain it was evident their aim was poor, and in a moment the woods hid her from view.And once behind the shelter of the trees the girlscout did not diminish her speed but crashing along through the small brush soon gained her horses side.The soldiers were persueing swiftly on horse, but the tether was untied, and she flung herself on the mares saddle and off they went in a circuitous route for the crossroad, followed pellmell by the persuers.

If she had time to prove who she was she might have stopped, but she understood too she had been listening in on their conversation and therefore she would not be be belied believed even though she only spied to see whether they were really Angelinians or the enemy.

But then she was caught between two fires.Though she soon was out of sight and hearing of the Angelinian persuers, she ran plump into a patrol of real Glandelinian cavarly, the swift horse "Wheelers" Glandelinians whom nobody could get away from, but her sudden appearance and her dashing so swiftly tward them, threw them into confusion and panic believing girlscouts were coming to assault them, and it was they who ran. They were soon out of sight and hearing themselves. What she had sen seen and heard however filled her mind with strange thoughts.

"They were really a patrol of christians"she said to herself and I regret hearing what they said, but I wanted to be sure who they were.Had they been the enemy I'd have exposed them.They heard of the enemy ready to crash upon general Aronburgs army the minute the chief Glandelinian generals give the order.I wonder how many more though of those Glandelinian patrols are about here.No doubt hundreds ---and perhaps thousands.I must use caution.I scared one party but might not do so to the second."

Feelingthat she would have n an interesting story to tell when she reached a more acquainted part of the christian lines, the little girl -urged forward her horse as rapidly as the muddy road would permit.he soon reached a little hamlet called Austinia, but the rain stormand driven every one in doors and she passed on without being questioned though to avoid suspicion from friends she had turned her graycoat inside out to its bluer color...2.2.2.2.2.2222

Half a mile outside of the hamlet hens began to limp and she dismounted to find out the trouble.A shoe was loose, and in such a condition that it must be tightened before the journey could be resumed for home. Under such conditions there was nothing to do but to retrace her steps to the small town(nightgown) and get a shoe replaced by the shoe smith.The smithty soon however was found a low out clean place at the lower end of the hamlet. The door was open and the girlscout rode in to find herself in the presence of the horseshoer, and a half dozen soldiers all of whom had been discussing the Abbieann discovery question with all the warmpth of their Abbieannian natures

"I have a need that the shoe be fastened."said the girl, as the horse shoer strode forward to greet her.

"Yes little miss"was the reply,,, and the man set the shoe on his anvil without delay to straightened it out first.Having nothing to do the little girl whose name we must mention to show she was well acquainted with other armies was none other than one of Gertrudes friends and comrades Annie Noonie herself.She strode up to one side of the fire and tried to dry her clothing.. while she stood there the others in the smithy eyed her most curiously, and the conversation first lagged, and then was turned into other channels. Annie had seen ne of the soldiers some days before, and this man now whispered some thing to the others,and all eyed the girl sharply and suspiciously.It was evident that they thought she was a Glandelinian girlscout and would treat her accordingly.However no effort was made to molest her, but she was made to feel that she was considered not as a friend of the christian cause but an enemy.If they had eiv evidence against her she could not have left the shop at all but would have been arrested right then and there.In a quarter of an hour the shoe was ready, and Annie handed over the fifteen cents the price of payment.She was glad that she was not detained any longer, and lost no further time in getting on her way.But the halt brief as it was, was sufficient to bring her into serious trouble.The trouble came from Fred Hance and his followers who did not give up the persuit of her. Chargrined at the failure to find her in the camp, and having learned she had reallly escaped, the colonel had set off for Austinia to learn if the girlscout had passed in that direction.Fred Hance was of the class of Angelinians who never forget and almost never forgive what Glandelinians do against the christian cause, and what they had done to Violet,and her sisters, and he was always determined to "square accounts""or see the reason why. The men with him were a strong daring dare devil set, willing to enter into anything which promished excitement and sport.Fred and his followers arived in Austinia less than five minutes after Annie Noonie had left the hamlet, and at the smithy recieved full particulars concerning the girl scout.

"Forward boys"he cried to his soldiers."We'll be soon up to the little fool who double crossed Jennie Gurmer by causing many to believe she was the spy."and away they went fown down the hill beyond the hamlet and up the nent next, where they behald the girlscout just crossing the bridge across the Abbieann River.In a few minutes more after leaving the bridge some distance behind the little girlscout found herself surrounded.Although not actually frightened because she saw they were ot not Glandelinians she was much disturbed, for they did not know her and she understood from the appearance of Freds face that as long as he suspected she was a Glandelinian girlscout he meant no good.As the others rode directly in front of her she was compelled to draw rein.She could have escaped even then, for she had good pistols on her person but she couldn't shoot down friends who only thought she was an enemy because of her disguise.

"So I've caught you have I little graycoat!"sneered the Angelinian officer, as he ranged up beside Annie"your men called our own girl and boyscouts Imps and brats and your sort are so mean you're those things yourself for truth.Didn't believe I could capture you since you left our lines did you.Bringing information to general Arlington about the discovery of Abbieann eh."

"I am no Glandelinian girlscouts"replied Annie as calmly as she could, and "So I don't believe you would have a right to detain me."

"We haven't hey.Well all I can say we are going to use the right-eh boys."!

"That's so Fred.I believe violet, and her sisters would enjoy it seeing you bringing t her into camp."

"And what's your object gentlemne ge gentlemen?"

"Oh you need not get on no high horse little girlscout" returned Fred."You are well enough to realize what out our object is."

"Just because you're small and a little gil gir, that's s no sign you're going to spy on us"put in another soldier."I red I believe it'e best to search her."

"Of course we'll search her"came from several of the others."And if she is a spy"------"

"I tell you I am not a spy and I'm a girlscout of Gertrude Angeline and her Regiment and my name is Annie Rooney."answered the girl with all the dignity she could command.

"Well Miss Annie Rooneyyou m just march along with us."returned Red Fred, and caught hold of Bess's bridle."You'll have to prove that in camp.If it turns out you are not what we suspect then you can obtain all the restitution you may requie require, but we just now cannot let any strangers get away or anywhere outside of our camps when we don't feel as if we understand who they are.It is our orders from the Princesses.If you're all right, I'll apology to ye but just now you'll have to come along.If you're not a Glandelinian girl scout why did you leave the christian lines so mysteriously, and what are you doing with that gray uniform coat.Caldwell get on one side of her, and Ross Hanson you get on the other.The rest go behind and before.She shan't get away this trip.If she can prove she's not what we believe she is, then the joke is on us. and we'll do what we can to pay her for all the trouble we caused her.But we cannot chance anything now with so many strangers now.We got to obey orders."

"Where are you going to bring me?"demanded Annie in alarm.

"The christian camps of course.Get along."

There was no help for it, for if she drew gun against them, and they had not thought of searching her for weapons yet, and did get the best of them, she would be shooting down friends instead of foes. and therefore much against her will, the little girl rode off in the midst of the soldiers.The road led into the christian camps after an eith of a mile was covered, and in front of a big tent

Annie was ordered to dismount which she did, while her horse was led away with those of the soldiers.With Fred Nance on one side of her, and two others on the other she was forced to enter the tent and a guard placed outside.The rain which had let up a bit bit, but which had instead of decreasing the fires only made a hell sea of smoke into the skies now came down as hard as ever after having let up a bit.

She thought that he would order a man to fetch a rope and bind her, but no order of such a nature was given.She was however searched, but having her pistols in a most secret place they were not found.Four dollars and a beautifult beautiful little gold watch, a Rosary Beads, Medals, and a prayer book was found on her.The soldiers were surprised but then it was believed glandelinian girlscouts would carry such articles for a ruse.Her money was given to her as they did not want that but the religious articles were not returned yet. They wanted to find out first who she reallly was.Then Fred began to question her closely about what she had seen and heard within the christian lines, and she only told what she really had observed during her stay but reported enemy movements.

"I'll tell you what we'll do boys"said Fred Nance suddenly."I began to believe we did not do the proper thing.But we'll bring her before the Princesses and if they recognize her as a friend then the joi joke is on us. But we got to be careful anyhow and chance arresting even friends to be sure enemies don't escape us.Is that agreed to comrades.If she proves to be a friend we'll make up for our mistake good and proper."

This was agreed to and so they ordered her to follow them.

It wouldbe hard to put Annie's feelings into words when she found herself a prisoner of her own friends.Not only did her disguise fool them but she felt sure she had been doublecrossed or otherwise this would not have happened.Enemies were doing this she believed. nd she was right. She was surprised that she had not been bound hand and foot, but the Angelinians usually only do that to soldier prisoners because they alone are desperate enough to try and fight their way to freedom.Had she been a prisoner in the hands of the enemy she would have been robbed of all her valuables, and would have recieved very harsh treatment besides.

"Those glandelinians are thorough rascals if there ever were any."she thought bitterly."I believe they would throw me into H...Hell whether I'm as good as I am, or even as bad as they if they could do so and felt sure they could get anything out of me by doing it.Even if I can't prove my identification here amongst these Angelinians now I'll be in a scrape and no fooling either.I woner what shall I do in case of Violet,and her sisters failing to recognize me in my disguise."

Evidently she felt something was wrong. It's the shame the waythe Glandelinians do treat us, and m pull through such awful treancherous schemes."went on the girlscout to herself."But never mind let us have the chance, and some day we'll have to get square with the enemy and won't we do wonders.I wonder how strong this confounded glandelinian army is confronting general Aronburg."

The army however was much stronger than she expected it ever to be-- far too strong it seemed to be either stretched or torn apart by any desperate christian assault--and if it came a two days storm of assault would only suffice to"chafe the christian line to the blood drawing point.

"They understand concentration already"she murmured."Is it possible that the Glandelinian army if storming us will defa defeat us here on this consecrated ground.

It was not long before the christian army was coming into sight, and she was wet to the very pores, yet the wind that was now rising from the southeast swept qith great strength. and wqs was because of the dampness and the forest fires as the warm as an damp African climate in the wettest and hottest part of Africa.Her horse too began to grow impatient from the heat and from the smoke and dampness.Angeline Roonie as her right name is had about given up all hope of getting free, when through the wind she and the whole party heard some girlscout singing dinging loudly and sweetly;

"O Mary Conciev1ed without sin pray for us, pray for us, Oh Mary concieved without sin pray for us who have recourse to thee TT"

The little girls voice came to a sudden stop as Annie Roonie cried loudly for help.A period of silence followed.

"What is that?"

"Help I'm made a prisoner by these Angelinian soldiers by mistake. I'm Annie Roonie."

"For the Love of Heaven who did you say you where.Where are you!"

There was the sound of a horse crashing through a small woods on the side of the woods, and presently a beautiful purple uniformed girl purple coat and bright yellow velvety dress, and red heart shaped hat came riding forward. She halted at the squadron with a upraised hand. It was Jennie Vivian one of the princess's.

"Heavens what's the trouble here."!

"Identify me willyou Jennie!"begged Ani Annie eagerly,"They believe I'm a Glandelinian girlscout because of my disguise."

"You sure are Annie Roonie or my name is not Jennie Vivian. How came you been fooled that way Fred!"

"Well she was the one who escaped the lines Princess."

"No she wasn't.We captured that party ourselves just n hour ago in our own tent.It was a boyscout of the enemy disguised as a girl fifteen years old.Release her at once."

"I'm sorry I made that mistake then"said Fred turning to Annie. "put in such a dangerous time what were you doing outside of the christian lines."

"Some Glandelinians robbed me of my small wrist watch, and some of my money."said Annie."I went in persuit.Gosh I am almost perished with this heat."

"Who were the Glandelinians you persued."questioned the Angelinian officer eagerly.

"I am not acquainted with any of them.But one was a captian.All these Glandelinians are a mighty bad crowd."

"Well we'll make restitution for our mistake."said Fred. "but we have to be careful, and too you understand we have ore orders to seize every one we observe wearing gray.I would have to do that even if they were the Vivian Girls.Ain't I right Jennie.That was your order."

"It sure was"said Jennie. "We are sorry Annie for this misfortune you had but the greatest caution is necessary.But you should have carried an identification about you signed by our own hand and then you would have been alright."

"I am much obliged to you for coming to my assistance."said Annie. "I am sorry I can't reward you but you care not for money rich as you and your sisters are, but I'll serve you some day on a exciting scouting adventure.."

"That's all right Annie--glad to do any of my friends and comrades a good turn.But you better come along with me to my own tent where my sisters are, for to go alone through the camp would be causing you trouble again.And besides that uniform on you would bring on a vollet of shot at you as you enter camp."

In two minutes more she was bidding good by to the captian and his followers and made off up the hill in the direction of the christian camps with Jennie.The soldiers followed slowly behind.On on the high way Jennie order ig Annie to follow put spurs to her horse and less than half an hour gained the limits of the christian camps.They were halted by the sentey, who however recognized Jennie but at first thought she had Annie as a prisoner because of the latters gray coat.Here both put up at a small mess hall for a half hour in the meantime getting a little lunch, and having Annie's horse fed.She told the Mess attendent how she had been made a prisoner by a party of Angelinians who was fol fooloed by her uniform coat, and the mess sergeant said;

"Those things can happen.My father was on sentry duty yesterday, and had he not recognized my face when I was approaching camp in disguise from a scouting trip I wouldn't be here to tell it now.These dangerous things are going on everybody to get fooled now adays you understand."

It was growing well twards night, when they were well within the christian lines.Her hard long distanced riding hadvtired her greatly, and she was not sorry when within ten minutes later Jennie Vivians big tentwas reached, and she was permitted to place her faithful steed, Bess in the stable, and with Jennie enter the tent...

"Why Annie Koonie.and in all this rain."exclaimed violet, as she rose from her chair to greet the girlscout."I've been expecting you for the past two or three days, but I didn't even imagine you would start out in time to get caught in such weather as this."

Annie soon related her story, and then it had to be repeated for the benefit of the other Vivian Girls who just then came in with Susan, and Angeline Richee.All listened with the closest attention to what was told....2.2

"I have suspected as much since our orders went through. We have to be careful of any persons no matter who they are who wear the gray and the only way we can guard against trouble that way is that only our best known boy and girlscouts must carry identification papers signed by our own names & our own best handwriting. We have found out that the Glandelinian generals are bound sooner or later to bring on a most desperate battle to capture us because Starring and we have discovered it was Glandelinia o who originated the Abbieann disaster.They won't I suppose argue the point or listen to reason.Our discovery of the true cause of Abbieann's destruction and its immediate results has started a flame which will be impossible to quench..

"Never mind the coming of cattle just now Joice"said violet."What are we to do with that Glandelinian boyscout we have captured.Though he really is a Glandelinian he has no evidence on him to say he's a spy and we can't treat him therefore as such."

"Better not bother about him just now, violet.He's under strong guard and as we can't prove anything against the fellow who won't reveal his name we cannot do anything but hold him as a prisoner of war.We have to deport a great number of these foriegners we have in our country too for some of them seemed to have turned over in favor of the enemy and as we can't prove nothing against them either, and if they were brought before a court marshall they would deny everything, and also as matters stand, it may be their word may be taken in preference to out officers.

"I don't believe any of our own side, will uphold such actions." declared Susan.I'm a foriegner myself but very few are really always honest and square for all that, and I and my father have many one miss amongst them now because I joined the Rangers.Some say the enemy is merely fighting for wht what they believe is right."

"Gracious susan you're not going to turn against foriegners being one yourself yourself, are you?"exclaimed Catherine half in surprise.

"I'll wager pretty Jennie Vivian our prettiest sister has been trying to convert her into a real Abbieannian"asserted Angeline Vivian.

"I don't turn against anybody if they're as good as they should be." a s answered Susan."But I want you to understand as several days ago confessed to Jennie that in this country people are so good as to seem as if sin never did exist, and yet its not so amongst people in other countries.so what should prevent foriegners from joining against us since they've mad because they're in danger of being deported.Of course I've seen many gentlemen and women, and men of honor, and children in my own country where I came from, and they mighty nice people too, Catholics, or not, but then the numbers of bad ones too cannot be counted.But in this country I never saw one person man woman or child o do the slightest possible thing even out of the way.never no children fighting each other or even having the slightest cross word.Therefore don't you believe Princesses, that unassirable foriegners wouldn't be a menace to your cause."

"Of course there is such a danger my dear Susan."said Hettie Vivian. "And as you say many of these foolish sort of foriegners believe they are in the right for Glandelinia's cause, and the discovery of Glandelinia being the cause of Abbieanns destruction does not convince them they are wrong, and therefore they are willing to see Glandelinia fight for what they believe Glandelinia has a right to contend for.but for all that even though they are wrong, and sinful for that, they cannot even join the Glandelinian armies either, for while we are not really begruding the Foriegners. and desire most ardently to have them stay if they really good, the Glandelinians hate them all as if they were burning posion, and if they moved heaven or earth they would not be accepted into their armies.They could however give information to the enemy spies getting into our lines and that we have to use every precaution against.So all foriegners we find who do not act right out of our country they go."

"One of the Glandelinian prisoners told me, one day"said Susan "that there used to be far more numbers of child slaves in o your tjat there used to be far more numbers of child slaves in o your country than there were in Glandelinia, and when Abbieannia gave up slavery, your people sold the slaves to Glandelinia and other countries."

"That is a real devilish lie, and there's full proof in that that he ever Glandelinians tell you are lies---we certainly have child slaves now, and many of them, but they're free, and if we cannot find their parents then they're adopted and made citizens of Abbieannia for all child slaves so far are found to be good.Thousands have already been rescued and not one parent could be traced.They adopted into good families now and are as happy as they can be.We never made children into slaves, susan---we certainly never did--but we rescued them already, how many no one has yet estimated.But the Census shows 100,000 were among the adoptions, and none of them could claim to have parents."

"And he said that your government now wants to free those same slaves ---after taking Glandelinian money from them."went on susan earnestly.

"We certainly want to free them, but we never sold slaves.And also what the Glandelinian authorities objected to, and which precipitated the war, was the spread of Glandelinian child slavery in the territories provinces of Calverinia and Angelinia.I am sure the matter could be arranged if our real statemen could get together, without the interference of the Glandelinians, and to arrange things so all child slaves could be rescued at once in spite of the fact that both sections are plunged into such a civil war.Glandelinia is a fallen away part of Abbieannia, fell away over a century ago, and now she wants to whip our nation into being what she is to day.Before I'll see her prevail I'll exile myself on foriegn soil first,"

Soon after the conversation was interrupted by Angeline Richee, who herself had prepared a hot supper, for all... Annie Koonie enjoyed this supper with the Vivian Girls with avidity, the grace before and after meals having been said with great dignity.

For several hours after Annie Koonie returned to the christian camps matters moved along quietly at every point.The night itself passed with a quietness and pleasantness long to be remembered.If it had not been for the flare of forest fires it would not appear as if a war was really raging.

But nevertheless quiet as it was something did happen during the night, and which set everybody to conversing amongst each other.It wasvto the effect that general Collie in command of a long line of positions not far from one of the "xplosion Craters had abandoned that stronghold, dragging away the guns and carriages and all the horses, but setting fire to the tents and other things which he had no time to move and retreated to the main position.The fortified position where this Glandelinian general had been occupying was a low place only in a few feet of height, hard to defend, and too close to the crater, the place to which he and his troops had withdrawn was nearer to the main Glandelinian intrenchments, and was as strong a position as well could be. The Glandelinian armies had for a long while thought they could swoop down upon the christian positions and secure either an easy surrender or force a hasty retreat.Now when they saw general Concentinian Aronburg entrenched behind the frowning positions near Abbieann River along a fourty mile front, their leaders grew mad with fury and anxiety, and at once made pee preparations to occupying not only the positions which some christian armies before had recently abandoned but also the ruins of Abbieann, and other sections including the ancient battleground of Geronion river which had been abandoned since the first battle of Abbieann over a year before.

"We'll drive the Christian dogs out in fine style style"the enemy leaders told each otherThen camethe first cannot shot which finally a day or two later threw the two enormous armies into a bloody battle of three days duration, and cost countless thousands of lives, and millions upon millions of wounded.

A certain fortified position of the christian army held by general Fal Staff was fired upon by the Glandelinian batteries. He had been called upon to give up the position, and had sent a defiant answer.On that morning November the fourth 1913 at exactly half past three in the morning, a volley of heavy shells and high explosives and shrapnell was thrown from the Glandelinian position to position near Crater NO.One and burst directly over the christian position.It was a signal volley and directly afterwards came a broadside from shield shield gun batteries on Morris River, and then began a fierce artillery storm which lasted all day and all night, and the greater part of the next day, with thousands of cannons in action on both sides in a most tremendous din ever heard.Certain sections of the christian position was fairly torn up by shell explosions, and thousands of tents burned and the main camps set on fire in several places.Such a fierce onslaught appeared as if it could not long be endured, but the hot guns were drawn to the rear to be cooled and fresh ones placed into position. Therefore the enemy couldn't silence the christian batteries, and finally the the tremendous cannon firing died down and all was as quiet again as before.Terrible as was the artillery storm few were Killed Killed many were wounded. Then word came to other great armies and to the Calverinian Government, and other governments of States in Southern Abbieannia, that the Abbieann disaster was really the fault of the enemy and that the reports were confirmed, the excitement was intense.Everybody looked to Emperor Vilan, for he was the head of the nation, and must decide in a crisis of this dreadful sort.This was on a Sunday though the date of the month is not given. On Monday came a proclamation calling for more immense armies to to go to the war and drive Glandelinia out of Calverinia .

The news of the real cause of Abbieann's destruction aroused the nation as no nation had ever been aroused before. It was published in the newspapers, and scattered broadcast,, and inside of three days after the news new armies were forming in all of the Calverinian States, and getting read to march to Pandora.Old uniforms were brushed up, all sorts of guns new or old obtained and cleaned and oiled, old drums reheaded and nearly every man and even boys and girls began to study soldiers and child scout manuals.It was one of the boyscout officers of the Aronburg Rangers child scouts who brought the news to Jennie Turner and Violet,and her sisters, that because of the disaster being found out Emperor Vivlan wanted as many armies to mobolize as it was possible and wanted them to do so immediately.The boyscout had been down to the Signal Station and came to Violet,and her sisters stating that the whole country was going half crazy with rage and fury against the Glandelinians.

"Captian George Spa; Spaulding has already issued an address, calling on boy and girlscouts of the Aronburg rangers to follow him on an expedition he is going to accomplish."said the boyscout Hans Gunmann"Harley johns is going, and so is young Henry Binghampton and many others.You never hear such spouting and shouting in all your life."

"Will you join the expedition Mildred Vance!"requested Jennie Turner suddenly, and her usually grave face(delace) lit up with sudden earnestness.

"I cannot say.S paulding urged me, but I said I wouldn't commit my self untill I had recieved the permission of Violet, or her sisters."

"Oh Mildred"cried Violet, and then stopped short.She did not want Mildred to go on a dangerous mission at such a critical time, and yet she wanted to see her do her duty as a girlscout.

"If you don't go Mildred I'll go--if they'll let me accompany them" Jennie Turner went on, but in rather a low tone.

"You Jennie"burst from Violet, and her sisters.

"Yes, why not Princesses. I have nothing else to do just now, and I believe I relly ought to go."

"If either of us go it will be I."said Mildred Vance, decidedly."But we will decide about it sometime to morrow."she went on, as she saw her friends were on the verge of tears. During this moment but not yet heard of by them oneof the highest officers of general Aronburgs army had gone out scouting on the enemy.The enemy gunners through field glasses had seen him and his followers and let loos loose a couple of shells, while a mad machine gun battery also opened up.Half his company was wiped out, and the generals shoulder bone was seriously torn up and he was dangerously injured elsewhere.The general was brought into camp by the terrified survivors of the company, and a soldier was sent for the general military doctor post haste.It was after midnight before the general was pronounced out of danger danger, and then the doctor announced announced that he would not be able to leave his bed for many months to come, and yet would never be able to serve in the army again.Ordinarily such an incident would have brought in right away many soldiers and officers to heartily sympathize and offer aid, but now the discovery of the enemys guilt about Abbieann, was the one subject on everybodys moind, and the general for that night was passed by, excepting by a few of the most intimate friends. and Violet,and her sisters.

It was early the next morning when Jennie Turner was down in the hi heart of the great army camp, that she was addressed about going on the expedition with Captian Spauldings Company of scouts.Robert Spaulding was a great boyscout of the Angelinia Aronburg Rangers.It was Harry Reese who addressed Jennie Turner, as he measured out some cotton goods the wounded general needed for bandages.

"Now's your chance to go out on a exciting adventure, and therefore you ought to accompany us."he said."And too your own regiment the Mascot Rangers tttttt ought to be represented, and there are lots of boy and girlscouts of the Aronburg Rangers goind besides me, Henry Coomes, Jerry Hans Howe, Martin owns and a lot more.

"I've been considering about it, Harry."answered Jennie Turner."I'll go if Violet, or her sisters will let me.They got the say and I can't do it if they object.""" ought to go, you'll have to decide pretty soon.Captian Spaulding is going to start off on the expedition some time late to morrow if not to night if he can."

Just then another young boyscout came into the Canteen.It was the Boyscout, Jerry Howe.He was an overbearing fellow, but his bragging always came out to be a true fact.He really was more game than he let bragged about.

"Hellow miss Turner."he cried."Glad to see you.They tell me you haven't joined the expedition yet.What's the matter.You'll miss the time of your life.Don't the good little Princesses let you go."

"No I'm afraid"replied Jennie, her face flushing"I

"It seems as if you're going to be let out on something good doesn't it JennieMany of the others as going.Don't be afraid. Get their permission, for I desire your company and we'll have lots of fun at the expense of the enemy.You are one of those who discovered the true nature of Abbieanns disaster and deserve the credit."went on Jerry Howe and then he moved on to another part of the store, before Jennie could say another word.But the words of Howe decided Jennie.She almost loved that dare devil boy, and come what might she must obtain permission to go on the expedition inside of the next three hours.

"Now then who is the next volunteer to go on the expedition with me. ome boys and girls, you have read of Abbieannas great disaster having been caused by the Glandelinians, you understand so how urgent is the call since that news has spread, you understand that the Glandelinian armies are concentrating in great force before our great and noble army under General Concentinian Aronburg, you understand how those same Glandelinians have taunted us, saying the "Christian dog army here"couldn't be kicked into a battle,, and you understand also whatwill the cities and towns, villiages and hamlets around us are doing, enrolling their men into his army as fast as the names can be put down. To help general Aronburg crush general Arlingtons army we must go on a daring venture at any cost and discover his intentions.Shall it be said that the Aronburg Rangers stayed out, when so many of us are called upon to do our duty.We must accomplish that expedition before the enemy starts the battle.Remember our batteries were fired on just recently. Come who is the next to volunteer for joining my expedition expedition."

The boyscout Captian Spaulding stod upon a high flat stump addressing the crowd of boy and girlscouts which had collected at the roll of the drum in the hands of the boyscout drummer boy yeas Bernard Bruce who had also volunteered to go on the expedition, although less than his nine years old.The boy scout captian had been spouting early for over half an hour, but no new volunteers had appeared.The muster roll for the expedition numbered fourty four names, and the captian wantedca hundred before starting on the scouting tour he had planned.He an did not desire to go with the whole regiment, but to enlist a certain number who would volunteer to go.Behind the captian sat a boy with the list in hand for the captian understand understood the nature of the adventure and added the scouts, and therefore he expected that many volunteers had to be caught on the fly ortheir desire would wane, andthey would not sign the enlistment paper for the exciting adventure. Bessie Beside the boy acting as committee saw Fred Bruce the brother of Bernard a verteran h who had lost his sister in the battle of Cedernin e.

"Come boys and girls.Come and sign, and see some fun with the enemy" Cried Fred Bruce, waving his boyscout hat over his head."I went to the battle of Cedernine,and my brother there is going with you.Sign I say and show the coardly enemy they'll have reasons more than ever to fear us child soldiers.Hurrah for Our Blessed Lord, and Country and our Blessed Flag of red Yellow And blue.Of if we go I'll show ye.Benny beat the drum again.Perha perhaps many of the boys and girls stand ing around here have not heard it yet..."""

And the boyscout beat the drum so loudly and vigorously that a larger crowd of boys and girlscouts began to collect.Again Captian Spaulding addressed those before him.

"Shall it be said, that the majority of us boy and girlscouts became tired of adventure, and would not wish to go out scouting to fool the enemy and help our country uphold the hand of its great Emperor?No Never.Come now and sign please, place your names on the golden roll of honor ere it is too late(domaradary Lute) Ha here is another Boyscout, our worthy Lieutenant Francis Greenbaum. Greenbaum is also a spy and a good gunner, as wel we all have seen and all heaven and creation help the Glandelinians that gets in front of him during a shooting spell. Soldiers and by and girlscout companions, a hundred cheers for our new member of the coming expedition, Francis Greenbaum."

And as Francis, a tall, thin, but nevertheless powerful boy put down in good hand writing his signature, the cheers were given with a whill will. As the boyscout stepped out of the crowd a number of others came to the front, signed their names, which then were called out, and then came a boyscout who had just i dismounted from his hose following by a girlscout who was his sister..2.2.2.2.2.222

"Collins Barrington, and his sister Henrietta."announced Captian Spaulding. "Continue the roll a rolling comrades.Now in the time forwall, remember we are in too late.Everybody all the cheers possible for brother and sister.We have now ninty nine.We want at leastt fifty one more.Come now come.Everybodee join in please."

Loud and clear from a distance distance arouse the sound of a band playing on the heated mob november air, and are the last refrain had died away, fifty more names had been added to the lit list.The echoe of the final ggggg notes yet rang from the company streets, when Jennie Turner herself slipped from her horse and mounted the platform.

"I want to sign please."she almost whispered to the one acting as the Recieving Commitee.

"Hello Jennie.Then you are reallly going to sign after all.Howe wished you'd come as tttt he desired your company very much.Captian Jennie Turner will not only sign but will lead us on the expedition.Hurrah,"""QQA

"Another.The one hundred and fiftieth."shouted Captian Spaulding.He clasped Jennie by the hand."You'll ve leading us then I suppose as you're the highest girlscout officer of all of them. Soldiers and every body, all the cheers you can for our gracious leader Jennie Francis Turner, the superior over us all boys and girls too.Hurrah."""QQA

And again and again the cheers rang out, this time with an extra will, for Jennie Turner had every one the best friendsamong soldiers and all the ttttttttt childscouts. But during all the cheering Jennie's ears detected that Jerry Howes cheers were the loudest of them all.An Almost instinctively she felt that though she had everyone friends in the army, Jerry Howe for some reasnn or other was especially attracted to her.

Jennie Turner had had an easier time than she had expected, getting Violet,and her sisters to consent to her enlistment into the expedition. The reason for that was, that Violet, and her sisters too without sign ing their names decided to go and supercntend the expedition, and felt that Jennie Turner, Angelina Richee and Susan Farrol should accompany them.They had spent the whole night in prayer too for the success of the expedition for she and her sisters understood that they would in going forth meet with great danger, and to have h their friends go and them being behind filled themwith alarm..... And even since her admittance into the girlscout troop had been called on each day to drill for six hours.She had been drilled one at a time however by Violet or any of her sisters themselves, and rapidly taught hot to "Stand at Attention"how to " ight face", "left face"" about face" "mark time" and "march.This she rapidly learned.She was not needed to be shown how to shoot, though when the Fire Fly leader at first didn't know that Susan could shoot, and was put on practice on the " Firing Range" not one of all those who were even well trained, the leader himself included could reach near as good in mmmm

"Beautiful fortunes of war."laughed Jennie." "Imagine what some of our best generals have already been forced to put up with."

"Yes and the heroes of Evangeline St Claire, Cedarnine and other big battles.Do you know what made me enlist into this exiedition.It was because Jennie Turner was determined to go.I won't allow any of my friends to go where I won't go myself."

"I'm glad our father has called Count Vonson to assume charge of the mobolization camps at Angelinia Agathia.I and my sisters want to see the general some day and instruct him ourselves? Who can see but that--- Hist who's coming now..!!!(((((("

Jennie sh stopped short as six horsemen appeared at the ridge of the smallee smaller hill just beyond the canal.The sixhorsemen wore the uniforms of and trappings of the famous Concentinian cavarlymen but sometimes enemy scout patrols would wear such uniforms for disguise. In a momont more they were leading their animals down to the canal for a "draught". Feeling that they might be a detatchment of the enemy in disguise, the two Vivian Girls started to withdraw from sig sight. but the movement came too late.But what happened made them believe they were not Glandelinians for had they been instead of the ensuing incident the Glandelinians seeing them would have urged their horses away for dear life.No one can tell why but Glandelinians have a deadly drad dread of Christian girl and boyscouts.

H"ji there you two little girlscouts"came the command and in a moment more the six cavarly men were upon them..... The men who had come so unexpectedly upon them were noble saintly appearing fellows, all well built and past middle age.Their trappings were of the finest, and by his shoulder straps Jennie saw that one of the number was a major colonel.

"Well you two most beautiful little girls, who ever you are, where are you bound?"demanded the leader of the band.

"Bound for no town in particular."answered Violet, having taken her cue from Jennie's former speech.

"No town in particularveh?Just scouting around eh.Do you intend to remain in this locality providing you're Abbieannian girlscouts as your uniform shows you to be."

"That depends."

"Would it not be possile possible that you are bound on a trip for Abbieann?"put in a second of the cavarly,en.

"Not exactly."declared Jennie."We have reasons not to go there. But just the same what if we were?"

"Well if I were in your place I wouldn't go that is all there is to it, unless you're Glandelinians in disguise.And if you were we would have to demand of you two to surrender thou gh we wouldn't desire it, as you're such beautiful little girls."

"Well we ain't going there."burst out violet, without stopping to consider.And we're as much Glandelinians as you are.."

"Are you two alone?"was the next question put.

"Can't you see that we are."was Jennie's ttttttt counter query.

"But by your uniform you belong to some company,I believe."went on the colonel."where is the rest of that Company?"

"We belong to no company even though we left one on the road somewhere.If you must have your curiousity satisfied providing you're the Concentinian patrol we see you to be. land this little girl you see are none others than two of Emperor Vivians daughters. I'm Jennie and this is Violet."

There was a moments silence.

Then the man said;

"I beg your pardon.But I didn't see that.But comes boys we cannot vain waste our time here"and havingwatered his ttttttt horse the colonel of the strangers rode off saluting in military fashion, followed by his five companions who did the same...

"Now what in the world does that mean?"demanded violet, as soon as they were left alone.....

"That is what I would desire to find out."said Jennie much disturbed.

"I wonder if those ifellows are reallly christian cavarly, and belong to a cavarly troop close at hand."?

"More than likely."

"Then suppose they were Glandelinians, wouldn't it not be possible they would go back to their command and then the whole hunt up the company and cause trouble."?

"nut. if they were Glandelinians why didn't they try to capture us."?

"Maybe they were afraid, believing we may have a troop of scouts hidden near by."

"Well we go on the tr return.??@"

"I believe one of us might. The other of us can go ahead, as Captian Spaulding directed.."

This was agreed to, and by tossing up a cent it was decided that Violet should returnto the Company, while Jennie went on as originally intended, but with increased vigilance....

In five minutes they had seperated, andJennie was ridingslowly along toward Abbieann but with no intention of going in. The road now led beside a number of what had once been farm fields where numerous child scouts of probably some other distant christian army were hard at the toil of getting in their militarydrills.Many of them eyed Violet Jennie curiously, but none questioned her. Several noting her uniform heart shaped hat, bright tricolored uniform, and gun being the same as theirs, but more splendid besides she was some ranger officer and saluted her, that was all.Tward two in the afternoon, the young child Princess, remembering the captians words,began to cast about for a good spot for the nights camp.She soon came to a patch of woods in the midst of which was a clearing, walled in by trees and this she concluded would be as good a place as any having both wood and water handy..Then she started on her return to join the company... She had proceeded for less than a quarter of a mile on the return trip, when a loud shouting, and screaming and swearing reached her ears and made her increase the speed of her pace. The shouting came from a number of voices, and the loudest of all was from some officer.

"Help, help for ouch save me.Help help.save me.shoot the critter some body. "came the cry from the officer, and then there burst into view about a dozen Glandelinian soldiers all on horses, with the officer bringing up the rear.Behind the flying squadron in deadly persuit but on foot, with long horned head lowered and to one side, and with wings half open was------a young Tuschorian Blenglomenean Creature.

"Save me save me.shoot him somebody."Yelled the officer again."Don't let the savage critter horn me."

"No one can shoot him."cried several of his companions.

"Try it yourself you are the nearest."added one."

But the officer who was a captian was too scared to fire his weapon, and when at last he did manage to pull the trigger, the ball only glanced off the creatures head.Having fired the officer threw away his gun and urged the horse on faster than ever.There was no doubt but that the blengin had it in for these Glandelinians, for his eyes were dilated with rage, and with wings half open he lumbered on with wonderful rapidity.If he had been a full grown Blengin they could not have succeeded in getting away at all.Why it didn't fly in trying to catch them Jennie couldn't understand.And Jennie couldn't help but laugh at the scene.Here were Glandelinian soldiers soon to fight in a battle tattle flying from a young Blenglomenean Creature.What would they do in the face of an armed battery.The Glandelinians managed to save themselves in time by flying through into the woods where the trees were to close together for the creature to follow.It then saw Jennie, and was going to charge her, but then its eye caught the color of her uniformand hat, and also her size, and therefore it quit and finally flew away. A little later after this Jennie came within reach of her company.Nothing more had been seen of the strange cavarly men but as soon as the expededitionary force went into camp a strict guard was set,that there might be no surprise during the night.Several of the army tents had been brought along,and these and the blankets were alll the protection at hand but even these were better than some of the accomo accommodations experienced in the past.The army of scouts had just about retiref retired and Jennie was about fast asleep when a sudden shot in the direction of the open roadway set the camp in immediate commottion.A strange farmer had tried to pass the guard and the soldier had fired as a signal for assistance.With Jennie Vivian then again assuming herself the head of the company went out to meet the intruder withher company drawn up behind her,the farmer appeared rather disconcerted. Yet he had enough courage to state(and they could see the man was reallly crazy) that he was Jennie's father, and he wanted to find out what the boy and girlscouts was going to do with her since they had made her a prisoner.

"I am nobodys prisoner, and you're surely not my father."returned Jennie.

The man started to break down and cry like a baby accusing them all of being cussed Glandelinian soldiers, stealing his only daughter, and though they still more insisted they were not, he raved all the more, and they were at a loss at what to do untillthe mans wife came running up.She by her own ways managed to get the man started for home and then she explained matters to Jennie and the rest.Her Husbands mother, and father lived in Abbieann.Their only little daughter about the size of Jennie went to Abbieann to see her grand parants, and since the disaster she had never returned.She told them the news of the disaster and the failure of their little girls return unbalanced her husbands mind, and that every little girl he sees the size of Jennie, he believes is his daughter. Otherwise he was absolutely harmless, and outside of that acted perfectly normal.The woman told this with tears in her eyes.

This brought again to the minds of Jennie and Violet, of what the enemy had done, and what they were now threatened to do in this locality because Glandelinia's guilt had been discovered. Violet and Jennie from their hearts felt sorry for the woman and the half insane husband and prohibed that if it were possible an investigation would be made finding out if they really perished or not.(They did not. The farmers mother and father and his little daughter were not in Abbieann at the time, but couldn't return home because the disaster cut of all communications, and there was no way of sending a message either.)

"It seems to Glandelnia to be an easy way to win the war."said Captian Spaulding."If we can get the report of the disasters cause way up to Abbiannia soon enough the whole country sure will be aroused... .. ...!""""

One of the ruined viloi villinges believed to have been in the possession of the enemy had been passed by a circuitious route, and now the company went down the most direct road tward Abbieann.Everybody still felt fresh and none complained of the long ride.Once they encountered a slight conflagration amongst some forests, but otherwise there was no danger anywhere.It was on this morning that word reached the company through several christian long distanced scouts that trouble had occured at Greenbaum city between the citizens and some glandelinian military troops that were passing through the city, from one town to the other..

A mob had collected, big fence boards, clubs, hot water, stones and even shattered glance and a shoe of dishes had been used, old shoes, rotten tomatoes, and other decayed fruit, and a sharp conflict had ensued ending in the death and wounding of a number of both sides.This trouble had green baum had continued untill three or four days had passed, when the Glandelinian general Turpen took possession of the city and placed it it under strictest military rule.By this it will be seen that the inhabitants had heard of the disaster being glandelinia mde, made and later on the inhabitants had secured hold of military arms, and had them almost massacred the glandelinians in possesson of the city, and captured general Turpen and mistreated him badly. The news from Greenbaum made Captian Spaulding declare that the citizens were aroused o ver the news of the discovery, but that nevertheless he would have to be more vigiliant than ever for four of enemy patrol parties, and four or five advance guards were sent out to watch.At a little ruined place called Robin Red Breast Junction the company was attacked by a small party of glandelinian boy and girlscouts, who threw stones and clods of mud and tried to throw dut into their eyes, but these enemy child scouts fled at the first order from Jennie Vivian herself to halt and take aim. Robin Red Junction passed the little band rode through a real Abbieann devastated disaster stormed country for the Abbieann district.Up to this time since the encounter whwith the enemy child scouts, nothing had been heard of the cavalry men Jennie and violet had met. But now about just time for the morning meal(breakfast but how fast) Jerry Rowe (the cow) one of the advance guards sent out, came riding tward the company as fast as his horse could go.

."I saw a big squadron of cavarly and it's hard to tell whether they're Glandelinians or not."he gasped."They are on the road, a hundred or more strong and are coming this way.If they're Glandelinians let's try and capture ca pture the whole bunch.".

"Rowe"e jaculated Jennie Vivian almost reproachfully."you don't know what you are saying .Don't be so rash."

"But Princess Jennie,they are only a hundred strong, we are stronger in number, and all well armed---and---and-----"

"Enough, they are riding this way?"

"Yes princess."

"Very well that is sufficient.Take your place in the ranks.Company halt."

"But Princess, we could try and capture------"

"Well you do the capturing then"said violet almost smiling."you are positively the most rash boyscout I ever met met."

Without a word more Jerry went to his place, heartily sorry that it was in the second and not the first division of the command.He trembled from head to foot with excitement, and hoped ardently he himself could force the whole party to surrender.Had they really been glandelinians there is no doubt he might have made the attempt as he was really a little dare devil and would dare anything for the excitement of it.

Another of the guards now returned.It was Moses Johnson and he had remained long enough to ascertain that the cavarly numbered less than one hundred and eighty six men, but all were well armed.That they were the Winkie Abyssinkilian cavarly he was positively certain, for they wore the Abbieannian uniform and their horses trappings also showed it and the religious standards, something which no glandelinian would carry under any conditions.Also theywore the big almost Roman sort of hats of red colors.

"I left John Maxwell, and Welsh toms behind."said Moses."They are going to watch, and see if any more of the cavarly are on the way.I wish we could get them to come along as our escort.is could then scout further and go as near as Abbieann."

"How far off are the christian cavarly.."

"Not more than half a mile Princess."

Very good.Return to the lines.Company attention.Forward March."came the command. Captian Spaulding wondered if Jennie was reallly going to retreat leaving glandelinians in disguise, but he did not have to wonder long.They stood waiting in the middle of the road, and a great cloud of dust soon id indicated the approach of the cavarly, and in a minute more they rode swiftly into sight.As they came closer Jennie noted that the major colonel she had conversed with at the canal was at their head. The boy and girlscouts were not discovered untill the two commands were less than three hundred feet apart,for the cavarly had not expected meeting any one in the road, and had no guard in advance. The instant the child scouts were sighted, the captian callled a halt. There was a few ce seconds of consultation, then the cavarly leader rode forward holding up a white handkerchief.. At Jennies command, Captian Spaulding with his own handkerchief over his shoulder, went forward to meet him. The two saluted in true military style.

"That company is that?"demanded the Red coat officer.

"The Fire Fly Volunteer boy and girlscout scouting troop,Abbieannian army from Concentinian Aronburgs camp, unattached.What cavarly is that?"

"General Gladerlinia's Light mounted Brigade, unattached for the present on a patrol of Abbieannia"the last words with pevuliar emphasis. "That are you child scouts doing out here,and where where are you going if I may satisfy my curiousity,?"

"Spy scout and so forth around Abbieann.And you?"

"On the return to the army."

"Any news sir?"

"Yes, the enemy is concentrating heavily upon general Aronburg."

Then came a pause.Both leaderw , the colonel and the boyscout captian looked each other squarely in the eyes...2.2.2.

"Do you believe you'll meet trouble on the road captian?"asked the Red coated officer, with a smile.

"I'm not looking for trouble with the enemy, colonel, but I'm ready to meet the Glandelinians if they come."

"Are the enemy holding this road anywhere?"

"I cannot say sir.I hope not.It was perfectly clear when we came.If they are we'll have to cut our way through I suppose.If you have time sir we would desire you to act as our escort."

"Glad to do so boy captian.It'll be a wise move on your part."

Again the two saluted, and each went back to his command. In a minute mor more the cavarlymen first rode by, their sabres clanking loudly. They then halted to wait for the boy and girlscouts to file in front. They were certainly a fine body of men.Then the whole column now were in motion, and the wagon followed also.Jerry Rowe himself began to murmur and wanted to know, why for once they had not been Glandelinians so they all could have blown the heads off of every rascally gray coat in the vun bunch.Everybody laughed at this , and Moses himself said;

"Jerry I believe you're possessed."If we ever get to shooting at a party of glandelinians I suppose youlll be the first to charge them before the order to re do so and we'll have to rush to your rescue. I dearly hope you're not as rash as you seem to be."

As they went onward still they found some other companies of child scout patrols being of Mascot Rangers, and Aronburg Burroughs, and others and then campe uponanother huge wing of the christian army on the once flood swept ground near the subburbs of Abbieann.

Throughout the whole christian army the cry was""Remember Abbieann" and it was feared by general Arlington that the christians themselves might come storming forward at any time.but it seemed general Arlinton was alive to the situation, and as more and more troops were coming in, the city of Abbieann itself was well fortified against an attack, and that danger for the time being averted.

"Hurrah hurrah comrades, Vivian Girl Princesses, the Glandelinland armies in two battles are whipped again.Just got the news from a signal station.General Viviania whipped the enemy at a battle near Maximillian defeating a glandelinian general called Jamerline last month on the four teenth.Hurrah.Same christian Leader with the help of Wei wienstien whips the enemy also at Jennie Wren Town.didn't I tell you the enemy couldn't always stand up against general Viviania.My but don't I just wish I had been in those territories to see the battles."

And Angeline Richee rushed into the Vivian girls sitting room pell-mell throwing her military hat into the air, and giving violet,and her sisters acha hug in her delight."General Viviania is my father.Hurrah for him."

Viviania and Wienstien victorious in two battles."Repeated violet and her sisters inunison."Is it really true Angeline.Then if it is Big Girlswood is menanced at last."

Violet recieved the newspaper Angeline Richee had brought in from the signal station.Yes it was true, as the great heavy had headlines proved, Maximillian and Jennie Wrenpown had been wrested from the enemy again, and the two Glandelinian Generals had departed for the south,

...Beauty confused and disgraceful and also disastrous retreat, and all of Calverinia was mad with joy....?.?.?.

"I wonder what Jennie Turmor will say to that?"

"She saw the battles, and so did we."said Violet and her sisters to the surprise of Angeline Riches. "But we didn't believe the news could come here so soon.

"But then"continued Angeline" I wonder what Penrod, Croveton and others we left at Vivian Wickey will say to that when they hear of it,"and she turned to Susan Farrol who was glancing over the shoulders of Violet and her sisters."HE A had become somewhat discouraged recently but I Gertrude Angeline, and others told him right along we'd whip again if it came to more fighting."

"Well it produces many battles to constitute a whole war, Angeline"re plied Jennie Turmer."And Penrod,and his scouts understands that as well as we do."

"They're not such tremendous victories either, for I and my sisters saw and did things in both battles."observed Joice."General Tumerline at Maximillian was almost surrounded by series of great christian leaders under not only Vivania, but various other great leaders, and the enemy had to fight to save himself being cut off from the Abbieann River for six months before the battle. I wonder what the Calverinian authorities will do next, especially to the glandelinian generals in chief."

"Theywon't do much I'm sure"declared Jennie Turmor"I believe the say ing is true, they can't be kicked into a fight with us unless their armies are bigger than ours.I spied on Manley once not long ago and I in overhearing his words, heard him kick a whole lot about his government being "stingy" witharmies.Even at Maximillian and Jennie When town they stood on the defensive.My sisters wrote to me about those battles, Francis and Joan for they saw the conflicts too."

Violet, and her sisters listened, and their faces grew red.. They could not eat the horror of Abbieann out of their minds.

"We are in grave danger nevertheless"said Jennie" "Maybe it will be a long time before glandelinia is fully aroused, but when they are aroused, they--she did not finish.

"Oh pshaw."Weill whip the glandelinian armies out of their boots in due time"see if we don't." ejaculated Angeline Richee.

"Why you ought to hear the conversation down at the signal stations and in the army canteens during Mess Time.All of the army if fairly wild over the news, and Fred Mason ,one of the brothers of little Edie Mason, are plan n boyscout with Sen unny his elder brother, decide to organize a company of boyscouts if "they" can have them, and captian Fred is going to try to fit out some girlscouts too n and have his sister Edie be lieu captian.I'm going to superentend them, as Fred and his brother are such good boys despite being foriegn"And Angeline Richees eyes beamed at the prospect. Violet, and her sisters said nothing, but as she thought of all the dangers her boy and girlscout followers may have to face yet throughout the war her their eyes filled with tears, and they had to turn away.There had been throughout the nation also a proclammation call ing for boy and girls to join the christian army as scouts, the call being a most urgent one, and aroused all elder boys and girls to their highest pitch.They were told, and indeed it was true, that if they joined they were far safer from the enemy, and from the danger of massacres committed by the enemy within the christian lines than home, and not only that, wherever children gathered many men who were well acquainted with child scouts in the army, told them that instead of just being safe from the enemy in the armies, all those well organized scouts were dreaded no dreaded from or by the enemy, that only on the most neccessarily extreme conditions would parties of the enemy dare even so much as even engage them in a fight.Military companies of boys and girls were then forming everywhere, and young and elder ones who could get in went forth to help be the heads of various christian armies that were without them.The enthusiasm of the child scouts was as great as if they had been turning themselves into a great and exciting game.

It was understood that the third brother of Edie Mason Mason could not go as a boyscout. When even with his now crippled arm he might have joined the purroughs, of General Aronburgs army, his general condition was such that his mother and father would not for one moment entertain the idea of his leaving the refugee camps for any such purpise.

"you can help the christian generals enough without being on e in our crippled condition."his mother would say."and besides in your condition you couldn't get in if you tried.They want able bodied boys and girls.And Gertrude Angeline as they call her, who is the high st head of all girl and boyscouts in the wholevnation is very strict about that too.Let all the others join in and se the war through.You're safe enough here anyhow, as you're within the heart of the army and that's the strongest."

"I feel as if I ought to go."he would plead,but she would shake her head,and then he would remain silent.

There had also came news of how elsewhere the christians had won small victories, and this made Edi Mason grow impatient.Captian Henny had begun to form his boyscout mounted troop and his youngger brother watched them ttitttdiy wistfully as they went through their drill onthe Company Street.

"Father I'm going to join if they'll have me whether my arm is all right or not, and that is all there is to it."the youngest boy said at last."If I don't go they'll have a bad name for us Foriegners and also they'll call me a coward, and I want to go awfully bad.I've got a horse and money enough to buy trapping, and th ey supply swords, and there's no reason why I should stay in the army camp.Every boy and girl scout who passes by always looks queerly at me."

At this his fathers eyes glistened.

"I understand the feeling Andy"he said.I've been thinking it over a good deal,too. Since I cannot go into the army as a soldier because of my age I don't see why you cannot---even despite your mothers consent or no consent, because they'll draft you boys later on if necessary."

At first Mrs Mason could not even bear the thought of it.But then way from vivian wickey there came a letter from Penrod, telling of how things were going on down there, and that he had recruited many boys and girls to the command, and that little Jannie Francis Lillian had been sent from General Vivanias vivanites to join for the time being his own Twtttth Fourthy Ninth Degree Rangers. The little was written by Penrod however to the Masons in English instead of Abbieann, so in case the letter got waylaid or captured by the enemy the glandelinians would not under any conditions be able to guess head or tails of it.Penrod wrote that Angelinia Aronburg was just coming to the camp now from the hospital, and requested to be remembered to Edie and her smaller sister, and to her brothers and the rest, and Penrod had added that Gertrude supposed that Edie, and her brothers ought to have joined as girl and boy scouts by now and enjoy some adventure.The letter was very friendly and close ed by hoping the danger now threatening Big Girl Knool would be soon passed.

This was the last letter which passed between Penrod, and the Mason family for a number of days to come.

"You see how it is"said Andy Mason as he handed the lettter to Edie mother after reading it over threeen t imes,. Even Penrod and his scouts hopes I would go.My arm will be better before long.The Doctor said so yesterday.How ca n you let me stand here in the face of that? Why don't you let me show that I am at least as brave as any of these beautiful and good Abbieannians are... t.ttttt"

This indeed was Andys clinching argument.Mrs Masons Irish pride would not permit her to retain her son at home, when so many Abbieannian boys and girls were already serving as boy and girlscouts in the army,she consented that night, and Andy had enr enrolled under Captian Henny his brother the very next morning... The boy and girlscout re ciments Hunny and his sister Edie were forming were called the "Dashing Purples" and each boy and girl was required to cloth themselves in a purple coat of a certain beautiful military design, with a heart shaped ribbed hat to match.At first it was thought to seat every boy and girl on a brown horse, but this was found impossible in the short space of time allowed for equipment, and the boys and girlscouts therefore rode such horses as they were able to obtain.

It was suspected by a very one that not only at Abbieann but the Glandelinian forces were also gathering at Abbieann Junction, a place about ten miles west of the ruined city, and a most important point from the fact that two of the principal northern Abbiannian railroads repaired since the flood met there.It was this gathering at Abbieann Junction that made general Concentinian Aronburg be.l believe that an attack on his army was close at hand.Soon came the day for Andrew Mason to join th army.The whole christian camp was gaily decorated--as much so as before.There were flags and buntings in abundance but the Glorious Abbieann ian National lag had been replaced by the dreaded battle flag. Instead the red and green bordered battle flag was unfurled with a blue center, for the Abbieannian National flag with the beautiful religious picturing on it was never carried into battle, as they did not wish to expose the figure of the sacred Heart to even the slightest insult to the enemy.It would take about fifty glandelinians to capture such a flag from one single Abbieann ian, and even then they'd have to slay him first. The many boy and girlscout troop on horse made a most impos ing appearance as they often rode down the company street eight ttttt abreast,the horses prancing gaily to the trumpet notes of the bugler. Shout after shout went up, which continued untill the boy and girl scouts were out of sight in a cloud of dust.

"I'm glad we're going to see some excitement soon."remarked one of the old timers to Andy Mason as they cantered along."I'm I've been itching to get at the Glandelirian finy fiends ever since the war began.."

The young boyscouts name was Roy Swearington.His father was an officer in the christian army, and both boys had become right away on the best of terms, for never could you find a quarrelsome Abbieannian of any sort. Leroy Swearington had traveled much since he entered the army as a boy scout, and a rough outdoor life just suited him.

"I'll be glad when we can be doing something."answered Andy, as he [illegible] upon Pennie affectionately upon the head."I wonder how [illegible] General Aronburgs army here will be clashing with the enemy in [illegible]."

"That will depend altogether upon our own leaders.General Aronburg doesn't wish to be the aggressor as he says the disaster di destroying such a holy city as Abbieann and her neighbors has b made this territory consecrated ground..I understand St Johns Ferry had been captured by general Fellington.That will give general Aronburg and his army a lot of guns and ammunition from the arsenal."

"Yes, and a victory at St Francis Creek will still be more important. But I do hate to see a battle fought here."

"By the way,about how about that Penrod boyscout friend of yours."I went on,stroy Be Swearington."What does he think of things now?"

"Oh he and his commands are still at Marischanicinig or whatever you call that place near Vivian Wickby.He won't move untill further orders. He waits for Gertrude to give her decision, and she gave her orders that she's going to remain there with her regiment untill Mildred Manning who was shot from behind through an open window recovers.Penrod wrote to me on that fact."

"Th..h shoot her in the back through an open window.I believed the Clandelinians were mean, but that seems beyond me.Was Penrod not enugger nther."?

"I should say not"answered Andy."My sister dEdie when she read of that in the letter sat at a window and cried nearly all day.War is one thing, but shooting a little girlscout in a cowardly manner is another thing. I wish I had been the commander of that Vivianite division of girlscout girlscouts. I'd have shot those cowards whether she died or not."

"I suppose that would have been justified, a Andy, but then she did not do so.Hettie Kauffmann is the head leader of that division but she was away at the time.I've heard she's awfully passionate against the Clandelinians and had she been there they'd have not got off so easy I'll tell you..But if I had them they'd have died before the firing squad whether Mildred died or not."concluded Leroy Swearington."

This section of the christian lines was full of rescued child slaves, and it had been whispered about that there was fear of the main brunt of the enemy assaults coming at this section should a battle be opened. For this reason every section of this part of the position was strongly fortified, and every movement of the enemy had been watched closely night and day.The boyscout Hunny Mason himself had been in general Aronburgs headquarters, and he was playing a game of chess with his two sisters, some Abbieannian boyband girlscouts, and they had been winning the game on him when he suddenly threw the chess board aside, waving the others to be suddenly silent.They heard the sound of a violent struggle in the f reception room below the room he and his friends were occupying.Hunny hurried below to find a colonel struggling desperately and valiantly in the grasp of two burly but tall and one very short fellow who evidently were spies.He had never seen them before but again they were the Mutt and Jeff Professional spies.How they do travel from one point to another.

"Let go you rascal."gasped the Colonel."Let go or I'll shout you down as if you were a mad dog."

"Don't you let go of the Angolinian officer Hero."put in the short fellow" or I'll slay you alive. We is in this to the end, remember. We'll get the plans if we have to go through perdition to do so."

"I ain't letting the Christian dog go"replied Hero."Now Master Colonel you stop that noise or I'll hit you over the head with my pistol butt.We have seen you put that plan around here som ewhere and we is bound to have it.We get paid for this job and we do it.Where's that plan.Shoot it or I'll assassinate you."

"You---you--- International scoundrels."cried the colonel but even as he finished the pistol butt descended and the colonel fell to the floor badly dazed from the blow upon the head.The smaller man carried a long heavy rifle an with a bayonet attached and he leveled it at the prostrate colonel with the purpose to run the bayonet th rough him, but at this moment Hunny leaped into the sitting room followed by the other sc scouts.On coming down he had caught up his sabre and observing the situation at a glance, he advanced upon the two Spies.

"Stop where you are."he commanded"Stop, unless you want your heads blown off."And the other scouts stood behind h im scowling.His words nearly dumfounded the International spies, who had supposed the colonel to be alone, the others having been out scouting.Both stared hard but did not flinch or move an inch.Bad as they were these two men were b old when to dare devil recklessness themselves. themselves.

"Who in the name of Neptune are you boyscout?"finally demanded the short man who appeared so much as if he was Jeff in the funny papers.

"Never you mind," he l am"replied Hunny."Drop your weapons at once. You are my prisoners."

"I won't argue with you.Drop your weapons."

Instead of doing this however the two spies made for the doorway leading for the outside.By this time the Colonel had partly recovered, and was trying to stagger to his feet.

"Don't let them get away."He cried."They're professional Clandelinian spies, and have tried to rob me of my plans."

"Stand where you are or I will fire at you, and I'll command the others to do the same."said Hunny Mason.And now he exhibited a pistol he had brought along.

"Yes, yes go ahead and shout at me."yelled the taller fellow in a rage."Go ahead and shout."

"Hero you is a fool."howled the smaller fellow."Come on is if you are going with me.Remember if we fail now we'll not get our money.Take that youbrats."

As the last words were uttered, the tall fellow launched forth the heavy rifle he carried.His aim was for the child scouts, and had not Eddie Mason dodged in a hurry she might have suffered a crushed head.As it was the rifle butt grazed her ear, went over the head of the other scouts in a cartwheel performance, and then went crashing through a closed window carrying away the whole frame and all the glass with it, and landing some fourty feet on the ground outside, and in the very midst of a cavalry troop that was riding by, knocting one of the man off his horse and slightly injuring him.

The child scouts rushed to the window."

"Fire at the scoundrels.Hey you cavarly men.Stop those two they're spies."

And as the words were yet on his lips, when the child scouts pulled the trigger to their pistols just as the two on horses were dashing away.The tall man was hit in the shoulder, but not seriously injured, and the next moment both spies had fled down the company street with the cavarly in full pursuit.

In the camps at his section, Hunny or his friends had never experienced any adventure with Clandelinian spies or detectives or any other agents who operate for their own armies, for all outer sections of the christian lines were unusually weel weil guarded.To be sure they had heard of minor diff iculties from time to time, and there was not a boy or girl in the scout troops of various regiments who would not have been willing to lay down his or her life for the capture of any clandelinian spy.

To come in contact then, with such rascally spies as these dirty wicked foriegners was to the boyscout much of a great surprise, and having seen the two spies dash away down the company street on horseback he for a that is Hunny for a seconed second or so stood still, forgetting what to do untill his little sister Edie caught h im by the arm.

"Come we must stop them.I'm afraid they have the colonels plans, and their horses are so swift they'll easily outdistance the persuing cavarly and will try to get out of the christian lines if they can."Burst from her lips.

Out he sped, and his sisters and the Abbieannian scouts followed close upon his heels.The report of the rifles, and the smashing of the window and the glass had aroused the entire camp in that neighborhood, and a crond of soldiers and boy and girlscouts had rushed out into the company streets many demanding to know what was the trouble. Matters were easily explained and soon more than twenty men on the fastest fastest horses were in he the saddle in persuit of the two spies. One soldier who had been coming on the return from a scouting tour had seen the two riding down a side park path leading due south ttttttd westward, and it was in that direction the persuing party headed headed, spreading out over open fields that the spies might not double on their trail, and escape in that manner.The colonel wanted to follow them with bloodhounds, but not a dog of any breed was handy.

"Just let me catch them."he cried in his excitement."Those foriegners aiding against us just for money w ought to be flayed alive.Their hearts are as hard as the devils."

The persuit was continued untill the persuers got too dangerously close to the enemys lines, and found themselves suddenly under heavy fire, and two of them were killed and six wounded..It was then discovered impossible, and worse than that they were now the persued as an immense squadron of clandelinian cavarly came thundering forward yelling upon them to halt and surrender.They were Scoodliers.

Therefore after opening a return fire the christian troopers returned post haste to their command persued by the Clandelinian cavarly all all the way.This was the only incident of note which occured before the battle of Abbieann.Arriving to their camp again the boy and girlscouts who had headed the persuit immediately went into quarter.Their own camp was in a large orchard of trees which had borne their best fruit years before, and which were now consequently good for nothing else but firewood.The main body of the Abbieannian army was stationed along a good length of the Abbieann River, and also along a smaller stream called Rose Red Run but there were also large divisions of troops at Abbieann Junction and St Johns Courthouse situated between the junction of the two streams, and also many immense detatchments at St Monica and elsewhere, it being one of the legent christian armies ever mustered in the war yet.

In order to strengthen the position at Abbieann River it was decided to throw up extra high breastworks and this was done under the orders of General Concentinian Aronburg who had now under him a force of nearly eighty million men. Abbieann River was a wide sluggish stream of water, very deep and flowing between deep steep banks, and through a heavily forested country.For the scenery at places it was a cousin t stream to Sunbeam Creek.Its winding course contained many beautiful fords and many long strong bridges.The Christian army occupied about twenty eight miles of the western shore of this beautiful stream and also occupied seven of the beautiful fords, and ten of the bridges by throw ing up high sedums and redums of dirt, and brushwood and sand..Every soldier that had a chance to do so set to the toil as if they were any common day laborers.Many of the boyscouts even joined in this the toil having gone through for nearly half a month before this time, and though the had ached on may many a soldier and their hands also almost blistered no one complained.
Once a new report came in of a Glandelinian massacre of children somewhere.
"Do they call that fighting."queen Farrol grumbled."They war more on children than any one else it seems.I wish I"------ she did not finish but heaved a big sigh.
"Never mind queen "said the boyscout Leroy Swearington to cheer her. "General Aronburgs army will be soon fighting this Glandelinian army here before long and we'll all show our mettle to better advantage, and show them a thing or two.I heard some of the officers saying that more Glandelinian soldiers are advancing to support general Arlington.If they come we ought to give it to them red hot."
"They can't advance any too soon for me."Growled Susan with a pout. Even with the toil on the defensed drilling went on and had continued on without interruption.Sometimes they had drilled in company, then with other detatchments, and finally would come the grand drill of the various divisions. The drilling had not always been done on or in open fields or on roads, or in the company streets, but among the trees, and on rough ground, and often fences had to be jumped and streams forded. It was not play but hard work, yet the boy and girlscout recruits loved that sort of drill.
"It's a gay life(wife) to be on the saddle , dashing here and there" queen observed to Angeline Richee."If only the Glandelinians would appear and give us a little more excitement.I wonder if they're going to wait for general Aronburg to start the battle?"
The breastworks along the Abbieann stream completed advance guards were sent out along the river just above Abbieann.Then the Angelinians sent their engineers along Abbieann Heights to survey the territory and to report of the advisability of planting a strong battery there.Some of the christian leaders were positively certain that such a battery could successfully shell Abbieann and to compell the Glandelinian general and his troops within the ruins to flee for their lives. The only trouble was,could they hold such a position?Not not extra Glandelinian forces come down upon them from the upper Abbieann River and cut them off from their strong base of supplies, and from Abbieann proper.The quest ion was answered before the christian generals had time to act upon their idea.That day a Glandelinian officer, while in a boat near the foot of Abbieannian Heights,, discovered a number of uniformed men in purple hiding about among the stones and brush.The Glandelinian officer happened to have a powerful spy glass with him, and using this he discovered that one of the men was general Concentinian Aronburg himself.Concentinian Aronburg had been laying out fortifications, and the Glandelinian officer lost no time in reporting to general Arlington to that effect.
General Arlington saw at once that this effort on the part of the christian generals must be stopped instantly, or Abbieann would be at the mercy of the christian armies.Orders were accordingly given for three divisions of the Glandelinian troops to cross the river without delay, and go into position on the opposite opposite shore and a terrible chain of batteries were to cover their movements if necessary. The advance from Abbieann was made at three oclock at night..Three wide long bridges crossed the Abbieann River at this point, and a big column of the glandelinian army passed over each, while a third division detatched remained on vessels for Abbieann Junction, a short distance below Abbieann Height. As soon as the Abbieannian generals heard of the approach of the glandelinian troops, they hastily threw forward three divisions of troops to oppose their advance, and artillery was sent forward to shell every approach to Abbieann Heights.The glande linian advanced therefore was halted to a standstill.The batteries of the enemy opened a drum drum fire but without effect excepting to cause the cavalry to appear as if it may have been an imitation of the devastation of Mt Pelee in St Martinique.
Jennie Turner herself was writing a shoy short letter to Penrod when the sudden rolling thunder of so many Glandelinian cannon and the response of christian guns made her leap to her feet.In a few seconds Angeline Richee came rushing into the tent....22 made all Jennie."Its a declaration.I believe the battle is begun."

"Oh!, there it is!"burst from Jennie Turner's lips.
"It's not here too.Across the river I do somewhere I believe.
"Look on."Said off Angeline Richee ran, with Jennie Turner at her heels. The company Streets were crowded with soldiers, on foot and on horse back (pluck in the black), scurring in all directions.From violet Vivian herself the two girlscout chieftians soon learned that the Glande linian army or a part of it was trying to obtain possession of the christian side of the shore, and that the enemy's attempts was being met with resistance of a considerable virile violence.The various commands of the enemy violet said, as she had observed through her spy glass had been divided into three parts, and the Corsdown Volunteers were being attached to the Zimmermannian Division and some other columns bound by boat for St Johns Ford.He told the two that the enemy as far as she observed had used up some two hours and a half in getting ready for this move, and that all efforts was being made to stop them.Though there was violent artillery firing, there was no infantry action, though near Abbieann Junction there did come the sound of heavy rifle firing.
As the three girls watched, they could observe that the trip of the landelinians down the stream itself did not take long.Company Company after company by dozens made efforts to get ashore but met considerable opposition, opposition enough to prevent their intention being fulfilled.
Having seen what was going on, general Hansonia Johnstonia of general Aronburgs command caused his troops near the Junction , while he sent electricians and engineers with the inentio inan intention of cutting off all communications with the Glandelinian army--certainly a very clever movement indeed.The boy and girlscouts going forth to see the trouble, soon found themselves not far from one of the telegraph offices for which Angeline Richees was bound.They had become detatched from the main bot body of boy and girlscouts, but incentally exposed themselves to some of the enemys shell fire, but no one was hit the shells either exploding too high in the air or too far behind.
This seemes to be a bloodless victory."said one of the boyscouts whose name was Harry, who stood next to Jennie Turner.
Jerrie Turner smiled, and then she nodded her head in the direction where Jennie Rowe Howe lay.He was lying behind a high stone aiming his rifle at some of the enemy in one of the boats but the range was not just right and he was only wasting his bullets.
"You'll not get dreadfully reckless when a real battle comes on."said Harry, and then came the command from Jennie Vivian for silence in the ranks, and nothing further was said... A little later the command marched past a abandoned signal station.From the top waved a Glandelinian national flag, within the now christian position--a flag which General Aronburg and his staff had often seen from a window in his headquarters.
"That flag ought to come down."whispered Jennie Turner.She had scarcely spoken when down the street came Hunny Mason, accompanied by three or four of this command.The boyscout also had noted the flag, and now he called for Volunteers to go up to the platform of the signal station tear down the flag and put the Abbieannian banners up in its place.
At the call one of the boyscouts volunteered, and ran up the ladder to the platform.Here the flag was brought down and the Abbieannian flag amid the cheers of those below soon waving in its place.With the captured colors wound over his arm the boyscout descended amid the crowd.He had just reached to the middle of the station, when a shell, a high explosive variety called gang gang shells, exploded directly at the foot of the station.There was a terrific crash as of a volcano of immense size blowing to pieces, fifty soldiers were killed outright outright fourty yards away from the station, ten child scouts, too and five hundred wounded, and the whole station was literally rendered into flying fragments, the boy, and the two flags and all first going high into the air, and then all falling to the ground in a cloud of smoke and wreckag . This gallent boyscout leader Francis Matts was killed instantly. The little girl Edie Mason standing clse close by as seriously injured, and so were her two brothers.
The destruction of the station caused the wildest confusion and panic. "Everybody here is shot down.Helpmeame the cry from many, and then another shell hit directly ito the middle of the company street exploding with fatal effect, this time killing two hundred soldiers and wounding a thousand.
The only way to stop this was for every one not in action to get out of the dangerous territory as fast as possible, and as they went they carried their wounded and dying soldiers, and child scouts may still under fire..The excitement in the whole territory was for a time intense and not only the soldiers, but also the various regiments of child scouts and cavarly troop had all they could do to restore order, and thus prevent further disaster.A battery of heavy guns were brought up and answered the fire of that deadly glandelinian battery which had got the range so effectually.

the death of that darling boyscout and of so many others especially those of so many soldiers by those two gun-firing shells was an awful shock to Jennie Turner.It was the first boyscout leader too of high position who had been slain and she shuddered when later on she gazed at the cold set face of the dashing boyscout, whose unusally beautiful and arriving uniform of purple orange and yellow had made him more dashing than ever.But it was not Johnie Turners first taste of grim war, but nevertheless this was one of the worst.

The Glandelinians having failed to take possession of the ground on the opposite shore, made a strong demonstration tward the Abbieann Junction on the Evangeline St Claire railroad, while on the christian side the boy and girlscout regiments not being yet needed to do anything partic ular were sent back to their own quarters to remain there for a possible call from the upper Abbieann Stream.. There was some considerable action in the locality of Abbieann Junction, but the firing though continious heavy and stead did not decrease or increase. It was during this moment that Jennie Turner heard of Emperor Vivian and no one could but help imagine what a tremendous responsibility now rested on the shoulders of the nations great ruler since the true facts of Abbieann was discovered.

"He's got more of a load than any one of us would have a desirevto carry."said Jennie Turner to Angeline Richee."With the eyes of so many nations upon him, and also of our own nation watching hi him he canUt cannot afford to make a mismove now."

"You are right Jennie."I would rather be as I am than be in His place now."

"If I was the Emperor I would soon put an end to Glandelinia" blustered Jerry Howe, who had overheard the conversation.."

"Would you indeed Jerry!"answered Jennie Turner curiously."How could you do it pray."

"Never mind I'd do it gradually but surely, and that'll be enough for Glandelinians to find out."and Jerry moved off fearful of being pinned down to some plan of campaign.

"Jerry is some queer boy."murmured Angeline Richee."Yet he is a dare devil at heart, yet how he loves to brag.He would do more than he'd brag about if he could.I seen once when two Glandelinians surprised him from the rear and ordered him to surrender.Before I could go to his rescue with some of my boy followers, he let one foot fly into the stomach of the man nearest him, doubling him up, and brought his small sabre down upon the head of the other killing him. Before the other Glandelinian could recover his wind, the boy had pulled out his two pistols, and believe me a few minutes afterwards he marched into camp with that Glandelinian soldier holding his hands high in the air.That boy is a miracle."

"Bernard Bruce was explaining to me about him."said Jennie Turner."

"He says Jerry put on a chance one, time, entered the enemys lines disguised as a child slave, got captured, and put to work amongst them and later was missing with the whole crowd, and several Glandelinian child slave drivers and the enemys most important plans.Jerry always did love to brag about that event afterwards.He longs to do such a thing again when he has the chance.He said that he feels as if he wants to cry whenever he dreams of how the child slaves are suffering....."

"He ought to have some sort of promotion."concluded Angeline Richee."He sure is a game lad, despite all his bragging.And what he usallybbrags about he goes and does."

"He ought to have his name chaned to changed to "HJohnny Doit"said Jennie.....

Having been frustrated of their attemp to take possession of Abbieann Heights, the Glandelinian troops at once began to form into more aggree aggressive lines, but for a time the danger to the christian lines at that point was passed. But it was evident the enemy were going to launch a fierce and savage onslaught, for more artillery was in action, and the sound of firing elsewhere was growing very strong indeed. The boy and girlscouts of general Aronburgs army were not left inactive long.More christian troops from the left grand division had arrived, and the troops were going into position in a large Orchard near Abbieann Heights.Not far away was the ruins of some suburb of Abbieann, but it was in possession of Glandelinian troops and artillery was stationed near there.

"It seems a shame that by these explosions the enemy destroyed all these beautiful places."declared Jennie Turner."Just see this orchard.It appears as if a tornado had passed through, and yet no doubt the explosion con cussions must have done it."

"This is bad enough."replied the boyscout Harry"But wasn't it worse to have Abbieann and other big cities laid in ruins.?"

"Oh I'm not comparing the two just now Harry dear.But imagine how long it took to get this orchard growing like this. If the flood had swept here, every tree would have been gone.All they're fit for now is if firewood ."

During the same day Brigiadier general Hansonia Vivianis of the regular army assumed command of General Aronburgs right wing, general Saunders being transferred.The coming of this hero of the war in the south was an event, and the general movement of the troops that followed was not soon forgotten by any christian soldier of boy and girlscout.Yet an hour went by and the distant enemy did not move further or attempt attempt to cross the stream by force.It was also discovered by spies too and scouts that the Glandelinian army was getting stronger and stronger in their position at Abbieann Stream, and along the Abbieann River, and many of the under christian officers wondered why something was not done. Even the child scouts wondered exceedingly believing general Aronburg had become overcautious.

"Comrades don't you understand it'll take lots of time to get every thing in readiness for such an immense army thiiiiiis as this."said Violet „ivian early that morning by way of explanation."Think of the countless thousands of horses required for the waggons, and the batteries,,,,,, the immense storage of rations, ammunition wagons, gun carriages and hundreds of other things..why you must remember thatthe moving of such a body of men as we have here in as if we would start a most immense exodus.Besides the general is under the supervision of myself and my assistors and he must wait for our advice to move.But we'll be in battle before long never fear.The enemy is getting ugly and that shows something is beginning.....""AZ

However at that moment there came from Joice by telegraph orders for the Aronburg child scout Rangers to break camp immediately. The great christian army itself had been divided into six grand divisions, each divis ion moving forward by a different route...Soon every highway leading tward St Johns courthouse, Abbieann Center, and Abbieann Run was filled in immensely long columns of tramping soldiers,, dashing cavarly, fifers and drummers, and bands of music with hundreds upon hundreds of heavy batteries, fifty guns per battery, plowing their way along through the dirt, and followed by great long trains of provision and sutlers wagons, and ambulances, and lastly of all the carriages of refugees and others who despite the dangers of so doing were curious to see what was going to ensue now, since it was evident from the noise at local points the enemy himself was striking or beginning to strike a blow against general Concentinian Aronburg..

"My gracious goodness,, I had no idetheyre were so many columnw of us"murmured Jennie Turner to Angeline Richee, as they stood in front of the long straight lines of boy and gi girlscouts, waiting for their toin to move, and watching regiment after regiment of other girl and boyscouts march by with colors flying, and every little face full of hope and determination. General Aronburg ought to conquer general Arlington by sheer force of numbers, if nothing else..."QAZZ

"General Arlington will have probably just as many men or maybe more" declared Angeline Richee... "It'll be a bloody struggle if it comes and I don't mean maybe. There's firing somewhere now close by, and never did I hear it so steady, and yet I've been close to a good number of unusally severe battles."

Jennie Turner had expected a fierce headlong assault of the enemy along a front of fifteen or twenty miles simultaneously, and she was surprised, when at eight in the morning, their company of girlscouts entering St Johns Courhouse, discovered not even a local action anywhere in that neighborhood.And yet the sound of some awful severe conflict came to their ears as if it was from that locality.. Also the advance along the road had been made with caution, although it was reported that the Glandelinians had many out posts located a long the routes,these advance guards had fallen back as the christian troops marched forward. St Johns Court House was but a small town, and the majority of the inhabitants were glad to see the arival of the troops. Many of the men were away in the serive service of various Christian Armies,, and the women and children viewed the appearance of the boy and girlscouts with surprise and curiousity.From St Johns Courthouse the boy and girls in their bright thr tri colored uniforms and gaudy hats moved slowly tward Abbieannville.They were now a mile miles from the advancing enemy and although no section of the christian line in that territory were yet called to action, yet the distant sounds of countless firearms and the rolling thunder of many cannons told that indeed no longer was everything quiet along the line. On the hour following a fierce and sanguinary fight raged between a portion of general Whilliam Hubbards division and the enemy entrenched at a sport called Turnabout Ford and in this encounter which lasted only ten minutes one thousand one hundred and eighty six of the christian soldiers were slain, and threese times as many mortally or otherwise wounded and five hundred captured.. From other sounds heard here and there it was a proff that the great battle of Abbieann was gradually but surely beginning.The Glandelinian soldiers found they could not advance in the direction they had desired to do, and the christian themselves no doubt were advancing to the assault, as many batteries were opening up with a dreadful thundering roar.The direct move was first to Abbieann Junction.At lastcame the order for general Hansonia Olmstonia to go Forward.

"Now there'll be bloody fighting Angeline my friend."cried one of the boyscout lieutenants to Jennie Turner."And both sides will get enough of it see if they don.'t."

It was still early in the morning November the 1 sixth.The soldiers had been ordered to move, and because of the far distant forest fires and to be an Africana scorcher. scorcher.

The boy and girlscouts were to be good and busy too during the battle. The boyscout drummer boy B ttttttn Bernard Bruce beat his drum loudly and rapidlye his eyes glistening brightly,, for the spirit of this righteous war seemed to be a part of his very nature.Seeing Benny so brave, Jennie Turmer herself could not help but glance at Jerry Rowe.The boaster was pale with rage at seeing the Glandelinians concentrating, and in his eyes were a strange flash, and his hair stood half on end putting her in mind of some dangerous baboon when enraged.She thought to herself "I wouldn't want to be the Glandelinian soldier that got in his way."

To go into the full details of the great and savage battle of Abbieann would be both impossible and apart from the purpose of our writing this story of personal adventures on the girl and boyscouts in this great conflict. Of course no doubt we love to read battle stories, but adventures thrilling and almost comical at times which will occur here with the misadventures of Jennie Turmer may be far more exciting and amusing.suffice it then, to say that the assault on the Glandelinian forces led by General Meldon Hicnell Rae was begun between eighttt eight thirty in the morning and up to noon at a spot called Turners Bridge, and from that hour on the first day the battle continued on steadily untill the middle of the afternoon, and was doubly as violent, savage and as fierce in noise and slaughter and so on as the whole world war.By this time both sides had sustained the most immeasurable losses imginable, and the forces engaged were almost worn out, and the Glandelinians partly defeated, but the gradual arrival of a large wave of fresh Glandelinian troops called the Mic-Hollentinians under general Hobertin Boy Dugar put new life into those who marched and fought under the Red Yellow and Blue Stars and Bars,, and they assaulted general pace men with each increased vigor, that nothing could stand before them.By two in the afternoon general Rae was mortally wounded, and his army were in full retreat for Abbieann Junction, and believing the fresh Glandelinian force much larger than it really was the retreat finallt finally turned turned into a frightful panic.Fresh christian divisions were sent in to try and stem the disaster, and this only quadrupled the battle into a maudline fury, turning it for that day alone in to one of the bloodiest conflicts of the war.

But Jennie Turmer thought not of these things as she and her child scouts marched forward mile after mile in that blazing heat of drought laden air from the distant forest fires. The dry dust on the road was nearly a foot deep, and a heavy battery traveling just in front of the regiment of the child scouts raised up such a cloud of dust, that Jennie, and her followers, and even violet and her sisters were all but blinded and had to drop somewhat further to the rear to get out of that suffocating cloud of dust. Jennie Turmer was glad enough ehrn the when the orders came to turn to the left and enter a by road leading through a heavy woods...s.s.ss

The roar of battle was by this time dreadful, and deafening.

"Halt."

The command came in a signal which all child scouts understood, and they could see an immense wave of christian soldiers stretched out among the trees and brush and firing for all they were worth, and the noise of so many rifles was stunning. A clearing was just ahead, and it could be seen that a extra wave of men who appeared to be of a lighter shade of color, and half hidden in a shroud of cloud from their own rifles was slowly withdrawing to a number of hastily constructed breastworks of great length, and where a long line of brass cannons of great size glittered.

The order to halt to the boys and girls came none to soon when the guns boomed forth in a earth convulsive roll of thunder, and a hurricane of grapeshot and canister, and even other destructive missels came tearing through the woods and brush, clipping off branches of trees and tops of brush, and suddenly sending half a hundred platoons of christian soldiers dead and dying to earth.

"Oh those dirty Glandelinians."Yelling Jerry Rowe who was standing behind a tree.A cut away branch had hit him and that made him madder than a wet hen.Somebody couldn't help laughing,, and then every soldier was seen to clutch his gun closer, as the order came to charge.Jennie Turmer was to witness another great battle. There was no denying it that her heart was in her throat.To see so many men move forward under such a severe fire was no light thing.She glanced at Harry on one side of her, and saw the pale set face.

"We all can die but once Jennie."said violet who was standing behind."Hurrah for Abbieannia.Down with the Glandelinian rebels.Remember Abbieann"she screamed, and the soldiers all yelled that battle cry in a dreadfully loud chorus.Indeed the cry was raised on all sides untill it was fairly deafening.An a newering call came back

"Here they come.Down with the Christian dogs."And then came a blaze from a long line of rifles, and a teaming chain of smaller cannon and two whole lines of the Angelinian troops went down to their deaths before being permitted to even strike one blow in the cause for wha which they had enlisted.

"Take aim.Fire." came the coomand from the various generals and other leaders, and every soldier opened a terrific fire of their own.Jennie Turmerherself saw a Glandelinian soldier aiming his rifle at Violet who was unconsciously exposing herself. Jennie aimed her own long range pistol straight at that Glandelinian.Both fired at the same time and the enemys shot just about grazed Violets left ear, but both girls saw the Glandelinian throw up his hands and fall back, shot through the head.

"Forward again boys.Forward again.We must gain those positions."came the crise.Away the whole column went out of the woods, to confront that deadly fire again.Three lines more went down dead and wounded, but the columns were ordered to close up, While now a christian battery somewhere covered the onslaught with a thundering curtain shell fire that appeared to cause the positions to erupt.The smoke now became so thick that hardly nothing could be seen, and again the line of brass cannons thundered, and tore the christian line of charge to pieces with that one broad side.But it did no good, general Louis was now at the edge of the enemys position, with a crowd of men on both sides of him, then with a surge and sudden movements the christian line of troops was on the mound of dirt brush and a fierce hand to hand fight raged.But soon the position was abandoned by the Glandelinians who fell back on a retreat.

But th is success even though gained so costly did not last long. The glandelinians after continueing a dreadful fire at a distance appeared to be reinforced, and then they rallied, and with a wild yell, probably worst than that of demons bore down upon their christian enemy.The Glandelinian assault was extremely violent, and drove all before it the very open and the woods, and the very roadway becoming the scene of a fierce hand to hand find.From their own rear point of position the boy and girlscouts tried to cover the retreat of the christian troops and also to rally them, mowing the assailants down like flies as the christian troops fled, but finally themselves the scouts had to flee.Jennie Turmer tried to remain close to her friends, but in the melee this was impossible, and in a minute more she found herself alone and in the midst of the enemy, and had to use her tiger fierceness to fight her way through and get to her friends.

The forces under general Dough at the opening of the battle of Abbieann consisted of some twenty huge divisions of infantry, and a number of wavarly divisions, and immense sections of light and heavy artillery. It was a division of zimmermannian troops of the Fourty Fourth Corps that had defended the earth positions near St Johns Courthouse, assaulted by the Christian Ninth Corps and others, and they fought bravely for many hours after the scene recorded in the previous chapter, the conflict raging with muadlin violence throughout a good part of the night.It was the most bloodiest battle in Northern Calverinia Province.The main battery so fiercely assailed was one from the Fourteenth Scoodlier Infantry and when the first christian Storm wave was successful in its assault, re treated from its first position only to resume a second half way up the side of a gently sloping hill, at the top of which stood a abandoned explosion wrecked farmhouse.It was around the vinicity i of this house and barns and in the sloping fields that the main onslaught of that part of the battlefield occured.For every onslaught, as many christian soldiers fell slain, as were men engaged on both sides in the American Civil war.It was a battle inconcievable in fury, violent beyond measure, and the slaughter immeasureable.

In the meantime however, what of the cavarly that general Saul Marcus was attatched.The Concentinian Purples as they were called were in action along the Delso Road, and it was their honor to capture one of the first batteries of the Glandelinian First Corps. held by general Whimpy. The capture though at the cost of great loss of life in men and horses occured at a bend of the road, and was followed by a fierce assault by the Glandelinians led by general whimpy and aided by the Omarians and Mic-Olestinians under general Cranler an old time glandelinian leader well remembered, which nearly demorilized the Concentinian Purples.

The battle here was like a Hells tug of war and temporarily it seemed as if the enemy would be greatly victorious .

"Forward.Forward"Cried general Saul Marcus, in signal to his officers again and again, but the troopers only rushed forward in the face of an annihilating fire of artillery and rifles, and grape and canister and when they even despite their scathing losses reached the enemys position and attempted to move on in the face of the most pugnacious opposition they found they were literally urging their steeds upon a bristling wall of bayonets.The glandelinians fought most savagely, the christian cavarly firing their pistols, and carbines. slashing with their sabres and using their lances, and the din and noise and concussion was immeasureably terrific. The glandelinians pressed in close everywhere with dare devil recklessness on their own side, all self determined men these fierce Scoodliers who'd rather die than be licked.

"Down you come purple coat."one of the christian troopers heard yelled in his ear, and a bayonet was thrust up against his side... He pulled back, only succeeding in escaping the long steel point by a few inches and cutting his assailant on the army and on the head.The next moment other cavarly pushed on desperately behind, and there was nothing to do but go on cutting a path right and left, as the Concentinian Purples advanced as irresistibly as the enemy tried to withold.Yet when the Purple cavarly had thus hewn paths for itself along the road for a distance onward of several hundred feet it found the advantage of position a most doubtful one.The Glandelinians were firing from their guns strange shells the size and color of Fourth of July Fire Crackers, as well as in shape, and small as they were they nevertheless exploded with terrific force and the number of fullen was dreadful both in men and horses.And too from the woods near the Main Explosion Mine Crater poured a division of murmerannians and the fire of rifles was so hot and destructive from these well trained soldiers that the christian cavarly was forced to move rapidly tward another defense of the Glandelinians. dragging a number of the captured cannon with them.As they were ploughing on in the dust and dirt a volley of mini minnie balls and grape and canister and those strangely shaped red colored shells whistled and exploded around them, and half the number getting away with the guns lost their lives. Major Andy Gray was clipped on the leg by a shell fragment and he felt a stinging pain. He had already lost three horses under him.

"Are you hit Major."cried Colonel Leroy Bellington, who rode near to his friend and companion.

"Yes in the right leg, but I believe it's not much."was the majors reply as he brushed the perspiration and dust from his face with a large handkerchief.."Phew.put this is sure more than hot fighting.It seems from the weather, the distant fires, the gloomy skies with smoke and everything else as if we were fighting in the Infernal Regions."

"Never mind we have ten of their cannons."he turned Colonel Leroy.it sure filled his heart with martial joy to realize that he himself had been one of the first to lay hands on a big gun after capturing two of the artillery men and cutting down two seriously wounding them...

"Don't crow untill the conflict has ceased Colonel Reloy."These Glandelinians are the same sort of people as we are, and fight in the same fashion and bravery.Here comes a perfect wave of Glandelinians.The Murmerannians."

"Murmerannian Hobbonite soldiers."cried somebody advance."Load boys, and don't delay abould it."

"Hobbonite soldiers."repeated Major Andy."What if it should be those terrible soldiers."

Then he began to load his pistols with all possible speed. The Hobbonite troops however belonged to the regular Glandelinian militia.They indeed were an excellently drilled army of men, and came forward in wave formation, but the men were not close together but in groups, and moving forward with a violence that nothing could stay.Their officers had heard about the capture of the artillery and were determined if it was possible to regain the pieces.They fired fearful volleys at close range, and then began to use their bayonets, and soon the cannon was reached and here cutting, thrusting, stabbing, and shooting of various sorts of firearms, and clubbing became the order of the day along a very extensive front.Never had Major Andy been seen in such a fierce and stubborn conflict.He himself cut, thrust, and charged on all sides of him.Once the butt of a heavy rifle hit him on the left shoulder and threw him off of his hoss.There was a loud yell of triumph as he went down, but before the yell came to an end he had regained regained his feet and made straight for his foe, a tall Omarian militiaman, who fired first and missed, and then dodged out of the way in double quick order.. Major Andy then desired to fire ayhim at him but before he could bring his pistol into play the tide of battle had swept the two adversaries one hundred and fifty feet apart.22222 And so the dreadful fra continued on with wilder fury than ever, untill more Glandelinian reinforcements coming on at the double time, the christian soldiers heavily outnumbered were forced to retreat, but nevertheless in the retreat the Concentinian Purples returned in tttip triumph to their own shattered division, dragging the cannon they had captured after ttttttttt them.As they moved on general Dangon swept by them on his brown charger.

"Good boys, good for you "he cried, waving his sword."continue doing that and the day is ours despite our first repulse."

"Carry the news to Emperor Vivian"he yelled Colonel Leroy and the christian general then turned in his saddle and smiled. An instant later the smoke of battle swallowed hsem up.....

But now even the christian cavalry horses were beginning to show signs of fatigue, and the greater part of the christian cavarly were compelled to retreat several hundred feet further, where there was a very small stream flowing into Abbicunn River.Here men and beast procured much needed water and stopped to get their"second wind." Hardly were any of the men in the saddle when the bugle called them to a new position along the side of a long low hill before mentioned.To gain this new position the Concentinian Purples had to cross an open space probably fifteen hundred yards in extent--a clearing well covered by the batteries of the Glandelinian batteries.General Montgomery Glandorn led the onslaught.

Forward against the Glandelinian fiends and lost no time."cried the general, and the way followed almost immediately by his whole body of horsemen with Major Andy, and Colonel Leroy in the number.The cap captian general had scarcely covered a quarter of the distance, when the glandelinians let go a murderous fire of rifles and cannonn annihilating the two ffo front lines of the christian cavarly, and tearing gaps in the other.In the confusion one of the glandelinian officers on horse rode forward at tearing speed, despite the danger, came alongside general Montfomery, unsworded him in a duel and leaped upon ihis horse on behind, and urged the horse on at a mad gallop pointing a pistol to the generals head and ordering him to go quietly ot die.The horse was urged directly for the landelinian position.

"The general is captured."cried Colonel Leroy."Woah.Catch them somebody.#

"The scoundrel will carry him into the enemys lines."yelled another of the men."Try to unseat the kidnapper general.Hurl him to the right."

But the general was powerless as the man was strong.But now came rapid roar of thundering hoofs from behind.From the start Major Andy had realized the gengrals danger, and wondered how it could be averted.He could see that it was impossible for the general to fight his captor. "Forward James" he called to his own animal and commanding thirty men to follow him they rushed on in persuit.

"Come back you fools its certain death."yelled Colonel Leyroy, in horror but if Major Andy or his followers heard they paid no attention.On and on they went untill the very side of the horsecwasgained.The advance line of the enemy was now less than several hundred feet away.A score of rifles rang out, and the bullets whistled on everyside, a number of Andys followers being shot from their horses.But as Andy ranged up alongside, he crowded the generals horse to the left, engaging the enemy abuditor in a hand to hand sabre duel.Finally he unhorsed the enemy and the generals horse too sheered off as desired and away went both horses at right angles to the course pe previously pettted. pursued. Again the rifles from the enemys side rang out, and Andy now beside the general was the only rider, his comrades all having fallen, and the general himself was slightly wounded in the arm, and Andy had his large soldier cap carried away by bullets.

"I owe you a great reward for that, Major Andrews."said the general when both were safe for the time being."I'll at least not forget you."

"I believe you had better retain a number of men about you after this general."returned the Major with a smile."The enemy is only too willing to capture you it seems."

"Ill watch out for myself the next time,"replied general Montfomery and then he gallopped off to obtain further orders from the chief general in charge.

"We are ordered to capture the Glandelinian positions below here."said the general, a few minutes later.."A Omarian Division of the Ninth Corps so it is said had been holding the defense very determinedly, and matters are getting too hold for the christian troops who have been assaulting them.Forward boys and show them what our cavarly can do. urrah for the red yellow and Blue"And away went the immense squadrons of cavarly supporting the advancing christian infantry flinging up the sod of the cut up fields behind them.In two minutes more they were again in the fiercest of the fray.

"The Christian dog cavarly is caming."Major Andrew heard one of the Scoodliers ejaculate."Never mind Fredwell.how those chriwtian s Christian dogs what sort of stuff us scoodliers are made of."

"Indeed we will."added another."We can fight as hard as they."

"Now we have this ground let us hold it to the last."cried another.

"Hurrah for landelinia, and our generals."COME THE NEXT cry.

"The Scoodlier divisions."Thought Andy, and the hot blooood rushed to his face."They're the hardest Glandelinians to whip."

Jennie Turner in the meantime got a surprise. he was watching the whole scene which raged on the left, when a yell came from her left-

"Oh Jennie turner."

She turned swiftly.sure enough ttttttt she was surprised almost out of her wits to see Radcliffe himself though a boyscout battling bravely in the midst of half a dozen glandelinian soldiers one who about about to stick his bayonet into the child scouts breast. Then she saw Radcliffe catch hold of the bayonet with his left hand, and while thrusting itself, with his sabre on the man with his right. In another moment he had gotten through the Glandelinians and into the midst of the christian soldiers who had saved him, and then in another second more the two child scout chums found themselves face to face.

"Jennie Turner.I never imagined we should meet this way in the midst of a frightful battle."came from Radcliffes white lips. "you must go back out of range.You will be killed or captured.."

"I'm doing my duty as I was told to do Radcliffe"was the determined reply."Good by and be sure to take good care of yourself.." and away sped Jennie Turner knocking headlong a Glandelinian soldier who sought to detain her, with a rifle she carried...2.2.2. Radclidde now had all he could do to look out for his own welfare; and thus the former chums,, parted not to meet(fast) again untill the army of the Lost General ~~Arthurs~~ Aronburg was raging its third day of the battle.

PART TWO OF CHAPTER FOUR.

JENNIE TURNERS PERILOUS ESCAPE DURING A LULL IN THE BATTLE OF ABBIEANN AND OTHER ADVENTURES.

Jennie Turner after Radcliffes disappearance discovered that a fresh wave of Glandelinian troops had come up to reinforce the assailing Glandelinian columns, who were now all but exhausted to a man.The whole body of christian infantry supported by the entire main force of Concen tian cavarly were ordered to charge the Glandelinians who were thus coming f coming forward in such array, and away they dashed,,,, with an enormous cavarly surge behind them.This charge was met with a bravery that is beyond any description, and again the christian cavarly Major Andy found himself in a hand to hand fight.This did not last for more than five minutes on both sides a long a ten mile front a in a perfect deafening uproar, when most of the Glandelinian soldiers were seen to part in Andys locality to let through a battery of eighty guns both huge twelve pounders and a number of shield guns.As soon as possible the battery was placed into position, the rear guard of the Glandelinian forces meanwhile protecting the pieces.... Then away went the enemy troops to the right and the left,,,, and the order was given for the counter attacking christians to retreat..2..2

The order came none too soon(coon) for when the cannons blazed forth the aim of the gunners were found so core correct that eight hundred horsemen, and six hundred horses outside of thousands of infantry men were laid low at that one discharge, and though it was attacked and again attacked with dogged courage this Glandelinian battery remained where it was for over six hours, when the general retreat of this part of general Aronburgs army, began closing probably the first day of the battle.

The line of battle had originally been nearly eighteen miles long and now it was so broken and disorganized, that the fighting became general and wildly insane upon both sides althoughthe heaviest assaults were still made in the vinicity of the hill before mentioned.The exhaustion in the frightful heat of the weather was terrible and many scores of thousands of the soldiers had not had time to eat a mouthful since earnyl early morning.Some of the poor fellows unable to carry the load had thrown away their provision bags, and during lull in the battle they ran around begging for a mouthful of something with which to brace themselves up.It was sure the real grim reality of war.

But nevertheless on the christian side everybody fought ~~fffff~~ bravely to the very last, realizing that since the disaster at Abbieann was now known as to is its cause, that the very eyes of the world may be upon them in this awful conflict and other conflicts to come.They were fighting not only to uphold their own righteous and principal cause but to repay the enemy for the loss of Abbieann.To these the horrors of unbelievable and most extensive carnage were as a pralling as they could well be but they had steeled their hearts to theinevitable, and they therefore went on to live or die in the defense of what they knew positively to be right.These and only these all soldiers of the christian side were the true heroes of the great Glandico Abbieannian War, and there was t no dividing line, and there could be to seperate them. The booming drum drum pooling thunder of ~~fffff~~ cannon and the whistling and exploding roar of shells, and the demonical yells of the enemy went on still as the boy and girlscout Regiments themselves resting from their various warning and so forh flag drills, fathered together in a large clump of trees and snatched a hasty ~~fffff~~ biscuit and draught of water.Each boy and girlscout was begrimed with sweat, dirt, and powder, and each were more than half exhausted from their ~~fffff~~ exertions.

"Oh but ain't this simply dreadful that its so hard for them to whip the enemy."moaned the boyscout Jerry Howe for at least the sixty ninth time."Angelinia Aronburg never told me that the enemy was so determined when she got me to enlist. I wish we could go and fight as the soldiers do.I bet we could whip them."

"Girls are girls and boys are not men Jerry"replied one of the girlscouts called by her friends,Lill Bell"despite the fact she was not so very very little."What are you grumbling about..?You cannot expect the christian army to win a battle at the very outset do you.Angeline Richee one of the greatest girlscouts we ever became acquainted with saw her fathers army defeated again and again in battle, and she never complained..."""QAZ "If I ever get back to general Vivian or emperor Vivians army again" and I see general Manley"wailed Jerry."He wanted to see no more of the Glandelinian generals--and he had his counterpart everywhere withinl the christian lines.

"Emperor vivian will make a monkey or a baboon out of any one of the Manleys If the war holds out long enough."put in another of the child scouts. "But Jerry don't worry so bad about how the battle is turning out.We'll always win in the end."

General Crandin now seeing the tide of battle turning against his christian troop s(poops) sought by every means in his power to recuperate his forces and sent to general Pronburg for aid.But when several general onslaughts had been led forward without avail, it was determined to retreat slowly in the hope of accomplishing a fra fresh stand in the vinicity of Abbieann Center untill general Pronburg sent the fresh divisions of troops.In the meantime however, the troops of general Hennie Johnson, and those of general Johny Johnson which had thrashed the christian general Ben Logan along his own front, had advanced to the support of the Glandelinians along Abbieann Center, and these fresh Glandelinian soldiers, appearing as if suddenly on the field, made such a sudden assault that it drove the christian into such a confusion that it was impossible in the mix ed up condition of affairs to stop the retreat which had followed.

"General John and Hennie Johnson have come with twenty million fresh troops.We must fly for it now to our own positions"was the cry which was suddenly arising from all sides.The Johnsons had however came up with a bigger force of men than that, and it was enough to make a good showing,and utterly worn out from marching and fighting in such hot forest fire weather, the christian troops very reluctantly an and slowly commenced the retreat in the direction of their own positions.

The blow to all even the boy and girlscouts was a very bitter one but now there was no time to even grumble about it.The girlscouts and boys retreated in the vain.

"We can weep about this afterwards.said one of the oldier boy scouts."We must either use our legs now or get captured by those gray coated fiends"and off he rode, with Angeline Richee, Jennie Turner, violet,and her sisters and all the rest following, but waiting an opportunity to fire ever and anon at the enemy.Angeline Richee, and violet, and her sisters tried to preserve order, but this was impossible, for men on foot and men on horses were rushing hither and thither, trying to find their commands, or at least their own friends, or being in utmost hasts to reach the shelter of their positions.

Less than half a mile had been covered, when Jennie Turner having slipped on a Glandelinian girlscout outfit, behind some bushes, watched the scene, then a firing on the road caused the retreating christian cavarly to halt. Then came a rush, and a band of Glandelinian cavarly swept by.As they did so the christian cavalry engaged them and cut the enemy cavarly to pieces. As she watched this going on, Jennie Turner felt herself thrown almost violently to the ground.She had been pulled down by a big tall Abbieannian boyscout concealed in the long grass.He thought she was a Glandelinian for real not recognizing her nor having ever seen her before.As she tumbled headlong she caught sight of the boyscouts face.It was the great friend and leading boyscout captian Ned Perkins.

To be pulled down in such an unceremonious fashion was a surprise in itself but to find herself fan face to face with a boyscout Ned perkins, astonished Jennie Turner beyond measure.For the instant she could do nothing but stare as her assailant.Had he been a Glandelinian soldier or boyscout, she'd have as quick as a flash of lighting drew her little sabre and cut him down.But she wouldn't do it under no condition to a real christian soldier or boyscout who just made a mistake because of her uniform. Then too came a realization of her position, that the boyscout was a perfonal personal friend of violet and her sisters, that the boyscout belonged to the purrough Scout forces, and yet not wishing to be detained she endravored to pull herself away to go to her friends.He thought she strove to go to the enemy.

"No you don't go to your gray coated friends."hissed rather than exclaimed the boyscout."I've got you and I'm going to hold you.Scooping around the christian lines eh trying to find out something.Well you'll find out plenty. We always give spies strange treathents.I'll haul you before the leader of the child scouts of this army Angeline Richee and see what she will do with you."

The boyscouts face, generally very clean, was now covered with dust and over one chins cheek flowed a small stream of blood, for he had been slightly wounded by a glancing shot of the enemy.As he spoke he vindictively he hauled Jennie Turner closer to him.

259...a nlv

"Let me go I'm not a Glandelinian"panted the young girlscout, and struggled to free herself."Angeline Richee. Hel-----" The words died upon her lips as Ned Perkins clapped a dirty hand over her mouth.Then commenced a fierce struggle, and both rolled over and over in the tall grass, untill coming to the edge of a gully(circus gully) both dropped a distance of fifteen or twenty feet to bring up on a pile ofdamp leaves and dead tree branches..Jennie former however came down on top, and with such force that the boyscouts wind was so was for the moment Knocked completely outof him..He uttered a grunt and a gasp, and ere he could recover Jennie was on her feet and rushing for a spot where the side of the gully sloped upward..

"Stop her fr- Fred."roared Ned, and as he cried out a second time a second boyish form loomed up before the young girlscout captian.The two boyscouts had been in hiding for several hours their intention being to see what they could learn of the enemys intention.

"Who is it?"queried Fred Fred. as he put himself into Jennie's way.

"Can't you see,it's the little Glandelinian rat we had the trouble with near our lines early this morning."Growled Ned."Stop her.She's a Glandelinian girl spy and we must capture her before she gets to the enemys lines to tell what she might have seen."

Had Fred really been a Glandelinian Fred grabbed Jennie by the collar,had Fred really been a Glandelinian girl instead of a boyscout just believing her a Glandelinian, she would have either fired her pistol or clubbed him with it.But nevertheless she had to do something as these boys may bring her to some part of the camp where no one would be able to recognize her and then she would be in the frying pan and fire together.

"Let go"she commanded and hauling back she hit Fred squarely in the lower jaw, and yet she did it much against her will but she had to.It was a heavy blow delivered with all of Jennie's youthful strength and determination and poor Fred with a yell went back as though struck with a club in the hands of a man(tin can)....,,,

Before the astonished boyscout could recover the young girlscout captian was past him and speeding up the gully side with all the speed she could man.

"Stop you little Glandelinian fiend or I'll fire."she heard Fred Yance yell a moment later.But she continued on. Then came the report of the boyscouts pistol, and again and again it was fired, but the last bullet whizzed closed to her head.gobbadthe shelter of the trees brought her out of range.She couldn't blame the boyscouts for their believing her a Glandelinian girlscout for they didn't believe any one elsewould be around in this territory of a battle, and to see a child scout in gray uniform astonished and angered them greatly.They started in persuit but she gained the distance.But they nevertheless went forth to the christian lines to give word to Angeline Richee, and violet and her sisters to watch out for a Glandelinian girlscout whom they tried to apprehend. The tussle in the gully had somewhat upset Jennie's mind and when she started in search of the road again she turned in exactly the opposite direction to that which she should have gone on, and was surprised by and persuied by a squad of Glandelinian soldiers. One almost had her but she sabred them, and shot down three of the others thus lessening the danger, for the remainder too small in number were afraid to assault her. They understood she wasn't a Glandelinian for some recognized her.

On and on she went, through the brush, now persued by a strong body of cavarly who were aroused by the shooting, and to try and slow down their persuit she leaped over the trunks of decaying trees, and over high fences.Bullets whistled close to her, and a long cavarly javelin almost hit her in the head but fortunately passed her. More than once she stumbled and then behind a stump had to fire at the enemy to hold them at bay untill she could regain her feet(street) and continue on her way, the Glandelinians cursing and blaspheming roundly.Soon she found herself ascending a hill hotly persued by the cavarly, and here she was stopped for the thickness of the trees made further progress in that direction impossible.

She glanced around anxiously, desperately.The persuing Glandelinians were pretty close.

"I've madesome sort of blunder"she thought much dismayed."There's no road in this direction but Got to do something or I,ll be captured. Forced to halt she listened intently.From several points around her came the distant sound of countless rifles and the rooling rolling boom of many cannon and the rattling din of shell explosions.But to locate any of the sounds in particular was impossible.Indeedthe firing of the day had almost almost made her lose her hearing.

The Glandelinians were almost within pistold shot distance now. "I am just as good as bottle up, with those persuers close and all comrades gone."Oh she thought dismally."Even if I do find the road I'll not be able to search for my comrades withthese fool s not haste

...wherever I won't be rid of the last of the poor fellows. ...only I can get among friends somebody in command will get me right. ...hope this defeat will only be temporary."

...as deliciously cool in those woods and this had refreshed her. ...had to go through was impossible and to stay where she was meant capture.

"Surrender girlscout of the christian dogs."came the command of the enemy leader."You are now my prisoner."

"Not yet I ain't"she answered defiantly, and she ranced off, retracing her steps as much as she was able.Ten minutes later she recrossed the gully hotly persued, but at a point some distance above where the unfortunate encounter with the two christian boyscouts occured.She had gone on only a few steps further when she almost stumbled over the body of a dead Angelinian soldier.A little startled she was about to go on, when a sudden thought seized her, and she retraced her steps.The poor fellow had belonged to a Concentinian Volunteer command.He was nearly middle aged and yet warm showing he had not been dead very long.Beside him lay his gun and long visored cap, and his cartridge belts was still still still will not show them our heels in such a lively fashion."

"What you are Jerry,"came from the boyscout Horace Hartwell, who had fought Parisian and had stretched himself..."General Bell went into the conflict without finding out what the intentions of the Glandelinian general was,that is all.We'll know better next time."

"It wouldn't be a bad idea for the captian to send Jerry out on a scouting trip,"added another of the company."From what we heard of him when he belonged to some other scout regiment, he made a pe perfect fool out of the enemy generals he encountered."

"I'd be willing to make a fool out of general Arlington too."answered the lad....S.O.S."""""

The immediate hours which followed the return of general Bells defeated christian troops to their own position were gloomy enough in spite of all that was done and said to put a bright face on the matter.A good many felt as Hennie did, that they were "done for"and not general Arlington, and might as well go home, and they strode dismally around in the smoke fog trying to communicate this feeling to others.... Some thought this very position might be captured by thevenemy before the battle came to a conclusion.

But if there had been any one who was overconfident it may have been the enemy himself...General Concentinian Avonburg had not been idle or inactive at all.Because of the activities he made it had been impossible for general Arlong Arlington to get his whole army into any general action upon the christian line at every point.As soon as the ill disaster was heard of by him at Abbieann Junction, general concentinian Avonburg and his highest officials met, and agreed it was best to send an immediate column of troops to recover that lost ground immediately, and to support the column with five hundred thousand cavalry,-pourty four minutes after the defeat defeat of general Bells troops, and while general Gladerlinia was still holding his own against sledge hammer blows of the enemy, ten full divisions of christian troops arrived at Abbieann Junction to guard that section from possible breakage of the christian lines, and the enemy met an opposition the fierceness of which it was impossible to describe and. the action of that late afternoon was quadrupled in fury and savagerly.savagery.As at the time at the first crush of the battle it seemed to the enemy now that new christian regiments sprang forward forward everywhere, rushing faster to the defense than ever before, while general gladerlinia was reinforced greatly.Artillery was placed into position and the enemy though he tried to advance met such a hot fire that progress in any direction was impossible. Gene Hor was this all. General George Be Henry Hickman, who had been highly successful in putting down assaults in West Abbieann Section, was ordered to move his divisions forward, and to take personal command of the army in that territory, and he came on immediately and was able to restore and to order along the christian line already thrown into confusion as stated before, and partly rallying them and to bring up the command to the high order of success for which he was famous. The boy and girlscout regiments were now during the lull in their own activity camping in true military style near the shore of the beautiful Abbieann River.

Angeline Richee had made a four minutes trip tward the interior of the main christian camp, returning with twenty two new volunteer boy and girlscouts, and a hundred packing cases in wagons filled with articles sent to all the boy and girlscouts from home.Jennie Turner had recieved recieved an extra supply of clothing from her father, and a good sized box of dainties from her mother, and sister who remained at home.The dainties she divided amongst the girl and boyscouts as far as they would last, retaining only a small quanity for herself, which later she out of pity gave to a little child slave she herself had rescued..There was also a smap small bible, to replace the one which had been lost by her on the bloody field of Evangeline St Claire, and on the fly leaf of this her mother had written a loving dedication, telling her to perruse the good book daily as she always had done, and to continue to live according to its precepts like all good Abbieannian children do... .

Susan Farrol herself had wondered what was to happen.she longed most sadly to see her friend Hildred Manning again and when she had telegraphed to Gertrude Angeline, recieved a reply that Hildred had been sent to another section to have her wound treated more continually and that she was still in a serious condition.Gertrude in her letter wrote that Catherine Lee of the Vivianites had been too easy on those prisoners who had shot Hildred through an open window, and that she herself was going to judge them when she returned to camp.

Susan indeed felt lonely as she listened to the great roar of the battle afar off, he had hoped also to go back to the Vivian Wickoy seige for a few days to try and see Hildred Manning, but the permit because of the danger of the trip could not be obtained, and to drown her sadness she made the most of the times in the camp before and during the battle in company with her friends, and getting acquainted with the Avonburg girl and boyscouts who were new to her in uniform and dress as they different from the others were their uniform red, and all in one color. There was no purple coat, green waist and yellowdress in their uniforms.

She with the scouts she was acquainted with were at this time in a portion of the army where the whole day the army had lain inactive.There had been small fights here and there along the river, and some miles in the interior of the Abbieann woods section, but they did not ammount to much.But all that territiry was to be an awful inferno of battle the next day.The operations in the west had been spirited.General Rankers had cat captured Henrietta junction, and this cheering news had caused much enthusiasm throughout the whole of general Concentinian Avonburgs army.

In the meantime Jennie Turner was not idle.From a felling dreadful defeat along the Abbieann Junction battle line it was beginning to turn into a success now withgladerlinia gradually advancing, and the boy and girlscout troopers went forward with them in the right and left to be of service with their flags and other signal equipment.Since the enemy had been ha held at bay now everybody was in the best of spirits, and Jennie Turner and all the others thought the orders to advance upi upon the enemy might come at any moment.More fg fighting troops were coming up rapidly, but the resistance of the enemy was so stubborn that an advance was still out of the question.

"We ourselves ought to be doing something in this battle."said the boyscout Andy to Jennie Turner."It's a shame that the battle had to turn out this way so early in the afternoon and now even when the defated defeated troops are rallied an advance yet is out of the question.It's terrible that the enemy cannot be driven out of here, when all of the fellows are so anxious to push forward."

"I'm with you Andy,I'd be willing to chance anything for some sort of an adventure."

The wishes of the boy and girlscout were ~~gratified~~ gratified a few minutes later.General Hansonia Johnstonia in order to learn of w a way to smash down the rigorious gladelinian resistance, and to find a way to move a storming troop upon their rear ordered several hundred thousand of the Angelinian troops to Abbieann Center.This done and accomplished, and causing an extension of the battle there with dreadful and inconcievable violence, others were ordered to Abbieann Ville on a a large grass covered plateau overlooking the big Abbieann River.Word of this movement was recieved by the Glandelinian leaders, general Bennet and generals Hanker,and a strong counter demonstration followed with the result that the ernormous body of christian troops were caught between two fires on that immense plateau to the number of nearly two million one half of whom were sla in wounded or dying in a most tremendous and savage conflict ever staged with numbers of that size.The boy and girlscout regiments themselves were forced to even for their own safty to join in this fight where fortunately not a boy or girl was even wounded on any section of ground, but during this conflict Jennie Turner had an experience which probably she would never forget if she was to live forever even as a little girl on the earth.The boy and girlscout force was moving slowly through the woods with the purpose to cover the advancing soldiers when the command came to a turn to the left and moved down a broad, (unusally broad) roadway close to the river shore.

"Be careful comrades."cautioned Angeline Richee, who had been assinged by the Orincesses to be in chief command, as they had went elsewhere to give general Avonburg directions as what to do in case the battle became too severe."This is sure a very hard road on foot, but on horse it is ten times worse.Becarful that none of you have a tumble into the river.#"

The command was still one third of a mile from the pl plateau, and the boy and girlscouts were moving along very silently; when suddenly from the opposite shore, there came the crash of a terrific clattering fire from many thousands of rifles, followed by two discharges of nearly fifty cannons in quick succession...ons of the child scouts were hit nevertheless, but two of the boyscouts horses were wounded, and one horse in immediately in front of Jennie Turners animal fell headlong shot through the eye. The fall of this horse caused Jennie's horse to suddenly rear.She caught him tightly by the reins, but a shell exploded close by and the concussion sent horse and rider plunging through the brush to the river below..

"Captian Jennie has been hurled into the river."sang out Andy in consternation as all had dismounted, and returned the fire from every point of protection with telling effect against the enemy on shore.There followed a great splash, and a more louder and terrible fire of rifles and cannon on the opposite shore, and girlscout and horse disappeared from view.But not for long(hong Kong) In a moment her horse Jane again showed itself above the water, snorthing and blowing the water from his mouth and nostrils,, and Jennie came up shaking her head like a water spaniel. Both of them heading for the shore, but the current was too strong for each,and they were swept onward, and out of sight of those above. They were fired on rapidly by the enemy, the enemy never stopping stopping stopping the rifle fire at them, yet it was a miracle too that they escaped being hit..

"They are lost"groaned John O Neil,and the other boy and girlscouts felt positively sure he must be right, for going forward even down the river meant to move into the very teeth of the enemy. Again and again rifle volleys rang out followed by a long row of smoke puffs from a hedge of brush along the shore. Glandelinian sharpshooters had aimed as close as possible and several of the bullets clipped some of Jennis's wet curls, and even made holes in her wet uni uniform coat. But now she had gained Janes side and she crouched down beside the faithful steee steed for protection.Here and there in the stream were spots where the bottom could be touched.But the current would not let them stand there, and there too they were most dangerously exposed to the enemys fire, and they were hurled forward untill under the very edge of the plateau. At that time the fighting on the fatal plateau was at its highest fury. General Technsy of the christian forces was endeavering most desperately to retreat to better ground many retreating to many large flat boats which had recently brought them acrossthe river, and the Glandelinian forces forces posted in the woods surrounding the plateau, and assailing the christians from elsewhere with great fury were were pouring in their deadly fire with fearful effet effed t effect.The noise of so many hundreds of thousands of firearms was incessant, and reached Jennie's ears plainly, yet yet she hadly hardly paid any attentio , for her one thought was to save herself and her horse Jane, from either being shot to death in the river, or from drowning..Opposite to the Plateau was a place called St johns Ferry, and in the middle of the river between these two points lay a high large stretch of grassy and wooded soil called St Johns Island. Many of the Christian troops, mostly Angelinians were stationed on this big river island, and it was to this that Jennie found herself drifting.She had hoped that reaching this, and feeling sure the island was in possession of christian soldiers, she would be rescued, and landed in on the christian side of the soil.But she had just waded out of the water and her horse Jane had done the same when she heard the sound of voices ahead of her.Then she saw the gleam of several rifle bayonetsed barrels.

"Halt there girlscout.Throw up your hands."came the command, and taken suddenly by surprise, and not being in no condition to even defend herself with water soaked firearms, if those soldiers happened to be enemies in disguise, Jennie complied, but thinking to herself"first time I've ever been captured by Glandelinians."

"I guess you're our prisoner, little Glandelinian girlscout in disguise" muttered a tall Red Uniformed Abbiennian soldier as he strode forward. "What do you think about it?"

"Since you're Abbiennian soldiers it certainly appears that way."Replied Jennie, trying to smile, although deeply chagrined over the turns affairs had taken.."But if you're real Glandelinians I'll bet you I'm not your prisoner even now.Are you Glandelinians?"

"We certainly are not, but you are.The idea of insulting we're dirty Glandelinians.I wouldn't wear their uniform if I died for it."

"But I'm not a Glandelinian either.I'm Jennie Francis Turner of the Burrough Rangers, under Gertrude Angeline."

"Yes and also I'm Violet Vivian once of the Princesses.You Glandelinian girlscouts would lie till you're black in the face.You're my prisoner and do you take it quietly , reb or do you intend to show me whether you can escape or not for what you said."

"since you're really Abbiennians,I'll have to sir..but I swear my words are true were you a Glandelinian.No Glandelinians' will capture me alive."

"Is that so.Then you sure are reckless.They're more dangerous than we are.But thank God and His Blessed Mother we're not. But you're words don,t prove that you're not a Glandelinian .what's the Counter sign." Jenn ie didn't know, and she admitted she would have to be his prisoner, for she wouldn't resist Angelinians under any conditions, believing later on she could prove his blunder."

"There's where you show your sense little girl.I'm sorry to do this, because too you're such a very pretty one,but duty is duty.How did you get in the river?"

"The concussion of a shell explosion tumbled me and my horse into the river."

"And as it is the way withlots of you Glandelinians you couldn't bear with seperating from your horses eh?Alright if you're shot as an im poster, on the charge of personating Jennie Turner, we'll see to it that your horse in is buried with you, though I don't believe he'll follow to the hot place where youre soul will go to. Forward march,!"""QA

"Where to sir?"

"Where to?Straight ahead of course.Where do you expect.To the enemy lines?"

"What part of the christian lines is this."

"We ain't playing school now, little glandelinian girlscout.I said forward march."

"ut I'm not a Glandelinian——"

"I SAID FORWARD MARCH...."

And as there was no help for it, Jennie marchod forward, with three soldiers at each side of her, and half a dozen in the rear, while one led the dripping horse.. The march did not last over two minutes,,, when Jennie found herself in the middle of a growth of trees.She realized now for fact she was a prisoner of the christians already alright.She was mistaken for a Glandelinian girlscout in disguise.

Here was stationed a large brigade of Abbiennian soldiers to cover any retreat from the Plateau, should such a thing become necessary.Most of the soldiers were as a lert as owls or cats,watching the terrific World War like battle above them and guarding the flatboats, and they paint scant attention to the arival.

"It's going to be tuff tough with somebody of our poor generals."Jennie heard a under officer say, and then she was led to one side, and made to sit down by a tree, while her horse was tethered but a few feet away.And she felt sure she could be able afterwards to regain her own friens friends, she would willingly remain a prisoner untill she would be able to prove her identification.But there was no telling where they would put her later on, and she might be where no one could recognize her and then she would be in a fine tight place. She decided to escape it if it were possible, and yet she must do so without doing any serious injury to any of her soldier comrades.For a quarter of an hour she listened to the dreadful sound of battle in the distance.Strange as it was no one had remained to watch her, and if there was any way in which she could escape from the island undetected she meant to do it.She She had no desire to languish in a christian prison camp when she was not a glandelinian and didn't deserve it.She understood well enough how christian prisoners were treated down south in Glandelinia, and she had seen herself that because of their cruelty to children Glandelinian pal prisoners probably fared worse off.

"I must get away even though they're my friends and only made the mistake" that's all there is to it-oh Jane"she muttered between her set teeth, and Jane tossed her wet mane vigoriously, as if to agree with his mistress... ..

The soldiers who had captured Jennie had not tied her to any tree as the glandelinians generaly generally do, and outside of being partly surrounded by soldiers the girlscout had found herself free.But she was a prisoner just the same and to get away from the island was sutr to was sure to prove a most dangerous if not impossible bit of effort. She could have easily shot down her persuers, but as they were Angelinians and so she couldn't do that, and she had to way or means to be able to prove that she was Jennie Turner and not a spy imposter as they thought she was. She too was nearly in the center of the island, and surrounded by a strong guard that was more than ever on the alert. But there was one thing in her favor,the soldiers who had made her their prisoner was glancing away from the island instead of toward the interior. Evidently they were so excited by the raging battle some distance above them that they must have forgotten entirely about their little prisoner.

Consequently no matter how she turned, she was sure to come upon the guards ff from the rear...

The course she was to persue she soon made up her mind to do and at any cost. She would move to the lowerend of the island with Jane(pain) and trust to the good fortune of reaching the water, where the swift current might carry her and the animal, out of reach of the fire arms of the Angelinians should they fire at her, which evidently they would, because of landelinians fired on their own boy and girlscouts.....2.2.2.2

Had it been very quiet she would never had proposed to herself to chance even the slightest danger of bring he horse along, much as she would have regretted leaving the beast behind. But the rattle of so many thousands of rifles drowned out all ordinatry sounds, added by the rooling rolling boom of so many cannons, and the sharper sound of exploding shells, and the yells of the enemy, so the hoof beats through the brush and over the bigger stones counted for nothing/ In a few minutes without being seen yet, she had come within i sight of the rushing and rolling river..

Down near the waters edge was a fringe of high bushes, and here she saw six strong soldiers at one point, and a single soldier at another. She made a short detour and came close to the shore of the island and less than a dozen feet from where the single guard was standing his body bent forward and glancing cautiously at the doings on the big plateau far beyond.

At that very instant however, Jane with her nostrils still trickling from his bath let out a loud warlike snort, as though ready to do battle. Instantly the guard straightened up to see what had caused the disturbance. But accidentally the horse in moving had suddenly dislodged a huge stone, and before he could turn the stone was on upon him. There followed the tart start of an exclamation, and then a heavy splash as the christian soldier fell headlong in the stream. As he went down he let fall his long rifle, andwthis jennie saved and appropriated/

Seeing the accident to the guard Jennie did not lose a fraction of time. Long before the Angelinian soldier had regained the surface of the river, the young girlscout was in the saddle, and urging Jane again into the stream. The brave horse shied at first, and Jennie's heart leaped into into her throat. "Go Jane go" she cried, and finally the horse went with a leap and a splurge, which immediately carried the horse fourty feet from the shore. As they descended into the water, Jennie remembered the other guards she had seen and instinctively withdrew behind Jane, that they might not discover her. She heard two shouts;

"What's up Henry Humphroy.?"

"Hang me if that Glandelinian girlscouts horse hasn't ran away."

"How can it be possible. I heard one of the guards shout, and then two splashes."

"So did I come to remember it. Hello Martenze."

To this there was no answer, for Martenze was floundering in the water, too bewildered to save himself. He came up with a great splutter. "For the Love of Heaven save me." he gasped, as soon as he could say a word...."Save me. I can't swim. A stone threw me in the water."

"Can't you wade ashore?" demanded one of his companions... . . .

"No, the river is too deep here, and the current is too strong. save me Henry. Please don't let me drown."

"I will was the ready,, answer, and without hesitation this soldierwho was a good swimmer plunged into the cold water, and started after his companion... .,.,.,.....".

In the meantime a third soldier had made a most important discovery..... Jennie was trying to swim beside Jane and hold the gun above water at the same time, and now she exposed her hand and a portion of the gun barrel of the firearm(was it my arm). Instantly the soldier aimed perfectly, and fired, and the bullet hit the gun squarely, hurling the wea weapon from the little girls grasp, and nearly paralysing her hand and arm for the time being. There was now nothing left to do but to get out of range with all possible speed. Jennie felt that the guard would reload, and would then either fire at her, or the horse. If Jane was slain she would have to swim along alone, thus exposing herself to an open assault.

"On, Jane on!bm)" she cried, and the noble beast seemed to under stand. For tunately she was used to theoater, and could swim fully as welll as her mistress...On they went the swollen stream, sending sending them first t ard one shore and then the other, to be fired upon from both i sides. By this time the action of the battle on the Plateau was drawing to a close. The gallent christian general had been shot and mortally wounded with many of his officers, and this added to the galling fire of artillery and rifles poured in by the glandelinians now in possession of the plateau, and also stationed in the woods upon three sides of the clearing, threw the christian soldiers into great confusion. With fearful loss they camevtearing down the uneven paths, or throu through the fields leading to their flatboats, and shoved off for the christian side of the shore. The enemy followed them up with a scathing fire, and many a poor soul was sent to eternity before the opposite shore could be gained.

The turn of the tide of battle took the attention of all the soldiers left on gt johns Island and for that moment Jennie Turner was forgotten by those of the christians left behind. It was impossible to persue her anyhow..w.w.w.2.2.2222

But nevertheless she was in peril now from the other side, for the enemy on the Plateau and on the opposite(enemyside) side of the shore saw her, and seeing she was a christian girlscout and some of them recognizing who she reallly was, made their most desperate efforts to shoot her and her horse, keeping up an incessant withering fire of many rifles in her direction, but fortunately she was out of their range---and the heavy fire did no damage------but the sound made her feel very uncomfortable.

In a few minutes more the feet of the horse hit upon an sandy bar and instinctively Jane followed the high bottom shoreward.

It led to the western bank of the Abbieann River to a spot heavily covered with a defense forest of all sort of trees to the highest pines.. Feeling herself safe for the time being,,,,,Jennie dropped upon a large flat topped stone utterly utterly exhausted. Despite the awful heat of the weather caused by the forest fires, the river, running southwestward was unusally cold nevertheless, and she was chilled to the bone and more than wet, for her cavarly boots were filled with muddy water..... Removing the boots, she emptied them, and then wrung out her coat, and cape, and dashed the water from her large heart shaped hat...

"Well Jane what next?" she asked half aloud, when a crashing in the brush behind her caused her to jump to her feet with a start, and with her small sabre(which she had yet retained) drawn for defense. She had turned suddenly, to find herself face to face with a short, rather unusally good looking girl of her own age, followed by a boy. They were in the garb of child slaves belonging to the army instead of a private army.

But the boy had onhowever a suit of cast off Glandelinian military boyscout coat, from which however they ensigns of the uniform had been utterly t stripped.

"Wh-----what---how do you do little Angelinian girlscout." the boy him self stammered, as he came to a sudden halt, and stopped the little girl who was in consternation.

"Are you a lone with her?" queried Jennie , suddenly.

"Yess Miss girlscout but won't be for long."

"What are you two children, runaaway child slaves."

"Oh no Miss, we're two christian spies, of the Regiment of child scouts belonging to general Aronburg" was the reply, but by the way the boy himself searched around with his eyes, the girlscout leader understood that they were persued.

"Are there any christian soldiers near here?" was Jennie Turners next question.

"No Miss leastwise I haven't seen any. I wish there was though. The enemy in is in this territory. You little girl better be careful. You're in dangerous territory.."

"I don't fear no Glandelinians. Any house of any sort close by."

At this the two children appeared surprised. But then the boy suddenly remembered.

"I passed a sort of cabin yonder Miss. I don't say though whether there is any one in. I didn't stop to find out."

"Show me the way, and I'll escort you to safty. I want to dry my uniform. I was persued twince myself. and once captured but escaped. What is your name and is the little girl your sister or companion?"

"Tom Andrews Miss. The little girl is my sister. Hettie Andrews.."

"and what command do you belong."?

"I and my sister usually belong to different commands. We're sent from one regiment to another. Just now we belong to general Aronburge burrough." scout.'"

"Well Tom bring me to the cabin at once. And mind see to it your sister watches carefully so the three of us won't be surprised by soldiers of either side do you understand. I was mistaken twice by the christians for an enemy scout. I'm a stranger in this army that's why."

"I can't tell you Miss whether your soldiers are here, or not but I'm afraid enemy soldiers may come to the cabin."

The two children moved forward along a well definede defined trail and Jennie followed on foot, leading Jane by the bridle. The young girlscout leader sure understood too well by the childs testimony that she was now upon the enemy's soil and upon dangerous ground, but for this there was no help. Crossing the river was impossible just now, and despite the heat, she was still chilled to the marrow and felt that she must have a chance to regain her warmpth and dry her uniform clothing if she wished to avoid a dangerous spell of illness. A distance of five hundred yards was covered, and they emerged upon a small clearing in the center of which stood a large log cabin built of wood with the bark left on, and having in the center instead of at one end a broad stone chimney. Without waiting the two children led the way inside the cabin but there was no one inside.

Once inside the boy found courage to ask.

"How do you happen to be on this side, and all wet, and your horse too?"

"My horse and I fell into the river."answered Jennie."I wish to warm myself and dry my uniform clothing that's all.And if you little girl can furnish me with a bowl of hot coffee or something I'll pay you for it."

The disguised girlscout searched around, but finally said.

"There ain't no coffee in the house.But there's some tea.But as to food there's nothing here but an old stale piece of bread."

"I'll take a bowl of tea then.Anything so long as its warm.Tom!"

"Yes Miss."

"Will you rub down my horse and see if you can stir up something for himttt to eat." ?

"Yes Miss."

"I see there is a shed over there to the right.Put him in there."

"Yes Miss."

The boy hurried out, and watching him Jennie saw him do as directed..The girlscout had in the meantime bestirred herself and set some big pot to boiling.She saw indeed that Jennie wa an Angelinian girlscout, and this caused her more confidence.It was now growing late in the evening but still daylight, and yet the distant fire seemed to have grown more heavily though the sound seemed to have shifted and bttte become more extended.. Deeming it improbable that any of the Glandelinian force would come to that immediate neighborhood, Jennie proceeded to make herself as comfortable as possible before the fire, which soon blazed up red hot from the extra large pieces of wood thrown upon it.In an hour she was fairly dry, and by that time she was re served with tea, corn dodgers and some boiled sweet potatoes. "Yeut yout brother is a good boyscout isn't he?" asked Jennie during the process of the meal/

"He certainly is."began the girlscout, and suddenly stopped listening intently.Jennie had placed herself near a window where she could see the shed that she might be sure the horse or the boy was not tampered with by suddenly arriving Glandelinians for she did not intent to trust anything too far. he had seen Tom rubbing down the horse vigoriously with the shed door open.Presently before she had ended the girl the question she had turned away for a moment and when she looked again, and the sudden stopping of the girls answer, and her attitude of listening caused her a suspicion that all was not well came upon her.

Both saw the barn in flames.

Boty Both rushed out, the little girl with a scream of fear.A groan of dismay escaped from Jennie.The horse and the boy were gone, and some distance to their rear a squad of Glandelinians were coming.Glandelinians no doubt had captured the boy and carried him off with the horse.

"Those Glandelinians have outwitted me!"

"Such were the bitter words which arose to Jennie's lips as she burst into the half burning shed.She did not remain in the building long as the flames grew hotter and the smoke more heavy and stifling. A single bound to her to the opposite doorway, where the half frightened and distressed little girl stood, having been afraid to enter the burning shed, and then she glanced along the wooded trail beyond, and discerned the shadowy forms of horse and rider not a hundred yards distant, and two or three Glandelinians were with him forcibly urging the other on with drawn sabres.Jennie was a fair runner, and feeling that she must regain her steed and the boy at all cost, she ran forth at the top of her speed along the trail, despite the fact that a party of Glandelinians were now pursuing her from behind.The trail sloped gradually upward. he even forgot all avout being in the enemy's territory. he was going to have Jane and the boy back or find out the reason she couldn't.At first she thought to yell at the three Glandelinians to halt, but prudently remained silent, feeling evidently they would only then increase their speed on discovering they were being followed.. On she went over every sort of rubbish, untill her foot catching in the exposed root of a pine tree she fell head long with a crash. The glandelinians in the rear through this accident caught up with her, but she drew one of her pistols and brought six of them down and caused the remainder to scatter for cover.The noise reached the three others, and one of them swung around in the saddle.Catching sight of Jennie and believing more were following her, he made some signal tothe two others.In the meantime,Jennie had scrambled to her feet firing at three more glandelinians who had made for her.

"Stop "she called.Stop you thieves and kidnappers."

"You go to the Infernal Regions."returned the glandelinian who seemed to be the leader."I'll send a whole platoon od of glandelinians afterbyou if you follow."

"I defy what ever you'll do--you're not goingto steal my mount in this fashion and get away with a girlscout a ither either."returned Jennie most determinedly."You're a child stealer anyhow, and if you don't stop I'll put a bullet through every one of you."

And as she spoke the young girlscout captian drew another pistol.

"If you shoot at us all of our comrades will be down on you before you can get away yourself you little reckless fool."answered the man, but his tones nevertheless showed that he was much disturbed. Again he urged Jane forward, and the three bent low, to escape the expected shots.. The pistol indeed was ready for use, and freshly loaded, and Jennie would certainly have fired had the chance of hitting her man in possession of her horse been a good one.But the light and smore fog made the aim uncertain,and the rough road made Jane bob up and down continually, and she was afraid she might even wound the very boyscout she had come to save if not the horse also. At last however a sudden excellent idea saved the situation.Stopping short, she drew in a deep breath.

"Whoa Jane.Woah dear girl."she called with all the strength of her command. The faithful horse heard and pricked up her ears. Then when Jennie called again the horse suddenly came to a dead stop.

"Get onward you lazy old horse, get on"screamed one of the men, but in spite of a beating,Jane refused to budge, for Jennie continually called to her to whoa, and ran up closer and closer. At last seeing they were beaten in their attempt to get away with both the horse and the little boy,the glandelinians slipped from the saddle, and started to open fire, but Jennie was behind a tree, and returned the fire so effectually that one of them was mortally wounded, and the two others then darted off among the treeses. They darted off firing several times and then disappeared.

Once again in the saddle with the boy,Jennie did not deem it advisable to remain in the vinicity long.The glandelinian soldiers in greater numbers if not close at hand, were certinly not far off, and it was surely positive these two glandelinians would warn them and cause a swarm to come down at her.She turned Jane on the return trail and urged the faithful beast on as rapidly as the nature of the uncertain ground permitted.

Reaching the cabin again, she found the little girl in the doorway watching the barn which was now fully ablax ablaze from end to end.

She ran out gleefullybas Jennie came with her brother.

"Heaven be praized you got my brother again."she said."Those glandelinians are sly ones."

"I want to recross the river."returned the young girlscout captian."Do you know where I can find one."!

"I have one hidden somewhere.Y up the river.Follow me."

Further conversation revealed the fact that the boat was nearly an eith of a mile down the river.she had used the ferry boat to cross the river to try and find out what the enemy was doing. A well defined trail led along the Abbieann, and in a shl short while the three were at the bank where the boat was supposed to be. For some time they could not tell where the craft went to, and they were believing that the enemy might have stolen it, when Jennie caught sight of the flatboat, drawn up among a number of tall bushes..To get the craft afloat was no mean job, but finally it was accomplished, and she moored it where Jane might readily step on board first.The horse was at first unwilling to do this, and it cost loud and repeated energy on the part of the three of them to make the animal budge.To guide the boat accross the stream there was a broad oar to be used as a rudder.They had just reached the opposite shore and Jennie was preparing to land the boat a little further inshore so the horse could easily step on dry land when the sharp click of a rifle trigger caught her ear.

"Halt there you three Kids" came the command, and a short stout Angelinian soldier stepped into full view from behind a big tree.He had a very red but handsome face, brown hair with also the same color of the beard and his tone of voice as that of an Abbieannian.

"Stand where you are and don't move."he went on as Jennie gazed at him in dismy."Have you the counter sign.?"

"Abbieann"said Jennie on a venture.

"Wrong my glandelinian Purple coat, it's not Abbieann, nor emperor Vivian, nor Vivian Girls or anything else that way.You and your two followers are my prisoners.I was watching you for the last ten minutes, and wondering what you was up to.Step ashore now and remain quiet till I call the Officer of the guard."

"But I'm not an enemy, a Glandelinian I'm a friend an Abbieannian girlscout, and so are my two companions."said Jennie.

"You and your two companions are Glandelinian girlscouts and nothing else, I can see it sticking out all over the three of you--not to speak of the uniform you are wearing.And you came from the Glandelinian side of the river.Step ashore I say and no argument"and the rifle was pointed at Jennie's head.Had he been a Glandelinian she'd have as quick as a flash drew her pistol and brought him down.But again she was mistaken by friends, as Glandelinians. It was the fault of being in an army where she was not acquainted with any of the soldiers.So there was nothing else to do but to obey.As Jennie and her companions stepped ashore,Jane started to follow,but the young Irlscout girlscout shoved her onto the raft once more. This caused the flat bottom boat to wobble, and in a second more she was adrift, and heading for the river..

"Stop that boat."roared the Angelinian guard, but when one of the children started to obey,the Angelinian soldier caught him by the arm..

"No you don't"he cried.Corporal of the Guard,It's George Call who wants you.Sentry Number Eighteen."

The last words were delivered with all the strength of the guards lungs. He was an old time service man in the army, but it being his first capture he thought it was a most important one.He continued to cover the boy and two girls, but something happened for the moment which caused the guard to relax le relax, and the three beat it down for the raft but at the same time saw half a dozen Calverinian Lagorian girlscouts approaching on the run.They were all armed and one said the Corporal of the guard sent them down to see what was wrong.

"There's three Glandelinian child scouts."yelled the guard.

"There they are,I see them""cried an girlscout under officer, who accompanied the squad."Halt there or we'll fire."she commanded.. By this time Jennie herself was in the water of the river inlet, wading as rapidly as possible after the fast receding flatboat.she had just clutched the rudder lock the two others having failed to follow, but had been captured, when several reports rang out, and she felt herself hit in the shoulder.A pain as if from a thousand needles shot through her body, her grasp relaxed and then she knew no more.

It was not untill several hours later that she came to herself. At first poor Jennie remembered nothing, and was only half conscious that she was lying on a soft and warm bed in a dimly lit room, and that thereswas a faint murmur of voices around her.Then she saw the faces of a boy and girlscout, as both bend over her.

"Will she live surgeon?"asked the girlscout.

"I believe so.but the poor child has had a very narrow escape."was the reply of the medical man.

"A very narrow escape indeed, to be shot, and then half drowned.And she's so young for a girlscout scout, too, and so pretty."

"Certainly young for a Glandelinian girlscout katie..But then you see these Glandelinian girl and boyscouts, though not one third so numerous as our side, are all crazy to join the Glandelinian army as scouts, boys as well as girls.Can I leave her here for the present or shall I send down a stretcher, and have her removed. ?"

"No, no, leave her here for the present.It might prove fatal to move her.We scouts will do out best for the poor girl, even if she is an enemy.Too bad she's a Glandelinian instead of our side.She's so brave and pretty."

"I don't doubt that you will my friends.To be sure she's an enemy, a Glandelinian girlscout no doubt(pout) but in such cases, no one amongst us should really distinct one from the other no matter how bad they are.We ought to try to save their souls more than anything else if it is possible."

"True pastor, and one must remember also,that at the end we are all true Creatures of God"concluded the boyscout"and on the day of Judge ment He will just us all according to our doings, and not by what we as are."

Jennie scarcely heard the last words.But in a dim manner she realized that she was among christian child scouts, evenvthough they still thought she was of the enemy, and then again she lost consciousness. It was morning It was morning when she opened her eyes once more and still it was gray and dark and the atmosphere even in the room sort of smoky and smelling of burning pine needles. Feeling a trifle stronger shecattempted to sit up.Instantly there was a stir, and a girlscout of ten years of agecame to her.

"You must remain very quiet."she said sweetly, then turned and called out;"Mammie, he is awake."

Another girlscout came instantly into the room.

"You must remain very quiet Miss Jennie Turner."she said."It is the doctors orders.You are severely wounded in the right shoulder.We will take good care of you."

"Thank you little girl.."Jennie was surprised how weak her voice was. She tried to say more, but the words would not come and she felt com pelled to close her eyes again.A few minutes later she managed to swallow a little nourishment, and from that time on she grew stronger, although her progress was so slow that it could not scarcely be noticed.

"I suppose you are wondering how wehhappened to find out your name and also what command you belong to."said the younger girlscout who was assisting the older one in caring for Jennie."I sawit written on a number of letters which were in your pocket. My name is Viola Jennie.Mamma and I and my younger sister Flossie are also in the army, my mother is a Red Cross Nurse, for papa is off to the war."

"Your father is an Abbieannian soldier I suppose!"said Jennie.

"Yes indeed.We are all Abbieannians around here.The ensign you have, your letters, which one of the generals read, and other things in your possession proved you're the well nown friend of the Vivian Girls Miss Jennie Turner.Of course you were mistaken by my boys and girls who persued you as a Glandelinian in the coming dark, especially when that sentry yelled to them when he too you prisoner. But fortunately it was none of the scouts who wounded you in the shoulder.You were fired on by the Glandelinians from some small river island.But I hope you don't mind the mistake of our soldiers for I believe you would make them too in case any one of us were the gray for disguise or came from the enemy side of the shore as you did when apprehended by the sentry. sWe will take good care of you and maybe you'll be all right this afternoon.The wound was merely a scratch."

"You are more than kind. Will you be able to tell me what happened after after I was shot?"

"There isnot much to tell.You slipped into the water, and after repulsing the Glandelinians two of the soldiers fished you out of the water and brought you here, for the no nearest hospital tent is about five miles or more away."

"And did the enemy or any one catch my horse."

"No they tried to catch the flatboat, but it got away in the gloom, and what became of it and the horse none of the men could find out."

"I hope he got back to the camp."said Jennie with a little sigh"and then one of the girlscout officers came in and said it would be best for Jennie to sit sit up so she could grow stronger.The girlscouts here were as good and as kind and patient with Jennie as though they were her own sisters and brothers,and she could not help but reach the conclusion that all the child scouts were even more good than many said of them. Viola especially did all she possibly could that morning for her comfort,, and when she felt rested enough she told about her own home, and her sister Grace who remained at home, and then of Gertrude Angeline and all of Penrods girl and boyscouts at the seige of Vivian Wicley.

"I would desire to meet them alll."said Viola Jennie."Who who Knows but we will when we can go there when this this cruel battle is over.just listen to it will you.."

"That"when will be a long one I am afraid"answered the young girlscout."We Christians are bound to fight to the last and I presume the Glandelinians are the are the same way....."

Once when Jennie was that early day out of bed it was suggested by the surgeon who visited her that she be sent to the regular army quarters.Jennie didn't desire this just then as she wished to be soon again near where Violet,and her sisters were.

"The Vivian Girl Princesses will want my services and I cannot do that"she told the surgeon."Not without their command."

"Well you're the boss in that way"said the Surgeon."I shall be glad to have to remain here, but you must give me one promise."

"What is that promise?"

"ot to go out on any scouting tours without identification papers written by the Princesses, so you would be in trouble again by your own side..They all strange soldiers here to you, and none of them cannot help it is they mistake you for an enemy scout, and they don't go by uniform here, as enemy scouts will wear purple too.They've recieved orders long ago because of this Abbieann affair to stop all strange no matter what uniforms they wear and hold them prisoners if they cannot give a proper account of themselves.You must also promise not to even go outside the christian lines so long as you are under our care.""QQAA

"I'll promise that indeed I will(window sill)"answered the young girl—scout leader leader , seriously."You have my word of honorvas an Abbieannian.""QAZ

As should have been previously mentioned, general Concentinian Afronburg always called Whilliamsberger Zimmermann by the enemy on assuming charge of the main armies, found affairs in the territory of Abbieann in a truly deplorable condition.The Infantry nhad numbered after the first action of the battle less than fifty million, the cavarly about a million, and the artillery less than seven hundred thousand, with only three hundred and thirty eight field pieces many of them hardly hardly fit for use. That was the causeof why the enemy had it all his own way in the battle the day before. Added to these facts was the still more disasterous f one that the loss was so heavy amongst officers.

This situation was all changed as rapidly as possible during a good part of the night. Officers who were to replace those fallen were made to pass a regular examination to determine their fitness for their positions men were placed into stronger positions. Whatever else may be said of general Aronburgs fitness for the absolute leadership in any of his great campaigns before, now and after it would forever remain that he was one of the best army organizers in that country or any other that has ever been produced, and one who never was ever whipped in battle, though at times he may have been outwitted. Firm almost to the point of severity, he was still a friend to all, and all his men and officers understood this so well that they had and would follow him anywhere.

THE SECOND DAY OF CONFLICT AND FURTHER ADVENTURES OF JENNIE TURNER."

By three in the morning general Concentinian Advanced forces were ready for an advance upon the Glandelinians. Over fifty million soldiers were stationed in and around Abbieann Junction, below the ruined city of Abbieann, at St Johns, above upon the Abbieann River, and at several places to watch the valley of the same name. Outside of these the great christian army numbered one vhundred and sixty eight million men of which not quite six million were regulars, and all the rest volunteers. By this it will be seen that in less than four months before this battle opened, general Aronburg had succeeded in converting into trained soldiers over three hundred million men who had been in jobs of all sorts and followers of all sorts of occupations. This work had been a wonder in itself and was and is well worth a moments contemplation. It had taken much valuable time to organize this big christian army, and now because of the disaster of the first day of the battle more time was lost in perfecting the details of the movements upon the victorious enemy. It was general Aronburgs desire to hurl his troops upon the enemy all along the line at the same time, thus giving the Glandelinians no opportunity to rally from one point to another. The enemy was to be stormed not only in Abbieann, but also in Abbieann Junction and along the opposite side of the river shore simultaneously. Had this plan been executed without delay it could have been possible,, that the battle would have been of short duration and would not have been so savage and bloody. But the enemy delayed everything by great demonstrations of their own, and the enemys extensive artillery fire, added by that of the christian side was heard for one hundred and fifty miles. At last after numerous changes in the plan of battle it was decided between general Concentinian Aronburg and his chief generals, as at the advice of Violet, and her Sisters that the army should move forward toard the enemys fortified positions at Abbieann Center, at the extreme point of the river bend and then push on against the enemy past Turner ville, and then lay seige to Abbieann if that ruined city could not be recaptured from the enemy in any other way. It wad agreed that as the distance to that position was less than a mile or so away, they ought to be able to accomplish a steady movement forward in which cause case Abbieann city, and other enemy positions ought to be captured with but little trouble...

The anticipated movement of the advanced sections of the dittan Christian armies were of course kept a secret from everybody untill the movement was begun. Ythe enemy had conitumed for a long time an unusually heavy artillery fire that made more noise than usual, and it was not untill as many of the christian guns as could be brought into actionwere in answer, that word came into camp of the various child scout regiments of general Aronburgs army, were to move immediately in different long lines, to watchand cover every movement of the christian troops from the enemy. "here in the world are we going to move to."Questioned Jennie Turner, to Violet Vivin Violet Vivian, who had sent in the word from her sister Joices headquarters."

"We are to cross the river that is all we all ow revealed so far."answered answered Violet."I and my sisters don't want the enemy to learn anything or all general Aronburgs plan will go wrong."

"Where will general Aronburg advance the assault for one is going to be made."said Angeline Richee.....

"Perhaps the troops are to throw the enemy out of Abbieann Center."said Jennie Turner,for she heard how the Glandelinian forces after the fierce fighting of yesterday had left that vinicity."

"Maybe, but we ourselves are going somewhere,that's certain.But we'll only find out when we got there.2"

It was a still hotter and dark smoky day when the boy and girlscout regiments broke camp and started out on a march that lasted half an hour. Here they were stopped by some courier coming who told them they would have to change their course because they were approaching a territory heavily swept by the enemy shell fire.It was th true too for in the distane they had been traveling tward a sound had come to them very distinctly as if it was thunder, and strange ripping and rapping and cracking sounds, and the air was full of dust and debris floating as if it was a volcanic debris.

"Yet it seems to me as if they were marching for fun."laughed Violet. "I guess the enemy is trying to stop general Aronburgs plans."listen to the cannons will you.I never heard so much noise, and yet I've heard plenty in battles before."But she didn't mean however what she said, for the y were not marching for fun.They reached the territory of St Johns and here one of the Princess's elsewhere had sent in a signal for all to halt.

"They sure are going to send some troops to cover a retreat of people from a refugee camp."said one of the boyscouts."The enemy is starting a fierce and extensive demonstration according to reports in that direction and the christian troops are not are not ableto winstand the "Storm." I wonder if they'll send us in that direction to cover them.We're not soldiers but we fight too and everybody knows we do much better than they against the enemy because we're quicker, more alert and smaller."

"Those poor refugees."shrieked Jerry Rowe."If the enemy do come to their camps, they'll all be slain.Why we ought to all go there and defend defend them. ""

"Never mind Jerry, if they are all slain remember we use it for granted that they also died for their Country, and we can justly avenge the massacre like we did when one was attempted at Etheldreda""said George Blackwell, and a brandishing of weapons went up, while Jr Jerry groaned did dismally.

The whole christian front in action was a splendid and yet dreadful sight to see, as one of the boy scouts who viewed it from there said. Artillery in teeming numbers was in position,cannons seemingly without number big and small, rows of them walled up in smoke and others being made ready, and others coming into position, while horses were bring up gun carriages and caseions. Here and there great explosions were tearing up the earth into great eruptions, and ripping great gaps in the mass of trees beyond,, and explosions of every size great or small and immense rolls and puffs of smoke were everywhere to be seen, and the thunder of the artillery, the crashing thudding roll of explosions, and the terrific steady noise of countless rifles made a sublime din that even violet and her sisters had never in the war yet heard before. The sight as an awful yet thrilling one(hun), and everybody probably would have enjoyed it immensely had it been only a drama on a stage or a moving picture.

"Creation what a lot of us falling in the battle line."cried violet to her sisters."Hang me if I don't believe half the army isn't in action and that the enemy isn't the attacker instead of our own side."

"BANG CRASH"

"Loo out everybody"cried violet and her sisters together, and indeed they scattered in time for two big trees passed them like arrows, and every body were enveloped in smoke and dust, and falling obstacles.

"Gang gang shell"cried Jennie Vivian."Enemy's high explosives.I hope none of our comrades were hit."

"And did you seethose trees."cried one of the boyscouts."They came past as if shot from a big bow.some powerful explosive."

"We ourselves are bound for the south"came the word a bit later. "The Glandelinians are massing near Richmond Crossroads, and we are to flag every christian general, who have the drills, and the rest are to cover the rear."

"Hurrah"went up the cry. Remember Abbieann Comrades, and no turning to the rear this time.Hurrah for Our Blessed Lord and here's hoping He will let us win."

"Better we all go forth under some cover."said George Hannonn one of the oldest boyscouts of the Aronburg Child Scout Regiments."Once when I went to do some scouting some months ago during the battle at Trinoque or Evangeline St Claire,I was wounded by a shell fragment though a mile in the rear at the time.I don't want no more injuries of that kind."

"Oh this is only a little experience."said Violet Vivian lightly."You scouts ought to see what the Mascots girl and boyscouts under Angelinia Aronburg has gone through in their own campaigns campaigns."ut we don't intend to get too close to the battle line.I don't intend to sacrifice any number of my followers if I can help it."

"Well I don't understand."said a girlscout tossing her head meditatively. "But I would better be hit by a fragment of shell or wounded by a shot then be captured by any of those Glandelinians."

"you're right there Minnie"laughed Jennie Turner;"While we're so close to this violent battle we'll have to continually retain a sharp watch out that Glandelinian soldiers don't surprise us too sudden.Although we are nearly three thousand strong, out here in an opening our own numbers and all the weapons and grenades we have would prove a poor defense, against a great charging wave of the Glandelinians."

"Maybe we got more than three thousand scouts in these regiments." concluded the girlscout.

At last the time came for them to move onward, and a final hurrah went up as they marched to their horses and mounted and were off.

"Good bye Rangers of the army;me meet me in Abbieann."

"What's the matter with metting you when in possession of the enemys positions."came the return reply.

"just the thing."I'll date that for to morrow."and then those of the scouts and the soldiers passed out of hearing of each other.Soon the dvance for advance for the district assigned for them was started.The day which promised to be hot and smoky, now turned darker and soon the boy and girlscouts were ev enveloped in one of those dense fogs of smoke which made the battle of Abbieann famous.It was caused by such tremendous firing along the christian lines and bursting of so many shells. Jennie Turner had thought of remaining in front, but now she thought it was necess necessary that she and Angeline Richee should act as guides.

"Not much chance of our reaching our district in this situation comrades" said Angeline Richee,as she passed amongst the boy and girlscouts.We'll have to do the best we can.One consolation however this march won't last fotter forever."

"How long will it last , Angoline Richee?!?!?."

"How long will it last through allll this fog "added Angoline.Well the trip we are on is less than two miles if not more.We might be able to accomplish it in less than an hour if we go at it fast enough.But remember we have wo enemies to contend with-----this smoke fog and the enemy shell fire."and the girlscout(pout) leader passed on. no be sure that nothing would happen the girl and boyscout troops which had been divided at ir first during the early part of the march were evened up as much as possible .The chaperon girl and boyscouts found themselves placed in the advance of the rest.Jennie Turner was appointed by Violet, and her sisters to lead that van and she did so cautiously continuing a cautious watch.They passed a long row of high pine trees, were one had six long branches.Here the noise of the battle sounded somemore confusing and somewhat louder but not enough to cause any one to feel of any unseen dangers near.

"I feel as if we were all Hens and chicken going to be placed in the chicken coop"said one of the girlscouts..

"This is worse than anyexperience we have ever had but then we'll go it through and---"began Jerry Rowe, but just then a piece of wood hurled forth by some distant explosion hit him right on the jaw, and with such force that though it did not injury, it sent him doing a cartwheel performance into a stream close by."He was helped out, and he said;

"Maybe the next piece of wood that hits me will sent me over into the enemy's lines."

"Never mind Jerry have a cup of fresh coffee"exclaimed Jennie Turner a few minutes later, as all had halted for that purpose and some one passed along with a washboiler"all steaming hot"but not real coffee but for the first time since they were in camp a washboiler full of steaming chocolate.

While they had halted and rested some conversation was se p on how much danger even refugees were in sometimes.

"I'm sick tired and disgusted with all that sort of stuff"Jerry growled. "I tell you we of Abbieann is too dog gone easy on the enemy and that causes the enemy to have too much courage to do anything dastardly. Why in the name of Creation don't the Governmeny allow the armies to do as we child scouts do.We don't give quarter because of the massacres of children the enemy have so often committed....."

"Never mind Jerry"There,ll be a time when Glandelinia will fall down on Her knees and ask for mercy.Then we'll all have a chance to do just as we plase with her."said one of the soldiers sitting near by..

"I believe Glandelinia and all her people are possessed with devils." burst out Jerry."Why they do things in this war that is never heard of or written in any history.If Glandelinia ever got the upper hand I'd sure pity the whole world."""""

After fifteen minutes more of resting the whole column passed down the road once more.The smoke fog was as dense and as pungeant as ever, but a southeast wind had sprung up and this aused the fog to rolled. The sound of firing was growing heavier.About a minute passed, and Jennie Turner saw a boyscout whose name was Harry stagger and fall.

"Why what's the matter Harry, are you suddenly sick or is it the heat!" she asked lightly.

"NZ No I'm not ill"was the short reply,and then Harry added, with a peculiar twitching of the mouth;"I'm hit in the leg by a bullet."

"He is wounded"said one of the scouts."We must be fired at through the fog by Glandelinian snipers.."

"Oh the wound pains awful."was all that Harry could answer answer. A minute later another was hit in the arm, but from that on however nothing more happened.Another half hour had passed, and then there came a good deal of excitement.Two strange gray columns of soldiers were seen approaching from the westward, and were instantly put down as a troop of advancing Glandelinians.At once the boy and girlscouts threw themselves into whatever positions o could be of advantage to them, and all their e weapons were at a readiness.The excite excitement lasted for about twenty minutes, and more than once the heart of many a boy and girlscout was in his or ge her throat.Then came a hurrah from somebody as those on the watch made out that the approaching troops were Abbieannians but had appeared gray in uniform from the fog that still enveloped them, and that they were not enemies.Then aga in the march for the destination was resumed by the scouts.

"Well here we are at last,Harry but listen to that firing ain't it fierce..! Now for Abbieann, and to see our armies go ahead to the full capturing of the Glandelinian positions."

"It was Jennie Turner who spoke.. The Girlscouts of the Fireflies after halting at a river Wharf had crossed a river bridge leading to the North Bend marched through that semi-deserted town, and came to a halt on the highway leading to "what was left of poor Abbieann"

"We are closer to the battle now that's a fact"returned Harry O Connor.

"But where is another question.What a desolate country, all having been swept by the flood for debris of what was houses and trees is everywhere,she added as he eyes swept a wide range of debris strewn landscapes and fields.

"Is this what the enemy came here to fight us for!"

"I was told that we are only eighteen miles or so from Abbieann."said Walter Starring."I am very curious to seewhat is left of that place, for if you will remember it was there that the eyes of the world was centered after the first news of the great disaster went broadcast."

"That's so"cried Jennie Turner much interested."My grand father was in that city, but he wasn't there at the time of the disaster fortunately. nd come to think of it, they say the big fissures stretching five hundred miles over the face of the country, and caused by the force of the explosions are still to be seen.I hope we catch sight of them."she added after a pause.

They saw that hundreds of regiments of Angolinian infantry, bands of cavarly, and d ivisions of artillery, were everywhere as far as eye could reach in great and fierce action and ever and anon clouded with smoke of their fierce firing, lines of battle covering not only the roadway, but the fields beyond.It seemed however as if both sides were holding themselves at a tight standstill but my Heav ens how they were firing.The noise was terrific and stunning in sound, and the thunder of many guns convul sed the ground as if there was a slight earthquake. It was hoped by thr by the child scout leaders that they had advanced on far enough for that time, for they didn't cherish the noise of so mighty a battle, and the scene in the distance almost resembled to them as if the earth there had split apart from the rest of the planet and was giving forth dreadful volcanic vapors, and contending armies of demons against each other.But presently the orders came to move on cautiously and another quarter of an mile was covered, when it was seen that the Angolinian troops in the north were hastily abandoning their extensive camps and that from the flame sm and smoke it seemed as if a million tents were on fire at once .

A most terrible immeasurcable roar of battle was heard in that direction as if the brunt of the conflict was raging there. All of the boy and girlscouts were in light marching and riding order, rather riding order, though horses ought to be able to march but they did carry with them everything that belonged to each child scout, their guns, and pistols, cartridge belts, canteen, haversack and so on. To be sure for even horse the route step was given, and every one went as much as she or he pleased in consequence,but even so when the order of halt came everybody was glad enough to throw down their load and rest themselves upon it. hile listening to the dreadful noise of battle in the distance.

"When I see a battle raging this way I feel as if the whole world was fighting in the Infernal Regions, especially when there's so much smoke in the air and such heat, and conflagrations"said one of the boyscouts who was a new comer..

"I've been a girlscout for quite a log while and so I'm getting used to all these bloooody battle se scenes."answered Jennie Turmer."ut it's no fun George Lane, that's a fact.But you must remember, we didn't enlist enlist enlist for the fun of the thing, and besides we do not go into into the battles as the soldiers do.We are not even allowed to so you may rest easy on that scoreif score."

"Oh maybe you're right Miss Turmer but too much battle is too much, it cost too much life on both sides.,and the boy went off shaking his head,. He was extra worried over the fury of the battle, and suffering from a slight wound he had recieved in a fall from his horse, and the fact that the battle seemed so long to be turning in favor of the enemy did not tent to put him into good humor.

As they were watching the dreadful scene there came the order from some distant commander by signal" To the field in the right boys and try your best to dislodge the enemy,"and a long wave of soldiers could could be seen swarming and hopping and leaping over fences and other obstructions located along a roadway, and though soon the roadway was windrowed into dead and dying, the numbers advancing were too much to be stopped so soon.A moment later before a long wall of explosions the fence and a long line of advancing soldiers had disappeared, but that did not stop the advance of the main body either for they were also covered by the firevof their own artillery.The loss of life on both sides was plentiful in that territory, for besides windrows ovmen going down into dead and dying, fences sheds and treex trees and bushes and fields of grass went before the explosions of shrpan shrapnell and shells and before the fearful storm of bullss bullets and grape and canister.In watching all this scene in almost abject terror Jennie Turmer soon learned by the signals she understood that a regular ru regular rule of commands about advances, and moe movements were being adopted to prevent the christian lines from suffering too heavy a loss, and yet yet allowing them to be massed in such a way that the enemy would not under any conditions be able to stand up before the assault. Four regiments forming a division had been while advancing on the right been formed into a large square, one regiment on each corner or quarter, while the brigarier general commanded the whole.The grand squre thus divid divided, each regiment was divided into divisions of two companies each, one company placed placed into a line behind the second company the two about twenty or thirty yards apart which each company divided from that next to it by about the same distance.When thus in such formation the soldiers were moving on simultaneously with fixed bayonets under cover of their own artillery, the officers leding on in a line with the others but either on the outside or in the "Cross Streets"between the advancing companies and divisions.There were however so many regiments and companies, that the line of advance therefore was so numerous with men in countless numbers that it stretched as far as eye could se, and no doubt the exension extension of battle was equal on the foe side, and therefore made a battle scene which would take an a most expert artist a life time to draw or paint even with his own imagination. The noise of the conflict was as dra dreadful as if the whole World War was raging in all its duration put into a day along this territory alone, and by the way operations were it was evident as if the enemy was equally as sturbbo stubborn as the christian side, and that both sides held each other at a most desperately fought and pugnacious standstill, neither being able to drive the other back, and the smoke of battle equaled almost the smoke of the big forest fires raging in the distance.

"Gosh this ainet ain't no battle field is it?" queried Nathan Crnby h who was one of the boyscouts who was watching the scene."It seems as if all the world was fighting it out right here at this spot.It's all right enough to fight a battle along a most extensive line but why crowd so many here. Creation help us if the enemy let's go a storm attattack at some other portion of general Aronburge Lines.I've been near twenty big battles and never saw one so fierce and stubborn."

"I wonder how long we'll say here?"queried Jennie Turmer."We're no earthly good here.Violet and her sisters would not let us go near such a danger zone.Listen to the rear of cannon.It's a perfect volcanic din."

"We'll have to stay untill the troops are abee able to force the enemy to give way, I suppose."said one of the boyscouts.

"I heard somebody say that the enemy wouldn't be able to be driven out for a month as general Arlington is bery stubborn and a terrible fighter, and he's got one of the most splendid armies Glandelinia could ever muster. That is why he was sent here to oppose General Aronburg I suppose."

"If we stay here long the Glandeliniane may steal a march on us."put in Walter Starring."Of course its only natural that they should fight like an army of wildcats to keep us from learning too much of the secret of the Abbieann disaster."

"I believe myself a heavy column of the best of the christian troops should be sent to the enemys rear, at least as far as Crater No Ten" said Jennie Turmer."That spot is a splendid base of supplies for the enemy being right along the Abbieann River, and if we were in possession general Arlington would have to retreat or be cut off."

"I believe both sides are going to have lots of terrible fighting like this before we see the ruins of Abbieann again in our possession." ventured George Hart, who stood by."Listen to the roar will you.We've We have got to pass Abbieann Center, and its full of Glandeliniane resisting the christian advance in that territory with the fury of devils, and they're standing their ground at many other spots with all the bravery they can assume, and then comes a lot of woods still flooded in spots by the past disaster, and I can't say what all---and the enemy have every e corner of it fortified and that the battle is just as violent all through there mark my words, for they saw the battle is greatly extended for miles and miles."

"Oh our own side is getting fighting enough"answered a nother."The enemy despite the wickedness of his cause is just as brave as we are every bit and we might as well understand it so first as well as last."

"I go in for a dash"was the comment of a little wiry boyscout named Freckles. "Start the army on a run for Abbieann,and let it stop at nothing, and the day will be ours in less than a day....."

How long the discussion discussion might have lasted,there is no telling, bust just then came the cry;

"All companies of child scouts fall in for operations."and every boy and girlscout sprang into their proper positions for it was seen that a portion of the christian line was in danger of being buckled as the enemy had rushed in counter attack with a crash and roar, and were on the point of victory.Frantic signals were coming from somewhore.The answering signals was done under a large cover at the end of some large piece of high ground.Here behind a high rail fence or in tree branches or any place that came in handy were seen the boy and girlscouts with their own rifles at the ready one scout containing a signal flag and answering any signal for an officer when he called for it, another having a warning flag, another a aggressive flag, and so on, the work varying as it was to be.The way the scouts could do anything from their own rifle display to flag signals and so forth, was an ever increasing menace to any Glandelinian army, and their signals, and their crackshot fire of rifles at such an unseen and long range held the almost successful enemy in check, and brought reinforcements to the needed spot in double quick time. The enemy could not hardly see where the extra hundreds of shots were coming from at such a long distance, and along the boy and Girlscouts caused such havoc that the enemy intiat territory finally fled in terror and panic.

For over an hour the boy and girlscout regiments remained in that well selected position. During all that time now the christians were able to press on in their advance, and consequently all were in the best of spirits, and even Jerry Howe brightende brigh tened up, although still grumbling because the christian line wasn't pushed so---"it could be done with, and they could win a great victory. The boy scout had lost his mother and father, and brother and sister in the Abbieann disaster and he was dreadfully bitter against the enemy ever since the time.

At last about half an hour more, after all the scene was was dissolving away into a curtain of smoke and the noise of battle had been been quadrupled "the christian lines were advancing successfully and there came the orders for the child scouts to move forward themselves"But in heavy riding order2"and once more the child scout regiments in that division found themselves on the way to Abbieann Center.

In the meantime(get your dime) while they were now going forth, the child scouts just learned by courier that another corps of the main christian army was pushing forward from Invitation Brook intending to clear the road uppast a past a settlement called Turns Mills, for it must be remembered that in advancing upon the Glandelinian armies,... it was the intention of general Concentinian Aronburg to force a general advance from Abbieann Center to the Turmer Run up the whole Abbieann Territory and crowd the enemy against his own left.If a map of this battlefield would have been made it would have aided the ready greatly in following the movements which during this battle ensued....q.q

"Forward march"was signalled the command all along the line, and amidst the immeasureable roar of the battle and the distant hurricane wind sound of the Glandelinian "Devil Yell" some christian band struck up the popular Rapaz March, and off the numerous columns moved in an immense wave, the men four deep or more facing the most scathing fire of the enemy unflinching.It was a sight to inspire the most listless, and so progressive was the christian advance that many of the boy and girl scouts felt like singing, as they themselves at a considerable distance in the rear moved along as fast as their horses were allowed to go. Two miles were covered that way.But everywhere as far as eye could see the enemy had offered the stoutest resistance possible, and it was reported that general Montone divisions had failed to advance, and soon there started dangerously close to the vinicity where the child scouts were, at first a "light rain"of shell fire, which soon settled into a Steady"downpour, and a portion of the christian lines were reported to be on a gradual but fast retreat and that general Gladerlinia was reported severely wounded. Jennie Turmer ordered her own hands to go back for better o cover, and shielded herself as much as possible by moving from tree to tree, and tod rock to rock, but the danger of shell fire could not be fought off, and one explosion dangerously close to her covered her her from head to foot with dust and dirt., and her horse was killed . She recieved a severe scratch from a shell fragment on her left arm which needed quick attention.

A"A heavy suit of armor wouldn't be a bad thing to have"Harry Johns said or started to say, when an unusually severe and wild sound of rifles and artillery cut him short, and there followed five hundred feet away an explosion that appeared as if the earth had tried to disgorge its bowels at that very spot, and there was not a single person who didn't get half buried in the debris that fell upon them, and half smothered in the smoke that enveloped them. The noise of countless rifles sounded from far ahead, as if the very earth had opened into a huge fissure miles in length and was giving forth a vigorous eruption of explosive materials.The boy and girlscout regiments who had scattered as there came came another and worse explosion were some two miles and a half from Abbieann ville; when they learned the christian troops in pressing their advance had come upon a long line of formidable positions stretched along the west side of the road,and well into the woods beyond to which the retreating Glandelinians had retreated to and where they were reinforced. Investigation by other commandors had discovered in the meanwhile that these Glandelinian defenses stroth stretched directly for many miles toard Abbieann from in front of Abbieannville to Bluffville landing.The resistance of the enemy was furious.The Christian assault upon this section had been a hundred fold more fiercer than the battle of Gettysburg, but the enemy had resisted successfully and the christians were recoiling before a most galling fire.

"Something is up."said Jennie Turmer whose armed was now bandaged."And it's not a good out come of the battle either,"

She was right.Instead of moving forward any further a large portion of the christian line was falling back, save from the direction of Sandersburg Hills where the whole christian line was still advancing.But elsewhere the christian movements and demonstrations had recieved a repulse. but the roar of battle was louder and wilder than ever.It was almost an unearthly sound.The boy and girlscouts had recieved a warning not to go forth any further, and finally while they were in long defile they listened to a few words from Violet vivian herself.

"This regiment of child scouts is to march to the woods beyond to do for the safty of the en embattled christian army pickett duty untill the tide turns the opposite way. I wish all of you boy and girlscouts to remember that we are now dangerously close to probably one of the bloodiest battles of the war so far and each scout must do his or her full duty.There must be no shirking from work, no unalertness on post and remember a picket caught off his or her guard is liable to be murdered or captured by the Glandelinians.Companies will get ready to march in a few minutes.We are to be sure that the enemy doesn't get around general Aronburgs rear."

"Hurrah"We're going to do something real good at last."aried Jennie Turner."I'm glad of it, and she started to get ready with all possible haste. Soon they were on the march, Benny himself beating his drum louder than ever, untill stopped by a general order to retain quietness, as they were now within easy distance of the fie fearful battle field.

Jennie Turmer soon found herself on picket duty for almost the first time in her life. She had often through her own accord stood on guard but picket duty was different, for now it was positively proved that the enemy was being successful again in the battle. he had been stationed close to the edge of a woods, and was given a beat of twenty feet ending on the right at a big pine on the left at a sideroad running into the Abbieann ville highway. Next to her was stationed Violet Vivian herself, for she and her sisters didn't even exempt themselves from that duty either, while Joice Vivian covered the road.The reserves or companies sent forward to aid the pickets, if needed lay in a hollow some distance back, and with these were several mounted scouts detailed for any messenger service which might be deemed necessary.

Up and down her short walk tramped the girlscout officer her gun loaded,and her eyes and ears on the alert for anything which might appear in the least suspicious in the uneven fields beyond the woods.She felt that she was now placed upon her full mettle, and resolved that nothing should happen which might be put down to the enemys credit under any condition.Two minutes only went by, and as the pickets had been cautioned not to say a word to one another unless it became necessary she stayed some distance from the rest. Stopping now and then she could see Violet tramping up and down, and occasionally came a louder sound of battle in the opposite direction.She was listening intently to the sound and was at first wonderig what Violet thought of it, when she suddenly stopped short again, and gripped her rifle tighr tighter.

"What was that far out in the field moving slowly along beside an old half tumbled down stone wall of some atandoned farm house half ruined by the Abbieann disaster!"

With her heart standing fairly still, she dashed the tears from her eyes(tears caused by the smoky atmosphere) and advanced a step or two forward..Beyond a doubt it was the form of some man...

For the instant after observing this strange find Jennie was at a loss of what to do.That the fellow who was advancing so cautiously was an enemy and a Glandelinian spy there could be no doubt.That being soo too why was the Glandelinian soldier going through so much pains and efforts in the face of an awful battle, and exposing himself to random shell fire or shrapnell to enter the christian lines, and yet chos chosing the more dangerous spot the line of boy and girlscout pickets which it was really impossible to pass through. There could be but one answer to this question.He surely must be a spy, bent upon some secret and impotant important mission.,and she had heard too how dangerous Glandelinian spies were.Under no conditions if they could help it would Glandelinian spies allow themselves to be captured alive.They'd suicide if there was no other way out. As the truth forced itself home to the young girlscout chieftian, she advanced a step in the direction of the roadway, fooling that the eyes of the strange man by the stone wall were upon her as that from an eagle, and that if he found out he was discovered it might prove a case of "the shot first" as to who remained alive to tell the story afterwards. She therefore was determined that she must not show a hand untill in a position to use a gun or her gun with accurancy and suddenese. Turning slowly and carefully from the roadway she strode slowly and retrached her steps to the big Pine Tree.As she did this she noticed that the man had shifted his position and was now some six feet closer to the woods, where a low bfringe of brush had grown up as if it weroe brittle, and where the passage of the flood had left behind it a large pool of deep or shallow muddy water, extending a distance of several hundred yards.The spy was then standing still and was apparently gazing in her direction as if he had observed her movement. Jennie and the spy were now less than thirty feet apart.Heping she wasn't really seen Jennie advanced for two steps more, and then she was close to the shelter of the tree.She saw the man then throw himself flat on the ground and slowly advance in a crawling posture.Jennie lis tene , but the man by the low bushes did not even utter a sound.Violets footsteps were some distance away and Jennie realized if any one made a sound the noise of the distant battle would muffle it easily. But something had also attracted Violets attention at the other end of her beat, and she remained there gazing cautiously a head, with her rifle at the ready.. The spy now again stood up but was standing partly behind a tree, one even with the one Jennie was on, or behind and it seemed evident he had his attention rivited on that tree. It must therefore be said, that Jennies heart now beat fast and loud as if it was a trip hammer.She felt it her duty to challenge the man, and if his answer was not satisfactory,and he tried to escape to shoot him on the spot.On the other hand she also understood that a single word from her lips might be the signal for a shot from the suspicious character, who would then try to escape through the woods on the opposite side of the little clearing. And too she had been told often by Violet and her sister that usually challenging a Glandelinian spy is very dangerous as it would reallly draw his fire, and that all spies were excellent sharpshooters. She too was not certain but she imagined she saw the gleam,, of a pistol in the right hand of the stranger as he now turned from that tree, and made for another. Stopping behind the tree for an instant, Jennie examined her gun to see that all was in perfect order for firing. Again the spy stepped forth, and Jennie remained where she was glancing for a second in the direction where Violet was on an even line with her own beat. Then she opened her lips to shout out the word "Halt" when she made a new and startling discovery.

"Where was the man? Did he vanish into thin air, or did the earth open under his feet and swallow him up. For the man had disappeared.. In vain she strained her eyes in this direction, and then that direction and beyond, and then toard Violet wondering if he had hid behind a tree in that neighborhood. In fact the fellow was nowhere to be seen, nor was he anywhere near the stretch of water. Jennie alm q lmost regretted having glanced for a second at Violet. But indeed she was "thunderstruck. What in the world had become of the stranger. she clutched her gun in nervous perplexity. Then she said to herself;

"Was that spy able to rush rapidly and pass our sentry line? No that could n c not be possible. He must still be in front. Then it came suddenly to her mind. In that location were dug a number of rifle pits. Had the man accidentally stepped into one of those.?

Jennie heard Violet returning now, or rather saw her, and therefore resolved on a new course of action. Waiting for the Princess to reach the big pine, she caught her by the arm, and then clapped her had gently over her mouth.

"Violet, listen but don't accidentally make any noise" She whispered into the princess's ear. "There is or was a strange man out there near the flood made lake. I saw him stalking and crawling along beside the stone wall a moment ago, but he has now mysteriously disappeared. But in that location there is a long stretch of hidden rifle pits, and he may have either gone down into one into one to hide or accidentally fell in. Tell your sister or whatever guard is next to you, and I'll tell Jeice, and if he's there yet we will round him up."""

Violet understood and nodded. Then suddenly possessed by a good idea, she exclaimed somewhat aloud noticing for fact she had forgotten her cartridge belt though in fact her pockets were full of bullets------

"I forgot my cartridge belt. As my sister if she'll loan me any bullets."

"You better ask the other guard nearest to you" answered Jennie catching hint or the cue, and answering just as loudly, and then they seperated but each retained an eye on the vinicity of the pine, that the man who had disappeared, might not try to get through the strong line of guards at that point.

"A Glandelinian spy eh?" whispered Jennie Vivian, when Jennie had called her up by that ruse of violet being short of the belt supply.

"All right I'll help you, but wait Jennie dear, till I've called the next guard to be more careful in the watch on the rond. Send the word to the rear too Jennie for its against our orders to try to do too much without lettttttone lettérg our officers of the guard know."

In a moment Jennie glided back and given the necessary order. Then she, violet, Jennie, and some others moved cautiously forward in a half circle with their rifles at the ready. They had scarcely advanced five yards, when Jennie vivian suddenly gave a startling cry for she found herself suddenly going down into a half chocked up rifle pit.

"Hey, hey girls here's the Glandelinian spy" she yelled loud enough to be heard above the roar of the distant battle.. "Down with that pistol you rebel or I'll finish you in short order."

"Gosh Hang the dod gasted luck a man has." came in a growl from the bottom of the long deep trench. "Get off of my shoulders you confounded Christian dog of a girlscout."

"I will when you surrender you devil. Throw up that pistol."

"I am not a devil. I' m a human being."

"Neither am I a christian dog of a girlscout. I say throw up that pistol or I'll hit you on the hit with this rifle butttt..... ."

By this time now only Jennie Turner, and violet, but also quite a crowd crowd of others were at the edge of the rifle pit which was several feet across and two hundred feet in length and overgrown with dry dead grasses, and scrubs. Down at the bottom there was clay and mud and in and in this a man of lengthy size and very slim was crouching covered with dust. Jennie Vivian had landed directly upon the fellows shoulders with her heavy boots and it was with small wonder that the man had yelled and cursed with pain.

"This is indeed the worse kind of luck I ever struck to be captured by a lot of soldier brats" muttered the captured one, as with very bad grace and an ugly pout, he surrendered his pos pistol. "Let me get out of this trench before I go down clear out of sight. You're pushing me down into the clay bog."

Jennie sprang up and went a few feet to the left. Then she and Jennie turner and others covered the man with the ir rifles and this was absolutely necessary for the chap instead of being cowed was thoroughly enraged that he should be captured by child scouts, and would do something desperate if he had the chance. It was soon found however that the clay at the bottom of the hole hold him fast, and four of the girlscouts had to haul him forth by main strength, and he proved to be a very heavy man indeed. By this time the cry "Corporal of the guard. Number Twenty five. A prisoner" had gown down the line, and the corporal was seen hurrying forward as fast as he could run to picket number twenty five which was Jennie Turner. He was followed by a detatch ment of others who mr marched the prisoner to the guard tent. Jennie turner relieved from duty by another soldier and who followed on behind being selected by Violet to question the prisoner for she had been the one who detected him. When surveyed in the daylight the captured one pre xe presented the appearance almost as if he was a Glandelinian prince. He however was a tall thin fellow, with sallow complexion, high chesk bones and tangled beard and hair, and though somewhat strikingly handsome had an evil eaten life face nevertheless and looked dangerous. His Princely uniform was gorgeously decorated, and why he hadn't disguised disguised himself was a surprise. Long and earnestly Jennie turner continued to gaze upon the prisoner wondering if she had not seen the man before.

"your name sir?" was the first question put to the stranger.

"My name? Ah!" Answered the prisoner, slowly. "Er—or—er—er Thomas John Cleveland."

"Thomas Cleveland, founder of the American city of Cleveland I suppose you were." Jennie Turner s neered, satisfied more than anything that the man was not telling the truth.

"No Miss Girlscout, I ain't no relation to that po riegn person."

"You ain't eh. Well that's too bad. Well Mr City of Cleveland where do you belong."

"Belong to general emperor vivians army at Vivian Wickey!"

"You do eh! What Company pray!"

"Belong to the Fourth Scood—I mean belong to the First Concentinian Volunteers, Company M!"

"You belong to two companies eh. Scoodlier and First Concentinian Volunteer company. Well that's going some. What are the captians names please."

"I only belong to one company. The captians name is James Thompson."

"First relation to general Manley, I suppose!"

"No sir no relation. He's a christian do—a christian general."

"Christian do-a general eh. You were going to say christian dog that gives you away. Well that's too bad, and when did you leave your two regiments.!"

"I only belong to one regiment I tell you."

"Well maybe you did but it may have been a sScoodlier one. When did you leave your regiment!"

"Right after leaving Norma Catherine near the Lucillie Richsen for dications..."

"Why did you leave there?"

"I wanted to call on my father and mother living up around herw, and the captian let me go."

"Who accompanied you here?"

"One of the Vivian Girl Princesses."

"One of the WHO!"

"One of the Vivian Girl Princess."

Jennie turner gave a sudden strange glance at violet bwho did the same to her.

"what was her name?"

Jennie Vivian"

"I see" and Jennie couldn't hardly resist the temptation to smile. "Why then did you try to crawl through our extensive sentry line."

"I couldn't get no counter sign or pass. Jennie vivian forgot it her self and did not have time to w it write a pass."

"what was the countersign the day you left your camp!"

"It was—it—was it—it—it— was" the prisoner pretended to think. "Hang the dodgasted tough time. I forgot what it was, corporal, upon my honor."

"I'm not a corporal" said Jennie turner "But who can believe a word you say. Suppose we search you! Have you any objections."

"It ain't respectful girlscout officer. If you're christians then you would not try to steal my things."

"Oh yes we have a right to search you, under or certain circumstances."

"but I've given you my name and regiment" pleaded the prisoner who seemed to be very much alarmed over the possibility of a search. He did not fear soldiers, but these dangerous child scouts he dreaded. "You might as well let me find my quarters."

"Yes! You've surely put your foot into it, Mister. The army you mentioned is too far away for you to have gotsen here very safily, and the Vivian Girl you said accompanied you did not do so but has been here all the time, and so has her sisters. You're a spy and you don't dare deny it."

At this announcement the lower jaw of the prisoner dropped slightly, and he forgot to stand up straight.

"Well er---er-- we came down------our company I mean-" he stammered."

"It was a mistake, but our company is here--I'll take my oath on it."

"I'll give you the full benefit of the doubt---after you have been searched.George remove his coat and vest, and force him to remove his boots.Jennie Vivian my friend, what is it?"

"I wish to converse with that prisoner Jennie"said the Vivian Girl, who felt she was on the verge of a very important discovery.

"I believe I am well acquainted with him, and can force him to reveal himself."she added in a whisper.

"Go ahead Princess you have the say."answered Jennie briefly."But be careful he doesn't pull any tricks in case he recognizes you."

"I want to ax you sir how you left that James Deldon, head of the Dell Mell Temm Mell Prison at Andrean section of yivian Wickey and his followers who persecuted me and my sisters when we were there." said the Princess aloud, and as she spoke sternly she eyed the prisoner narrowly.

"By thunder of thunders."was the ejaculation, and the man retreated a step and gave her the "once over"critically.He surveyed the other Vivian Girl violet still closer."If it ain't two of those dod gasted Vivian Girl meddlesome fools Deldon is still after."he continued before considering his words.

"Exactly"burst from the young Princess's lips."and she scowled."I thought sure I recognized you even though its nearly over two years ago.Jennie and all of you my friends here I must tell you he is not only a spy but worse."

"What do you mean by worse Jen?"demanded Jennie Turner surprised.

"He's a helper of that child slave devil trader James Quincy Deldon, who was and is our worst enemy, and he's also a thief, and a vandal. He's the man who put dynimite in our pockets that day the big prison was afire, to get us into trouble on the charge of trying to blow up the whole works. We thought we'd have the chance to capture him some day. It was up near N'rmm Catherine where the big Dell Mell Tell Mell Penet or prison fire occured, and though we were blamed for it it was he we found out who set it with the purpose to burn all the slaves to death.He and his followers have always tried to injure me and my sisters ever since the adventure there."

"It ain't so you little brat"roared the prisoner."I didn't now James Deldon nor any of his friends just as Jackson Sams, nor Francis Walters nor Ross Poss nor anyof them."

"Insee you remember the names well enough."returned Violet herself coldly.

"And you will note that you added Doss's name which my sister didn't mention.Poss is another of the crowd.I and my sisters will see to it that you'll get your deserts.You'll not set fire to a child slave house full of children, get us implicated and get away with it.Search him and search him closely."who commanded...

"We'll search him.Was the short answer.

The searching came at once.Slipped into one of the mans boots was a large but square shaped envelope with a yellow slip of paper, which on being unfolded, was found to be both a Glandelinian and a christian army pass, one signed by General Arlington and the other no signature at all.There was also another paper which the corporal perr perused with even deeper interest.

"HE IS NOT A spy" after all murmured "Violet as she glanced over the papers."He was a messenger for thevenemy nevertheless and thatvis nearly as bad. "he turned to Jennie Turner."your discover of this man saved general Concentinian Aronburg a from a disaster, and us from having our own plans frustrated."

Then Jennie Turner was able to go on the return to hr her own selected regiment, and the supposed to be spy was brought to the general headquarters.Here it was at last ascertained that his name was what he told it to be.It was surmised that he had been sent to go through the christian lines without stopping to bring a message to another section of the glandelinian army in the opposite direction.The man however would con verse but little, and was placed under heavy guard untill some of the generals themselves could question him as soon as the terrible battle was over... over.

"That's a gold feather in your cap Jennie."cried Angline Angeline yivian herself, as they were agi again watching the battle in the the distance."you'll hear from my other sisters soon and it'll be a higher commission and see if it don't."

"It's odd that I should capture one of Deldons crowd."Mused Jennie Vivian."Doesn't it seem to prove that most of the Glandelinian armies who were up around the north, have moved down here to prevent the secrets secrets of the Abbieann disaster from being found out."?

"If they ain't down here now they will be pretty soon"putin Joice

"You can bet these fool Glandelinian armies won't give up their main stronghold at Abbieann without the toughest struggle of the war yet."

"One thing is certain Jennie."Continued Jennie Turner."This man if he really is any Confederate to that James Deldon, won't both you any more."

"Do you believe they'll shoot him?"said one of theyboyscouts Louis with a shudder.

"Of course they'll shoot him if it is proven he has been successful in other spying depredations of the past."declared Angeline Vivian."It's the fate of any successful spy that is captured. We can expect the same case if once we were captured during the same thing and failed to escape.But we don't shoot spies if they were not successful and didn't cause our armies disaster."

"I was the one who captured him or saw him first."declared Jennie Turner."so I shouldn't wish to have his blood on my head Princess."

"He brought his fate on himself Jennie---you nor any of us had any thing to do with that.He understood fully well what he can expect when he leaves the leaves the Glandelinian positions positions and tried to worm his way over here.Besides he's more of a desperate character than a spy, he is one of our own child enemies as he's a henchman of that dreadful dreadful Child child slave dealer and trader James Quincy Deldon.And th more than that the fact that he had his big revolver ready us for use showed he was prepared to sell his freedom dearly, if given even one third the chance.The accident of his falling into the rifle pit caused his capture or otherwise we'd never have captured him alive.If you Jennie had advanced upon him openly and alone he would have shot you down as if you were no more than a mad dog and then run for it, as sure as fate."

A few minutes later Jennie Turner was called up before the General of the Ninth Corps, who questioned her closely. Then the prisoner was brought in,and Jennie for the first time learned that the man had told the truth about his name.As Jennie went out, she passed by closely to the prisoner, who scowled at her most viciously and whispered into her ear,

"You little devil.I'll get square if I don't die."

To this Jennie Turner made no answer. None of these words ever daunted her because no matter how much Glandelinians may threaten revenge, it was found out by them themselves to be wise, and don't go monkeying with Abbieannian girl or boyscouts.It's rank sucide to do so. For instance here's an experience which happended to Glandelinians during this battle at the same time the prisoner had been captured. It usually never happens that a boy and girlscout is ever captured, they're too dangerous to meddle with in this fact, but at this time it did happen, and it ended in a horror never expected or ever thought of.A girlscout by the name of Cather ine Janes Cornway a member of the Al Spencer Girlscout Corps of the Burroughs, which terrorized many Glandelinian armies since the lu start of the grueling war, was arrested while out scouting by a party of Omarian Scoodlier Glandelinians at Abbieann Springs during the early morn ing of the second day of the battle.

A witness of the affair said to general Aronburg-

"I didn't believe they would have dared to even try to rescue the little child scout, as there were thirty Glandelinians on horse to that of only three boyscouts and one girl"and he told how the massacre was staged by the four child scouts who had been armed with machine gun rifles, and who had rode up near to the squadron of Glandelinians and calmly waited for them to ride into the trap.

"I saw them headed for Abbieann Springs to meet the Glandelinian officers who were bring the little girlscout prisoner back from where she had been captured, having been caught unarmed so it was said."the witness related.

"I and my own scout saw them ride on toard the trap.One Glandelinian officer called Childdin and another called Blooms rode ahead of the squadron, and they met a Glandelinian provision train, and started over to another small squadron of Hobbonites across from the east road.There were over really fourty eight of the Glandelinians including the little girl, and seven high comm commissioned officers.They were to all go forth together toard the Glandelinian encampmentw not in the zone of the battle, and the two Glandelinian detective agents were to follow on horse.

"guddenly I heard the galloping of horses in another direction, and heard a little girls voice say"Put them up.Surrender or no quarter."

"I glanced down the road and saw one of the Glandelinians in blazing away but got hit himself by the little girls sabre, and from somewhere came a blaze of what sounded as if it was machine gun fire.I being in the danger zone crouched under the murderous fire.I believe from the sound there were three other machine gun rifles too.Ten of the Glandelinians and their horses too fell to the road close in front of me.A tree branch was splintered by the fire.The Glandelinians thrown into con fusion were powerless to return the fire.I threw myself down flat into a high field of grass and saw the grass being cut by the fire from the girl and boyscouts, and felt a stinging pain in my left arm.Then the firing ceased---and it was all over in a flash, and the wagons were of ire I saw some surviving Glandelinian soldier level a army pump gun at the retreating child scouts who galloppm gallopped southward our of out of the territory with Catherine Conway in their midst.. A young Glandelinian captian, and a score of others dashed from a side road at the sound of the shooting but had been too late.

"There they are Johns, get the little devils."the captian had shouted, pointing iward the child scouts.The officer aimed deliberately with his revolver firing three times.It was said the leading girlscout fell to the ground from her horse but before she was rescued by the three boys, she had re a remained lying there, shooting down the youn captian, and bring ing down the others single handed as fast as they came on, sometimes horse and all.Indeed comrades that sudden deadly sweep of bullets left a gruesome sight for many in that territory.Nearly all of those Fourty or more of the Glandelinians lay dead or dying with their fallen horses on the road, their highest officers amongst them all having fallen together, their heads pierced by bullets."

Other reports of this startling affair was"Blazing rifles and pistols of one girl and three boyscouts turned the Cross Roads into a scene of horror horror as fifty seven Glandelinian soldiers and five officers trying to get away with a xhild scout who was their prisoner, were ambushes and all slain and the prisoner liberated.The wholesale massacre resulted from a successful effort by four child scouts of the fierce and dangerous"gurrough type to rel ease Catherine Jane Conway, dangerous and notorious christian girlscout dog spy and scout and Killer of Glandelinian generals being brought to the Glandelinian camps.

The Glandelinian Attorney general Cuttingham ordered every Glandelinian cavarly officer and man not active in the battle to scout the whole territory and to arm themselves with grenades and machine gun pistols and search for the five child scouts.Some of the Glandelinian Federal Agents tried once to end the "Violent career" of Gertrude Angeline when they cornered that girlscout in one of the smaller Vivian Hills a year ago but were captured by her themselves. The report which was captured by the christians declared that Catherine Jane Conway was a dr friend of Schofield Penrod, a leader of the most dangerous of all christian boy and girlscouts the 'Fourty Ninth Degree Aronburg Rangers, who were often seen in various christian armies coming as if they were " pirits.First they're not there, a minute after the army is full of them. Penrod had been sought by all sorts of Glandelinian officers and Federal Agents charged with helping in the prison break of child slaves at Turner Hill in December 1912 when the Warden of the prison was captured and wounded by the escaping child slaves themselves.....222

General Hinnings chief of the Glandelinian Military Detectives expressed belief that the attack was a plot for the release of Catherine probably engineered by some of the boy scout higher leaders. The chief said that he doubted that Floyd Hanlons another dangerous child scout leader and destroyer of many a Glandelinian officer was involved. All Glandelinian officers had recieved a report that the squadron of boy and girlscouts which had met the "Littler Murderers" had been seen galloping down the Red Rose Road a route that leads toard the main christian lines. Hundreds of Glandelinian soldiers went in persuit but failed to get within rifle range of them.No one could have understood how Catherine NJane Conway came through unscathed through the deadly fusilade.It was said that Catherine Conway was one of the most desperate ttttta killers of Glandelinians ever heard of and a extremely dangerous spy, one of the most dangerous of all in the christian army.But the Glandelinians never seemed to get it into their heads that unsoon many girl and boyscouts hang around territories and can see all that happens.

All this time that she was again doing her Military Duties Jennie Turner was still slightly suffering from the deep bullet scratch in her left shoulder,, inflicted by the christian Glandelinian soldier as she was escaping from the christian scouts who at the time thought she was a enemy girlscout.Though the scratch was still there, raw, and bandaged up the pain had now left her entirely, and although she was still slightly weak from what she had e experienced, yet she was able to go about her duties as previously mentioned, and as acting as the picket ear guard too,,, and indeed that was a great comfort comfort.

So that strange and adventuresome morning passed, and still as Jennie Turner said and observed the battle still raged on, and still it was a standstill standstill on both sides, and she wondered how both sides could be so intolerably stubborn.. Also Jennie heard how general Aronburgs great army was assembling near Abbieann to crush on a fierce assault there, and of wht what the various christian generals were expected to do..222.

from but from home, from her parents, her own companies at Vivian Wickey, and elsewhere or how the seige of Vivian Wickey was turning out she heard nothing, because because of such a great destruction of all sorts of communicationns....S.S.S. After the arrest of the spy she was now strolling about withinin hearing of the stubborn battle.One of her girlscout nr new acquaintances Viola Lemming accompanied her.she noticed how brave Jennie Turmer appeared.

"I presume you will want to go outto see what the battle is doing."she said with hif half asmile.

"I was pondering on whether I would bring along withme three soldiers and go on a scouting tour."she answered."I have been too inactive lately forthe health of the cause..."

"We would rather that you stay withus always, as long as you please and not go outtoo close to the battle zone."she returned hesitatingly" "You,you seem as if you were one of our sisters."

Jennie's face flushed with pleasure at this..

"You are very very good---you and all your comdes and officers."Jennie said taking her hand."As long as I live I shall never forget you, and I do trust tht that some day I shall be able to rojay you, at least as far as I am able." And then she turned away as she heard someone calling her.

A minute later she told violet,and her sisters of her intention.

"I must do some of my scouting , dangerous as it may be."she said."You and your sisters may object, but you understand you have gone through scouting adventures which I myself have never boasted of yet.At any time you can notify the army authorities if you will to send three men to accompany me as an escort.As soon as they come for me,I will be off and return later with news."

"But if any of the Glandelinian patrols see you they'll shoot you down."said Violet shuddrring."I didn't even imagine that when you started telling me that."I thought--------"""she did not finish.

"Did you believe I would break my word of honor as a girlscout leader!" she questioned seriously.

"No---but---but---"Oh to go out and take a chance in such a battle, some thing, I and eve my sisters won't do just now.It is horrible."she tried to speak on, but the words stuc in her throat, and she rushed from the room.Her sisters were scarcely less affected affected.

"It is terrible this change you have in mind of making making" said voice Vivian."Better stay here safely while while you can.Perhaps the battle soon will be over, and then you can do some scouting if you so desire."

But Jennie Turmer was obdurate.She did not intend to be captured or set upon by Glandelinian soldiers if she could help it, but at the same time she would not go back on her word to them or the country she loved so well when she must do her duty. So a few minutes later an orderly carried a note from Violet Vivian to the nearest of the inactive part of the christian lines. In this she stated that Miss Jennie Turmer one of the greatest and daring girlscout spies, had desired to go out on a scouting tourand wished however for three soldierato accompany her as an escort.She added that Jennie Turmor was not much more than a little girl but that they did not hardly worry about her getting into any unnecessary trouble with the enemy, and that if they could give her the necessary escort, she would consider it a special favor, for she girlscout spy was so brave that she had won everybodys heart.

"On recieving this note the captian in charge of that section smiled grimly.

"All a little girls bosh."he muttered."That girl Jennie Turmer don't need an escort.It anything happens its they who'll need her protection.But as it is the Princess's orders I'll send the escort.."

Half an hour had not yet passed when he detailed a guard of three soldiers to be a bodyguard to Jennie Turmer.The soldiers started off on foot however as riding was too difficult here.They had to tramp a distance of three miles over rather rough ground or roads, and reached Jennie Turmers tent an hour later.

"So this is the little girlscout eh!"said the sergeant in charge."All right we'll be glad to accompany her anywhere even for her companionship. Come on."

"In a moment"answered Jennie"and first hugged and kissed violet and her sisters. Good bye, and remember if I cannot have the chance to return I shall never forget your loving friendship to me.You'll have a little more wase ,I fancy now you can see that I might hope to succeed in my quest."she added with peculiar emphasis, which violet, and her sisers sisters noticed.

"We shall regret having you go."answered Violet. Her sisters said nothing said nothing just then but turned and ran reentered the tent. In a second more Jennie was off, with the sergeant ahead, and a soldier upon each side of her, and indeed she appeared more as if she was a prisoner being led off.

"I don't see what you want to go out scouting during such a battle as this is. It's dangerous I tell you and I guess guess you'll remember the sweet time you had here, if you're ever captured with us and are in a regular Glandelinian prisoner or made into a child c alave." declared one of the soldiers in an effort to turn her purpose. "If you are captured with us, you won't have no such bits of calico to look after you I'll warrent you that, so if I were you I'd turn away from such a purpose now."

"It's my duty to do it." said Jennie Turner. "and besides us child scouts have proven we can do it better and safer than any of you soldiers."

The soldier said no more. The end of the company street which leads to another had hardly been reached when Jennie Vivian came rushing along the path, calling to Jenny to stop. She halted, turned, and advanced several steps toard her.

"What were you think of Jennie rushing off without bringing your weapons with you." she said. "Here's your cartridge belt and pistols."

And she handed over the two guns and the cartridge belts and before the astonished girl girlscout could reply she was speeding toard her own tent again.

Although nearly dumbfounded because she had forgot herweapons and the cartridge belt, Jennie did not lose her wits. She turned her back to the soldiers for the moment and waved the oil cloth in the air.

"Thank you Princess'n and good bye for I hope a very short time." she cried, and then returned to the soldiers once more, and the march forward proceeded. One of the soldiers thought he saw something strange but believed he was only seeing things. On they went along a road bounded on one side by an open corn field and on the other a heavy wall of scarcely leafed forest of pine intermingled with high brush flowers and unusally high weeds. Jennie noticed with surprise that it was growing sort of dark as if night was coming on, and that the timber was between herself and the river.

She understood entirely what a chance she and her three soldier escorts would run if they would be suddenly surprised by Glandelinians, and the danger too they would run into in trying to escape them in this territory ---that the Glandelinians would first try to capture the --and in failing to do this would do their best to shoot her and her companions down.

But on the other hand if she does this sort of duty what is she or her companions to expect. She wouldn't persewd allow herself to be captured alive for for a journey to a Glandelinian prisonett where perhaps she would be made to pass many months and it might be years, in some loathsome cell crowded with others, poorly fed, and made to suffer all sorts of dignities was something she would not alow allow to happen to her at any cost. No one could imagine anything worse than they were in a Glandelinian prison, for it was all too true.

Therefore she's shoot every Glandelinian that tried to capture her.

A mile had therefore been covered, when they reached a large cross road, which now turned away from the river. Here stood a tall deserted farm house and some barns set in a wilderness of pine trees.

"Great Heavens look" yelled Jennie Turner, shoving the soldiers away from her, and pointing toard the house. "Look out the Glandelinians are going to shoot at us. Look out."

As was natural all three of the soldiers ducked their heads and strove in vain to ascertain what Jennie had meant. But no shots came. Instead came a goodly swarm of Glandelinian soldiers, but by the time they started to come Jennie Turner and the soldiers after firing some shots with a sudden dash had gained the side of the highway and leaped the worm fence. The Glandelinians then did fire, and one of the soldiers was slightly wounded. Jennie Turner who was somewhat behind the soldiers and who had tripped tripped on the roots had remained lying down to the consternation of the three, but just as soon as the nearest Glandelinians came within range she started such a rapid fusillade from her pistols, that six of them fell in a quicker moment than it takes towrite about it, and the others were thrown into confusion. Then Jennie got to her feet, opened fire again, and then before the Glandelinians had recovered and comprehended that there were only four of the fugitives, the girlscout and her three soldier escorts were out of sight behind the trees.

"Fools after those christian dogs." Yelled the commander, and clambering clambering over the fence as rapidly as his large form would permit, he himself a captian was hit in the shoulder and fell backwards. At the same time two of the Glandelinian soldiers seeing a quiver among the trees fired, but instead of the bullets touching the fugitives, they answered and the two Glandelinians fell. In a moment more the survivors were in full pursuit after the four. In the meantime The young girlscout girlscout leader, and the three soldiers with her were pushing their way through the tangled undergrowth and over jagged stones and exposed tree roots with all the speed at their command. For a moment though they were forced to hidebehind trees as they saw a party of soldiers in gray pass them on horseback. Then they went on again. There was no surety of losing the direction or the location of the river, for the whole neighborhood sloped gradually in that direction, so all the four fugitives had to do was to continue on going downhill until the water was gained. It was however very perilous moving too, for the undergrowth was heavy and almost impenetrable with rose and briar bushes, which scratched, and at times caught their clothing so tightly, that often it was impossible to move unt until the offending branch had been cut or torn completely from its bush.

"I'm bound that we must get away from those Glandelinians somehow" Jennie muttered, as she herself flungaside a briar which left a scratch from nose to ear. "And there is one consolation for us however, they are all tall and big men all larger than even my soldier companions, especially that colonel in charge of the m, and following us down here will be just that much more difficult for them. If only they don't send word along the river to watch out for me and my soldier companions....."

Indeed (you are in need) the last thought gave a chill to her. But she did not waste time upon it. She heard her tireless persuers crashing along, and cursing and blaspheming, and by the sound it was evident they were only a hundred feet behind her and the soldier escort. They seemed to be getting closer too or else it may have been her imagination. Coming to a clear spot, they crossed it as if they were four two footed deers chased by dogs and hunters.

"Crack, crack, crack," the four were seen, and threeof the nearest of the Glandelinians had fired. Jennie felt one bullet clip her shoulder directly over the spot, where her wound was still raw. It was indeed agony to even imagine this, that if she had to suffer the awful pain of being shot again in her wounded shoulder.. Indeed she was almost tempted to give up. But however before she could even reach such a decision she and her three men companions covering her were among the trees again, the being in the lead at this moment of her three followers was now reaching again anoty another sort of a clearing, but quite a narrow one, but thick with undergrowth, and here it was about as gloomy as though the time was midnight, instead of such an early hour of the morning. At the center of the clearing she and her soldier escorts paused, and seeing the gleam of water near by and finding it to be a cool really pretty cold stretch of water from a near by spring, secured a drink. The soldiers however did not wish to waste time drinking water.

On the opposite side of the clearing was a stretch of woods, and be yond another clearing much larger. Should they attempt to cross it at once or wait untill a more favorable opportunity presented itself, for it seemed that if they made a dash they might expose themselves to the fire of the persuers and surely be shot down. After their loss, and also tantalized by the long chase the Glandelinians surely by this time were dreadfully enraged... While Jennie herself pondered the situation the voices of three of the nearest Glandelinian soldiers who happened to be officers suddenly came upon her hearing...

"Seen anything of those four christian dogs, Sergeant.?"

"No Captian, did you??? "

"Not one of them."

"How about it Lieutenant Cramerhammer."?

"I'm sure they must have passed this clearing." replied one of the privates coming close. But I guess they are on the other side now."

"We'll surround the clearing and see. We've got enough of soldiers. We're responsible for it if they escape. One of them was a dangerous girlscout, and her capture would be very important indeed. If there were a dozen child scouts we couldn't dare attempt persue. But one isn't nothing!" (Oh no)

The officers moved off, one to one side, the remaining two, to the other issueing commands to the soldiers.. Jennie Turner fairly holding her breath crouched low behind a bush overhanging the spring. What if the enemy should surround her and her companions, and call uponnher to give herself and her companions up?

"They'll never capture me alive, I'll sell my life as dearly as I can" she thought, and drew forth both her pistols. They were twelve barreled affairs affairs, quite up to date, and every barrel was loaded. Besides she also had her rifle and two grenades. With great caution she put her pistols away and unslung her long range rifle. An anxious five minutes passed. The glandelinian soldiers had gone beyond sight and hearing, and she was beginning to believe they would not return, when again she heard the voice of the colonel."

"Captian, Lieutenant,Where in the whole damn fourteen fiehed hamlet are you."was the cry."Confound the crazy luck brought on by those fools of christian dogs, where can that little soldier brat and her soldier friends be.I'll take a look into that clearing myself on my own account no matter what the danger.I'm not afraid of them or her."

And the Glandelinian colonel entered the cc clearing.. He was almost upon the young girlscout officer, when Jennie seeing her escorts or two of them some distance away, and not close enough to do anything in her be half right away thought it time to act... Leaping to her feet with marvelous swift swiftle awiftness and her cet like agility, she threat her pistol long barreled rifle into the colonels face.

"Throw down your gun and not a seconds delay."she commanded in a whisper. "Down or I fire."

The words and the flash of the rifle barrel toof the Glandelinian colonel colonel by surprise., but he only retreated without obeying the command to throw down the gun.He was about to raise it with the purpose to la g bang her withthe butt, when she sprang upon him as if she had been a wildcat, and sent the huge figure splashing into the small stream which though narrow was very deep.

"Glash, wough" came in a splutter from the colonel, but the girlscout even if she did not hear him or did, paid no attention, but with swift steps followed by her three f ollowers made her way across the small clearing, and then into the bigger oje a one and once more began the race for the river shore.(more)

As they cameclosearound her Jennie warned her three followers that they must be alert for the enemy in front, as well as behind, for the other soldiers and the officers having not returned, must have either gone forward or sent warning all along the line. She strained her eyes to the utmost and clutched her rifle tighter.A half loud prayer escaped her lipsand those of the three soldiers.Oh f if only they could get safely wit hin the christian lines aga in.. Presently a very welcome sound came upon their ears.It was the murmur of the river as it rushed over the high st ones in the shallows and made a bend southward. Indeed had the river ran north or northwestward and came from the direction of the far distant forest fires her escape would have been cut off for the water would then have been too hot for any one to swim across alive.. alive, soon she again being in the lead jafted the final line of brushwood, and despite the gloom saw thedancing water before her.... placing her pistol and its holsters in her hat, so as to hold the weapon dry, she jammed the headgear down tightly and calling to the soldiersto f ollow waded into the stream.

Heand her followers advanced through the swirling waters with the most extreme caution, understanding how treacherous this river was because it was still full of the receding flood waters, and and aware that the whole northern side was alive with Glandelinian soldiers, while the southern shore as guarded by soldiers of her own country's cause.To be shot by one or the other of the many military guards would be equally unpleasant ,and perhaps equally fatal...

"If I only surely had some better way of letting the men of my own side that I am all right."the thought as she and her three companions paused for a momentnily rest when about one fourth of the stream had been passed..he felt sure neither side could see her uniform of that of her soldiers escort in the gb gloom, and having lost her own soldier hat she was now wearing one which she had secured from a the colonel she had hurled into the stream running through the clearing .A few steps farther, and she herself suddenly went down to her arm pits, and the current now hurled the four of them from their feet, and sent a shiver through the little girlscout.she felt very cold, and realized that she was not yet half a strong or as much recovered from her shoulder wound as she had imagined.. But retracing her way was now out of the question and she contin ued on boldly for the opposite shore, a distance of over a fr few hundred feet.already the middle of the stream had been reached and she was congratulating herself on the fine progress made, and the soldiers being powerful swimmers had continued on beside her to prevent anything happening to her, when suddenly a challenge rang out from some distance below her.

"Hi.Hi There you four in the river.Who are you?"

The cry came from the christian side of the shorethe shore but she understood she would be shot at as a foe.

"I'm a friend Jennie Turner."she answered, but as cry cries came now from the opposite shore she didn't halt, but swam on faster than ever."

"If you are Jennie Turner, turn in here and give the countersign."

"I can't turn in just yet, the current of the river won't let me but I can give the countersign.The Glandelinians on shore will hear me though if I do.Wait till I turn in.I am coming as fast as I can."

"Hey you four little devils or who ever you are over there you go over to the christian dog lines and I'll fire"cried some one on the opposite shore.

"Just go and fire and you'll burn you Glandelinian devil yourself."

Jennie yelled in answer and then havingswam a few more feet she clutched her rifle tighter and dove out of sight.She was none too soon for feeling that the four would escaped him,the Glandelinian guard brought his gun into range, and pulled the trigger.From under the surface of the stream Jennie and her followers heard a muffled report, but the bullet passed wide of its aim.The young girlscout and her men friends remained under as long as it was possible,at the same time reaching out with desperate efforts for the southwestern shore.She however felt herself carried downward by the current and this in itself tended to bring her closer to the enemyhard than ever.At last unable to hold her breath any longer she came up and gave a gasp,.The soldiers had followed suit. parping and sputtering.The firing of the gun had ar oused the guard line for several hundreds of feet up and down the river on both sides.A rush was made h on the Glandelinian side, and the sentry was requested to explain matters, which he did as well as he could. He told that one was a girlscout and there were three soldiers with her in the water swimming over to the christian side of by the shore.

"We'll have the ce ntepedes yet!"cried the officer in command."Bring out the gasoline launch as quick as you can."

His order was obeyed as promptly as possible, and the officer and six armed men entered.But all this had cost a waste of time and now Jennie Turner was once more where she could touch bottom.She glanced to the enemy side of the shore, and saw the boat put out.

"Save me christian companions ashore."she cried."Save me and the men with me.Shoot the Glandelinians."

"We certainly will."came an answer almost in front of her, and half a dozen guns were fired.A yell came from the launch and an answering fire, but to no avail.Again shots came from the christian side of the shore, and four men toppled over in the boat which now immediately began to turn and head for the Glandelinian side of the shore with all possible haste..The persuit was over.Several more shots were fired on both sides without any effect, and then the shooting came to an end. Not untill it was all over did Jennie Turner fully realize what an awful strain she had been under.She waded out of the water and up the muddy shore her companions following, and found herself confronted by a doren men in Lavendar uniforms

"What in the world does this meanShe are you little girl, one of the Vivian Princess's?" demanded one of the number in awe and surprise.

"I am a Christian girlscout, and my name is Jennie Turner.I av have been persued by the enemy even into the river and I just escaped."answered the girlscout."I am not of this army but of Emperor Viviane, and I belong to the 5t Rit'a Purple regiment of Angelinia aAronburgs Mascot Rangers of the Highest Orders.If one of you will help------"

She however could not go no further.Everything danced before her eyes, trees soldiers, guns, and she fell back into a pair of outstretched arms,utterly exh u exhausted.

"A brave little youngster,I'll vater my soul."was the comment of the Abbieannian who held her."She says her name is Jennie Turner.It behooves me I have heard much of her.Come men let us bring her to camp, and do the best we can for her."

When Jennie T urner came to her senses, she found herself lying on a small but cleanly covered cot in a tent, about half a mile from where under the fire of the Glandelinians she had crossed the Abbicann river.. near by was a small farmhouse used by General Concentinian Aronburg him self as his headquarters and half a dozen christian officers were present at this moment in the tent where she lay maying out an many various reports as to the progress of the gigantic battle on and attending to other duties of a battle military nature.

A hour had passed, and then she felt strong enough to tell her story in detail, to which the generals and others present listened with lively interest.An officer understood the situation, and as Jennie Turner was really a girlscout of Angelinia Aronburgs army of scouts and as the officers Knew that from identification papers on her they readily believed her.

"I suppose you would desire to return to where the Princesses are right away."said one of the generals. "We are going to send some of the army wagon trains to that portion of the line ina very few minutes and one of them can go down by the Abbie Run road, and you can ride with the teamister if you so wish(but don't be a poor fish)."

Jennie ind eed gladly accepted the offer, and about ten that morning, she was homward bound teard the Vivian Girls part of the camp at probably the rate of aboudi four miles an hour for the canvas covered wagon was loaded to the "eshbore" and the debris caused in this neighbor hood yesterday by shell explosions and the battle raging here had caused the road to be amost almost impassable. Ordinarily the time with the noise of distant battle would have drugged heavily, but the teamister was a jolly fellow who loved all children as much as if they were his own, full of jokes, and war stories, and he made Jennie forget her troubles in spite of herself. They had their army rations with them and only stopped long enough to feed the horses. Jennie's heart beat quickly as they approached the familiar surroundings of the territory of the Vivian Girls part of the camp/ It seemed to her as if it had been a very long long while since she had gone away. She wondered how Violet, and her sisters, and the rest of the boy and girlscouts were...

"Jennie my dearest friend. God be Praised." came from a corner of a small building of wood, and the next moment the young girlscout soldier was in Violet's arms, while her sisters were bobbing this way and that,,, waiting" for a chance to get ather.

"I heard you had been shot and captured a prisoner." Gasped Angeline Irch-Richee. "Oh jJennie. What a narrow escape."

"We recieved a report thatbyou had been killed." said Violet with her eyes full of tears. "Captain Captian Tooper sent us word too how recently you had gone over the bluff (de puf) while riding your horse on scouting, and when your horse Joanie came back alone----"

"Joanie" burst out Jennie. "her face beaming more brightly than ever. "Is he really here."

"Why yes he came here yesterday. A soldier dau caught him who recognized him and turned him over to general Aronburg. He is athome in your tent as stable now."

"I'm awfully glad Princess. I was afraid I would never see the dear old horise again. And how is Fred Nance and Ned Perkins." "!"!!!!!"

"As well as can be expected.. The uproar of this awful battle has upset him greatly because he and his friend cannot join in the conf l ict, and they cannot settle down as they used to. But how pale and thin you are. you must have had some unusual adventure." "QAAQZ"

"and we didn't want her to do it." declared Jennie Vivian with a pout. "It was and isto dangerous. "We won't even do it ourselves. We are too well acquainted with general Arlingtons Glandelinians. They're too. dangerous."

"he is only a ghost of thorself too" said Angeline Vivian.

"She sure is." added Hettie while her sisters nodded their approval to her words."

"Never mind Jennie" said Catherine warmly. "We'll fatten you up again, and help you to regain your strength, and recover from your shoulder wound, and I and my sisters are proud to know what a herione we have in you. you are as a sister to us" and then she gave her such a hug and a kiss as only Catherine could give---she was so whole souled in everything she did.

Violet and her sisters had been at this part of the camp to try and find at a signal station the las latest news of the raging battle. Around the ruins of Abbicann so far though in possession of the enemy all was still quiet, but elsewhere along the battle line matters had been getting much livelier every minute. The news from this distrct of battl battle did not arive untill three hours past but when it did come how eagerly every line was read, and what a running fire of comment ensued. They learned that both sides were at a standstill. Soon the nine were on their way to their own section of the camp again. As they allowed their horses to jogg along over the stony company street Jennie related the particulars of her experience with the enemy when she went scouting with her three companions.

"I don't mind telling you I did feell good and scared d" she said to Violet, and her sisters, seriously" ut I wouldn't let the Glandelinian soldiers find that out for all the orld world. The se Glandelinians are persistent when they persue any one."

"You're your brave father over again." said Violet herself with a smile. "I feel sure you remembered even sadly when he was captured by the Glandelinians at the time he was wonded at Cedornine and they removed his leg very roughly, but he never winced---so many of the soldiers and officers told me, and even prisoners said the same. Though they hated him they admired his bravery and let him go on exchange very soon just because of his heroism a thing seldom done by those fierce Glandelinians.. soldiers."

"Oh I hope Jennie Turmer never loses a leg or an arm." cried Angeline Vivian.

"If I do I hope I'll be as heroic as my father was." said the girlscout gravely...

Walter Starring was as well pleased, as Violet, and her sisters had been to see Jennie Turmer his best friend once more. "I was afraid you had been shot and your body had drifted down into the flood below the river." he said as he grasped both of Jennie's little hands. "Tell me all about it." and again the tale was told, the others as eager to hear it all again, as if she had not yet told the story of her experience. The next hour came and went, and by that time Jennie felt as well and as strong as ever but she felt narrows because of the awful sound of the desperate battle, and wondered who was being punished now. During that short time she had written a sort of dispatch to general Constantinian Aronburg. The other regiment of boy and girlscouts were not as yet active several miles to the rear of the battle field, and an equal distance south of Abbicann. To join them as this time would have been useless, and Jennie recieved word that she might stay inactive untill general Hindernines army moved forward to storm the enemy. Now that she felt able to do so, Jennie superintended some of the boy and girls who were just becoming girl and boyscouts, and giving their leader a much needed few hours rest. But Jennie's heart was not in that sort of job just now---it was with the well drilled child scouts, and with Violet, and her sisters. She was impatient to rejoin them.

"A li letter for you Missie Jennie Turmer." said one of the boyscouts just about dinner time...

"Jennie recieved the communication and glanced over it carefully. It was a military letter as the stamp in the corner of the envelope showed. She tore it open hastily, then rushed off to find Violet, and her sisters.

"I and you Princesses are begged to come to Big Girl nool as soon as possible." she said. "The Glandelinian armies under the Manleys are getting ready for a move upon that big town." "she cried, but Violet and her sisters informed her that all such hope was impossible unless general Arlo Arlington was worsted for his army barred all approaches to the south north and west. Violet and her sisters even wondered how the letter got through in the first place, and feared too it might me be a scheme to get them as was often the case, as the letter was not signed by any particular person. The day was very gloomy (boomy) and unusally warm and more smoky than ever. Yet despite it all Jennie Turmer was in the finest of spirits, and so was her own horse.

She was in conversation with two boyscouts.

"It appears as if the Glandelinians are going to give us a good shake up at Abbicann to my way of thinking." "said one of the boyscouts..... "I recieved a dispatch from a friend who is watching the battle but not in it, and he says that it is certain that general Arlington even during the battle has many secret Glandelinian spies and agents within our lines sizing up our defenses."

"Well I believe we have allies in general Arlingtons army too." said Jennie Turmer, and in this she was right. Long after the battle it was found that a christian spy occupying a confidential Commission in the Glandelinian army had given to general Aronburg the first warning that the Glandelinian general Arlington was about to move his main troops for an attack upon the christian army near Abbicann by way of the North bend in the river. It was such spy work which gave general Aronburg time to throw up strong defenses and thus hold general Arlington in check untill further reinforcements for general Aronburg could arive..

"They won't gain a thing by rushing a general assault upon us here" put in the second boyscout. "Why my divisions regiments and companies of christian troops are spring forward against the enemy as if they were being created as fast as they fell. We're bound to wipe out general Arlington and his army by more force of numbers."

"That may be true-----just now" returned Jennie Turmer seriously. "But what worries me is sooner or later, they'll be able to put more men in the fields than ourselves, and the nearest christian army that could help us is at Big Girlknool and that one will soon have all it can to do to take care of itself when the Manleys get busy. Why general Arlington some say have four times as many men as general Aronburg has right now."

"Yes but the Glandelinians won't and don't find as our christian soldiers do Jennie. We have often heard the Glandelinian authorities complain to the world that the christians whip them because their armies are bigger than theirs, but even when they put bigger armies than ours against us, they don't even then win a battle. We are fighting not only for God's cause, and our Country's cause, but for State Rights of Galvernia for the Pe Prohibition of child slavery and their Freedom but even for the safty of our women and children, and our homes. A man can stay at home and fight for it better than he can go off and fight."

"nother thing to remember" added the other boyscout. "We have the advantage along the sea coasts for despite the capture of our Navies at Vivian Wicley we had a far bigger navy at other bases than the enemy thought and we are or have been blockading all the Galverinian and Glandelinian Western and eEastern ports so that the Glandelinians cannot get outside help from her ol country by sea and that too they cannot sent goods to foriegn nations or buy mi munitions from the m.It won't be long before those foriegn nations will begin to complain b because of Glandelinia causing this; and if we send to these nations what they need best to crush the Depression said to have been caused by the Abbieann disaster, they'll furnish us with m both money and men even by intervention to show Landelinia the place where she belongs and keep her there too for good. The whole Christian W orld is our Best Friend, and don't you forget it...."""""""

So the conversation went on.The conversation about the dangers o that the christian armies faced because of the enemy armies was one heard every everywhere, having been mentioned also in the main Abbieannian Governmental representives before all aurthorities took leave of their respective places to go to the Abbieannian capitol Angelinia Agathia to debate on the dreadful progress of the War storm and the devastations it caused.

Munitions and the closing of all Glandelinian seaports in Galverinia and elsewhere did play a prominent part of the Herculean War but they were not as powerful as some of the Abbieannian leaders imagined.

Jennie Turmer went to the north part of the camp with her two boyscout companions, and the first person to rush up and shake her by the hand was George Radcliffe and General Hindernine, and a dozen or more others followed.

"By Heavens but I thought you were done for, when I saw you fall into the river and float down out of our sight."Exclaimed Radcliffe."You are a sight for sore eyes."and he fairly hugged his friend.Jennie had to tell her story twice once to the officers and the general, and again to the the dinner mess she had joined. The position of the child scout division had been close to a shelter of a belt of timber land.Here the child scouts during their short rest had set up their tents.

"The worse experience we had during our early morning duties during the battle was when we went out with the pickets."said Radcliffe.."That fury of the battle in that neighborhood neighborhood was a corker, and I was detailed at the top of yonder hill to carry the news back in case there was an attack coming that way. It rained shot shell and shrapnell nearly all morning, and the concussion of one shell which exploded very close always threw me away from my post, and two old trees came down within ten yards of me killing the horse I was then riding.That was a close call I tell youand probably as fierce an experience as you yourself had when pursued by the enemy.."

The orders to move came a minute after.Roll

"Roll call at Eleven thirty sharp, comrades, half an hour for dinner, and the column moves to duty as twelve sharp.Heavy scout drill orders.We are not coming back, but the generals orders is not to carry any more than is necessary.."Was the order that came.

Heavy m scouting order for drill, but don't carry more than what is necessary."mused Jennie Turmer."That appears as if we were going to get along to some particular duty as fast as possible.Where are we going George."

"I cannot tell you yet but I heard something said about the army crossing the Abbieann at North Bridge to try and stop the enemy on the left flank. My opinion too is the Glandelinians are going to mass again st us from Abbieann from the sound of battle northundering also in that direction, and probably they'll try to cross the river in that direction, and land at Abbieann Center, and then try to mass an overwhelming assault against General Aronburg."

"General Aronburg can get a powerful division to Abbieann Center in half an hour if they all march hard."said Radcliffe."But can enough of the fighting troops get there in time."

They might stop the enemys advance at the North Bend of the River."said Jennie Turmer"That if if the army sent for that purpose could hurry and steal a march around their right flank."

It can be guessed how near Radcliffes guess had been almost right.One of the first plans of the movements of or against the enemy was to oppose the landing of troops of the foe at Abbieann Center, situated some ten miles abouve above Abbieann, but the enemys attack was so vigorous and caused the christian side such losses that a change had to be necessary, and the Glandelinian forces got across just as they had willed to do.But the assault of the enemy upon the christian position was repulsed with frightful loss of life..

The call for everybody not in action came for dinner in generl general and they had hot coffee, reallly fresh bread, and some fresh meats and beans which were served out andeveryone despite the sultriness of the smoke laden atmosphere felt better.The news had spread that the regiments of general Aronburgs boy and girlscouts were to move, and crowds of inactive soldiers, and even women and children battle refugees came to see them off many bringing with them some danties, in the shape of ducks, chickens hoecakes, jam, and the like...

Promptly at twelve ocloc the bugles sounded, and the head of the reinforcing christian troops moved off first.First came the advanced guard, th then the military pioneers men with heavy axes and blasting powders and explosives to clear the way against the enemy and form barrieriers out of trees,then a strong detatchment of cavarly many miles long in its advance, and then the t regular troops.After the troops, and artillery came the big column of dragoons, and then a smaller detatchment of cavarly detailed to cover the advance.Last of all came the Abyssinilian Winkies Infantry covered by another division of cavarly, and by a battery of small guns.One each side of this ernormous column fronting the enemy on a line of ten miles moved a line of active skirmishers remaining from two to five hundred feet from the road to prevent the enemy from making any possible surprise from the right or the left, although just then no surprise on the part of the enemy was intended as the enemy along this front had all he could to do to watch the movements of the christian line itself.

By quarter after twelve, all the boy and girlscout regiments fell into their proper places, and then ensued a swift march on horse lasting ten minutes.By that time they heard an awful noise. in front of the advance of Hindernines Firstvand Ninth corps, and it began to "rain" but rain shelfire and shrapnell.At first many thought it would be but just a small "shower" and that the christian batteries covering the advance could stop that soon enough, but by the time the advance had started good it was pouring. pouringdeath and destruction in such a devastating way that the advance could not be made and the columns began to withdraw.

"Here's a good pinc picnic"grumbled one of the boyscouts, as he dismounted, to find himself inwater several inches deep made by a splash of water from the near by stream when a high explosive shell hit there."How under the sun a are the troops under general Hindernine co going to advance in this territory."!

"They are not going to do it under the sun by no means George, they will have to do it under the forest fire smoke clouds.Come on pitch in. We'll have to do our flag and other signal work right here.As George Groseman for a spade, and we'll have a mound dug for which we can do some signal work on."

George went off, and Jennie Turmer watched his horse.By the time she had seen that animal and her own cared for, George was back with a number of others and forming a mound of earth about eight feet high.They made it in the form of an angle. Their location wasn't under shell fire and they believed they could do perfect business here.But for another regiment of child scouts, one hour there at their own post was far from being safe, and many a poor girl or boy was wounded slightly or seriously by fragments of shells..Jennie Turmer had them by her advice withdrawn out of danger.Everything too was bustle and great excitement, and by the roar of battle she felt sure that something was up. For Violet,and her sisters in particular appeared to be very grave and watched every proceeding with grave concern... Soon the news came that the Glandelinian troops under general Adam Cain had landed and crossed the stream up above Abbieann ville, and were making a fierce attack upon the christian position t in that locality. By the time Turns Junction was reached the christians there were already defending bravely a long line of high breastworks which practically extended along the whole roadway.The enemy was trying with his greatest efforts to carry that position, and it appeared at this sector as if both sides were as equally determined to win..Jennie Turmer a moment after came to the Boyscout Andy Dandie with a folded paper.

"Dandie here is an order and warning I wish carried to general Hindernine or any one of his representives in the field.Violet vivian gave it to me to give you.The orderlies are all away on other business.You will find general Hindernines division somewhere near Abbieann's Mill Make the fastestof your time"and off Jennie Turmer dashed(hashed) again.

Without losing a moment Andy Dandie placed the folded paper into his sleeve where there was a slit into the linin lining and urged his own horse down the dusty road leading along the rear line of the christian forces.It is progress was soon barred by a sort of breakdown of wagons. on the highway xu xu caused by shell fire and he was compelled to go on a detour through a woods..Hoping sooner to gain the point he was directing himself for, he continued along through the woods untilll he reached a small clearing not far from the Abib Abbieann River and at a point called Sparrows Nest, because of so many sparrws usually usually seen there.. Just below him but a mile away were located a long double row of rifle pits belonging to the christian troops but at this point yet. the unusally extensive battle did not seem to have commenced anywhere t

As he approached the spot, countless numbers of rifles began firing in a dreadful volley, followed by a continued fussilade, and all that noise appeared to come from the direction of theriver,..anithen came the widen sudden boom of many cannon in gra great rolling thunder.

"The glandolinians are assaulting our position across the river"was the cry.

"They are just below pam Number Sixteen(sweet sixteen) They are going to force their way through our lines if they can.We're going to see very hot fighting now."

The remainder of the conversation was cut short by a tremendous fire sounding on the left a little further away.It was evident the Glandolinian troops were coming through, and that the foe was beginning to win along this point also. Any at this time had come to the top of a slight hill that overlooked the stream. Hardly had he accidentally showen showed himself, when three minnie balls hit the tree besides which he was passing, and showered him with pieces of bark. The young boyscout lost no time in seeking better cover..

Having found the christian armies strongly entrenched at or rather before Abbieann, general Arlington determined to force the whole christian position and in the meantime endra endeavor to obtain more troops, so that when the proper time arrived he could make a grand assault all along the line drive the xhristians from their position and perhaps scatter the christian line, and thus open an easy way to march southward..

But the christian soldiers or even their officers did not lie quietly by and allow the Glandolinian armies to beat them off.Fierce and sanguinary counter charges took place nearly every half hour or oftener first at one spot and then another, and presently general Whillham Francis peters, was ordered by general Aronburg to feel the enemy at Turners Junction, which was directly opposite to the Glandolinian reserve force under general Francis Smith, who in later part of the war was to be the tragic hero of the frightful battle of Infanta Marie on the Logan zoe Rue Stream. A Domdobian division made the assault,, covred by a drum drum fire of all sort of artillery, and soon silenced the glandolinian battery, and drove the enemy from the position with frightful loss of lives, and then the officers in command of the victorious victorious division made an extensive examination of the captured territory, which however later onproved of no value, for such a position could not long be retained.It was this conflict that the boyscout Andy witnessed. ut in t y i the i excitement he do did not forget about the order he was carrying for he never delayed anything while onmilitary duty being always deathly afraid that even the most slightest delay may prove fatal to the best laid plan.He delivered it ahead of the time he was expected to get there, and his promptness was later proved to be of great value to the whole christian line.

Jennie Turmer wondered wondered during the battle which raged worse now if gadcliffe had made any success in his investigations during his stay within the enemy lines. She would have been somewhat surprised,had she understood that her boyscout chum was less than a mile away, yet much such was the fact, and it was not to be long ere the two should meet again, and under very trying circumstances to each..Jennie turmer had tried to learn what had become of the spy she had reated he arrested,but but he had nevertheless been sent away to be tried properly by a Court Marshall and to see whether he had been a successful spy or not.

But one other glandolinian spy had went into the christian lines and though he had not been successful in his search for information he had nevertheless escaped.Th is glandolinian spy had taken a desperate chance, considering in one way, although not quite so desperate when considered in another. He had too in his escapade taken his life in his hands by stabbing one guard in the breast with a long hunting knife, and shooting, two, and hitting another with a heavy branch of a tree, and and stoning five others, and he had been fired at fourteen times before he could ga in the shelter of the woods.But when hard pressed by persuers he set the woods afire in that locality and drove off the persuers as the fire becoming big advanced their way.But all this was done with the knowledge that if he did not get away, nd was and was captured he would sooner or later be shot or hanged for a spy.

"Might as well be shot down to death as die later if I have to die." was the way he had argued, and had sped as never before.Once in the woods he had drawn a deep sigh of relief.For the forest was thick and dark and would afford him ample shelter untill an extra black night would cause it to be fairly easy easy to regain the Glandolinian armies. He made up his mind firmly that no guard should ever spot him again.

"And as for that little brat of a boyscout who had collared me and prevented me getting getting the information I was after let him look out for himself that is all." he fairly hissed, between his strong white teeth.Though he was not likely to forget the boyscout he nevertheless made a false boast, for he knew full well to monkey with any one of themwas a dangerous as grabbing a Rattlesnake by the tail with your hand.

The raging fury of the battle now was worse than had ever been expected..

Nearly every other section of the battle line the enemy had gained some slight advantage or other, and the losses in life, and among wounded on both sides was something fearful to contemplate, whi whole immense lines sometimes three deep(de-peop) being cut up as if a comb went through them like a comb does through heads of hair.Jennie was close enough to witness the whole storm of battle along her own sector and she saw thousands of soldiers go down into dying and bleeding and hundreds of artillery horses.She and her active girl and boyscouts were not close enough to be in danger of bullets or shell fire, but still the situation was anything but comfortable. Many hospital tents, tents as numerous as flies on a seashore were overflowing with the numbers of christian soldier wounded.The battle was doing more harm it seemed to the christian army than the biggest plagua of the world ever heard of does to a population of a nation.

"Your turn to watch and see what the enemy does next."announced Violet wivlin at twelve thoity, after she observed how the struggle was ensuing along her own sector and had seen it not in her favor as she had expected. "Watch carefully what the enemy does, and if you can see something worth while I'll try to get one of our generals to fool the desperate enemy somehow.."

"I'll do everything I can."answered the littlett girlscout, and stttet started off followed by some of her fi flagers. She was just about to start guard duty near the edge of a ravine when the sounds of two voices suddenly came to her.She listened intently.

"What's the news along your part of the battle line general yank."?

"Ain't much general Rebber.The enemy seems to either be holding his own or retaining us at a standstill.What's the news your way of the battle line.?"

"General Johnston spiderton they say has rushed forward to an overwhelming assault with the hope of wiping you out.I send or did send general Owens to reinforce you before it is too late."

"A hundred thousand assailants against me eh.?"

"It's a fact.What is general Macdonald doing, going to sleep.Hellie was ordered forward to attack the enemy and didn't come yet."

"He he's preparing to move his artillery up to yonder hill."

Then came a brief silence.Jennie turmer had listened to the conversation, with a smile.Soon it was resumed.

"General rebber.Got any long range artillery to spare."?

"A half hundred."

"When can you send them to cover my advance?"

"When can you need them?"

"Any time you can send them.The enemy is attacking heavily along my battle lines."

"I'll send you the artillery, but I'm afraid it'll do no good."

"It'll do much better than if the infantry didn't have it to cover their advance."

The general called for his orderly.A rustling through the brush and high grass followed, and pwering per peering forth from the tesee trees Jennie saw the orderly being dispatched to have the artillery sent.Too Jennie was particularly fortunate in getting some reliable information as to the movements of the enemy, and through that things soon occured along that sector of the battle line that made many have a more comfortable frame of mind than usual. In the meantime Angeline Richee had recieved a message from a friend of hers a message in which he stated of some things that worried him.He wrote;

"I have had one thing to worry my considerably"wrote Master Penrod, "If you will remember, when h you and Jennie Turmer and Violet,and her sisters went to Abbieann to discover the cause of the disaster there, a party named Daily also had a very suspicious interest in it for our behalf. There has also appeared a man whom no one knows called Samuel Sampson who now claims that the discovery that you and your friends and Violet and her sisters made a fake discovery of the disaster—that somebody sold out to them to have them pretend that they had discoverdded the disaster.Since he now sees the truth will out and that Violet and her sisters did discover the clues, he threatens to make trouble for everyone of us boy and girlscouts through some treacherious means, uless us leaders make it a pretense that the discovery was only a make up..I am now doing my best to locate George Daily to get him to aid us to running down this dreadful scoundrel but so far I nor any one else can get any trace of him.One refugee told me Daily had moved to some safr safer location but could not say where too.The man who threatens came to me once and wanted to pay me three thousand dollars of hush money. If he succeeds to in doing as he threatens he'll ruin the whole n band of child scouts.He's coming to your camps s oon and if you can identify him by means of this picture of him I sent you have him arrested.But tell Jennie turmer about it and show her the letter.She can do a lot for you I know..

"Your friend Penrod."

Jennie Turmer was very sober after reading this communication shown to her by Angeline Richee. She could well understand how worried Prnro Penrod and all his followers would be.She drew a long sigh as she handed the "Poor Penrod."she murmured."I hope he finds George Baily, and gets the matter straightened out without further trouble.Three thousand dollars bribe money is a terrible big sum to refuse tomaccept in these war times but he did right.I suppose they are all worried to death over this. But I'll f watch for that Mr Sampson and capture him the first opportunity.I'll warn Violet,and her sisters about it too." And she did. Then she herself immediately telegraphed a long letter in return, telling of th the various things that had happened to her and of what she planned to do to trap that man.

Also in the meantime discovering the strength of the christian concentration the Glandelinian forces in that sector abandoned the positions at Abbieann Center unable any longer to withstand the christian assault storm and drew back up the roads through Turners woods fighting or contesting every inch of the ground(hound-pound) as they went.

The morning along this stretch of battle had been one of dreadful carnage, and if all the fire cracters of large size ever exploded in a hundred feart of Julys in this spot in one day would have been used here the din of enemy and christian rifles would have beat that. The noise had been immeasureable beyond description. Never before too in any conflict had the enemy held the ground so firmly, and yet too the christians had held their own ground so firmly that it seemed as if the bullets shells and shrapnell couldn't hurt or scare them, and yet if ghosts, banshees and phantoms had added their noisy yell to that of the legions of demons they couldn't compare it to the battle cries and yells of the enemy.The battle even though the enemy retired from the Abbieann Territory turned more violent half an hour later, and Jennie Turner was glad enough when the bugle sounded, that she was not out on pic et duty or flag signal duty, but could with many of her followers be somewhere at a safe distance, but close enough to see the savage battle.The cannon thunders and noise of shells and shrapnell put the loudest thunderstorm on allrecord to shame.

"A big Volcanic eruption isn't so noisy as this battle."was the way in which Fred Perkins expressed himself "But maybe one can be who knows."

"I believe they might put up some volcanoes at least and blow up the whole world with this din."trum l grumbled Jerry Rowe"Seeing as how the enemy has to make so much racket.Besides the way the enemy is resit resisting us it seems as if we are booked to stay here against them all year from now on.""you'd like to compare it to a great lava flow booming as cannons here and there too moving down on us wouldn't you Jerry!"laughed Fredrick Prance."Never mind--we won't stay here long mark my words.Besides general Aronburg is not a retreating man remember that."

"I know it and neither am I"retorted Jeremy Jerry Rowe."

"Maybe not"said Jennie Turner, b"but do you now Jerry what general Aronburg said you were?"

"No?"

"You are one of the most reckless boyscouts ever seen.He believes your a brother to little Dare Devil Jane Melfort, though he says you beat her for reckless ness."

"If everybody was as me the enemy'd be scared that much more of us" was his answer.

However boyscout Prance was right, they were not to stay there much longer.General Concentinian Aronburg had laid his plans for the smashing of general Arlington too well.Every battery was inaction,the line of defense and offense in perfect successful and fierce action all along the battle front, and he felt sure that there would come a rupture or rupture in the enemys lines somewhere.

It was after the withdrawal of the enemy that general Hindernines massive columns were able to press forward and secure possession of the enemys position at Abbieann Center and planted the Angelinian banners upon every dearly bought breastworks and upon every other position. They were under heavy fire but were determined to retain the positions just the same. Despite all this they even did not intend to stay at these positions.The advantage must be pushed, the Glandelinians along this sector must not be allowed to escape so easily.At once all the cavarly and horse artillery, and long wave of infantry covered by the fire of the heavy artillery were to push on against the foe who had retreated to a new position.

"They're whipped,They're whipped."yelled the boyscout Jerry Rowe, as he followed on with the others of the christian soldiers."I felt sure they wouldn't dare to contest us too long."

"Look out there comes a Glandelinian horseman."shouted Jennie Turner."He must be an escaping prisoner or something."

"t was true, and he was heading as if with the intention of riding Jennie Turner down, and Jerry ran like mad to intercept him. With a curx curse loud enough to be heard by everyone he tried to sabre the boyscout, but the lad was a nimble as a cat, had disarmed him with a blow of his rifle butt, and brought him down, wounded from the horse in short order. and had another horse to his name and a prisoner to boot.

Then the boyscout did not appear again untill the regiment of boy and girlscouts got orders to start for captured Abbieann Center on the "Double Time".

As is usual during a battle handicaps will be found if not encountered everywhere------a Glandelinian assault of the most tremendous fury alog a twenty fibe mile simultaneously forone hour raging a terrific massacre conflict, and raining a storm of shell fire and spit shrapnell--- worse than any moving picture battle that could ever be made up, and Jennie Turner thought too that it was the most dangerous battle field that she and other child scouts had ever approached.The christian artillery that had gone on ahead was having a most fearful time with horses up to their bodies in plowed earth, cannon nearly out of night, and under heavy shell fire,and teamisters frantic, yelling praying, whipping and then giving it up in dumb despair unex untill extra horses came up to upp the guns out of range, manny gunners having been hit, dead or wounded and dead horses lay in windrows.It was as if the whole landscape went mad with volcanic eruptions of the wildest and the most violent sort...(snort)

"One consolation though"said one of the boyscouts a stranger to Jennie Turner"The Glandelinians haven't got any batter, position.Our long range artillery are giving them as much as they give us."""

"But the enemy are plowing up the ground with shot and shell for us to wade through."grumbled another boyscout."Hang me if I don't hope we'll see the end of the engagement soon.The darn enemy is winning the battle anyhow."""Q.AZ

The Glandelinians however in the sector teard which the christian troops under general Hindernins were pushing forward had gone on in their slow retreat to where the road from Abbieann Junction joined another running from the Abbieann city itself.Here at the crossroads they had erected a tremendous earyh position flanked on the west and east by high and very long redoubts running to the "Abbieann Floodse on either side of the dry ground.

A large force of reinforcements were gollected bohind this shelterwand had covered the retreat of the other Glandelinian soldiers, and the advance of general Hindernins army recieved a most severe fire, which increased noise, reached plainly to the ears of townfolk thirtymiles many miles away.

"Hurrah the Glandelinians will soon get it warm enough. "cried another boyscout throwing hi his hat up into the air.

It was general Enquists division, with the gallent general Hansonia's Ninth corps in advance, which met those reinforcing Glandelinians first.A terrific charge was at once ordered, but the position of the enemy was so strong, and the assailants met such dreadful resistance that little progress could be, made. General Mitys division had recoiling a little distance, the general having been wounded. long the left the rain of shells and shtop spit shrapnell swept swept all before it, and the concussion of so many cannons and terrific explosions was so fierce that men could scarcely stand upon their feet, as they moved forward.The boy and girlscouts were some distance to the rear of the onward moving lines in light riding order, each girlscout and boy too furnished with all the rounds of ammunition they could carry.Once more Jennie Turners heart beat fast for fear of the battles outcome. he felt that the contest was more bloody and stubborn than on the day before sothe as had such as had b never been experienced during the war yet....2.2.2. she gripped her own rifle tightly. and and led on the othe others, while the christian soldiers were moving forward at the doubit quick... They watched the christian waves of troops forcing their way through a thick path patch of brush high grass and weeds, and observed another section coming upon a large clearing. Directly Directly opposite was a Glandelinian battery backed up by double lines of cavarly, and a great wall of infantry. In the rear of the infantry was another huge troop of Glandelinian cavarly.

"Fellow comrades"came the signal alignalled order;;;2;2;222 "We must capture those Glandelinian batteries.Forward now, and retain your lines into waves and keep your lines closed up,"

Scarcely had the order been given than the enemy batteries in question blazed forth in perfect perfect broadsides, seemingly in their very faces. every man nearest to the batteries dropped, and the aim of the gunners being unusually high, the grape and canister flew far above them clipping the brush off cleaner than it would have been cut by many monstrous scythe.There was a yell from Jerry Rowe, who from his own place of concealment felt sure he had hit a Glandelinian gunner--and then in the face of that blazing fire the christian columns continued on each gun pointed straight ahead, the grape and canister pouring in streams amongst the nearest of the christian columns.It was a strange thrilling sight, as those solid extensive waves of boys in pi poiple came on.Nearer and nearer they swept, and now their battle cry rang out-

REMEMBER ABBIEANN", growing lower and louder, a strong and most determined outcry, from men who meant to do and die and be avenged for the loss of so fair a city..Again and again the batteries blazed forth, and this time the aim was still more true, and half a score of whole lines of men went down many dead, many more dying, and the rest seriously or slightly wounded. For a moment the terrific shock caused a pause. Then Jerry Rowe saw a gunner aiming the field piece toward where many of the nearest girlscouts were crouching. He ran to the cover of a tree, aimed carefully but quickly with his rifle, and the gunner dropped before he could discharge his piece.

"close up boys close up. forward." again came the command, and the lines of the troops closed up the gaps made by the terrible number shot down and again they moved forward on the double quick, while all the boyscouts and the girlscouts too took up secure positions behind the battle line and made great efforts to pick off the gunners and thus slacken their fire upon the christian troops. Jerry trying to go to his troops suddenly found himself su running straight into the point of an extended sword. He raised his rifle butt at seeing it was a glandelinian trying to run him through, and dashed his brains out. Fearful of the unusual violent onslaught which no losses could stop, the glandelinian batteries being under the hidden but galling fire of the child scouts now ceased their shrapnell and grapeshot fire, and allowed the cavarly and infantry to come forward. There was a thunder of hoofs for the extent of miles, and the foremost of the christian troops found themselves face to face with immense bands of cavarly coming in seemingly countless numbers. One Glance showed Jennie Turner that they were not the dreaded "Glandelinian Wheeler" cavarly, but nevertheless they were fierce enough, for by their weight of numbers, dint of courage and the dashing speed of their horses they literally carried all before them, and with the swift retreat of the christian infantry the boy and girlscouts al at the orders of their leaders also had to retreat, but during all the confusion Jennie Turner got into a sort of a jam(be ham whatvam) and before she saw what what was happening she felt a sabre swish over her head, and her heart shaped girlscout hat an was swept off and sliced half in two. Bang, bang went her pistol and the glandelinian soldier who had tried to cut her down with his sabre toppled over, shot through the head and sword arm. Jennie was on his horse in half a minute and galloping away. However the dash of the glandelinian cavarly was a most resolute and successful one, and for several minites it appeared as if all of the christian troops opposing them owould be annihilated so dreadful were their losses. But Nevertheless after retreating to the shelter of high ground covered with brush and trees they stood their ground, another christian division close by pouring in an i annihilating fire upon the figures in the saddle, added by machine gun battery fire and fire of other artillery which brought men and horses down in many thousands in less than a minutes time, and slowly the Glandelinian cavarly were driven back, the christian troops rallying and attac in attacking the horsemen savagely, but as the enemy retreated, they made place for the long line of gray coated infantry who poured in a scathing rifle fire which increased the christian losses tenfold. What made the situation worse was that general Hindernine was disabled and unable to retain command, and there was no reliable officer anywhere to be in his stead. Yet Forward again" shouted the many officers in command at the signals, and despite their losses again the christian troops went on untill they were within fifty feet of the guns they had set out to capture and which tore so many gaps in their lines that it was too many to hardly believe. The firing of millions of rifles was incess in cessant louder than that many cannon crackers, and the bullets whistled and screamed in every direction. The child scouts signalled by the nearest of the Princesses had remained at the safe spot to which they had retreated, but Jennie Turners horse could scarcely stand before the fearful concussion of so many cann one and other noises and great explosions and the horse went vert down once on both knees in the road, while another horse of a retreating christian cavarly ran pitched over him on his own broad back. put neither one was hurt and both were up in a jiffy before the Glandelinians around them could pin them down with their bayonets. The smoke of battle was speedily cutting off the view on all sides as if a forest fire was coming here, and the batteries they had started to capture was no longer in view but the Glandelinian infantry were, and were walled up in smoke and flame. The third charge of the Glandelinian wave of men was the fiercest of all and absolutely successful, and the christian troops were driven before them as chaff before the wind. So sudden did the disaster happen that Jennie Turner herself was almost a taken off her feet by the rush and confusion. She was caught between half a dozen struggling soldiers, some christians some Glandelinians, and tried in vain to get out of the dreadful scrimmage" scrimmage. Then a bayonet flashed before her face, the christian soldier just beside her was pierced through the shoulder, and the mad x crowd opened, and she ran forth to join her girl and boyscout comrades.

"Look out. Drop little girl." somebody shouted. Jennie tried to obey, but before she could do so, a thundering roar sounded just ahead, something rushed swiftly directly past her face, and she felt her breath suddenly leave her her body. She tried to recover her wind, but it seemed impossible, and off she dashed wildly, as if she was strangling, untill falling over a mass of stones she went headlong banging her knee on a sharp stone.

All of the glandelinian troops upon being forced to withdraw from Abbieann center did not recoil tward the direction in which it had been hoped for by the christian generals. Many of them retreated tward Piccocolo river and following this and a creek by the same name fortified or reached fortified positions and made ready to repell any assault on the part of the christians that might come. The battle of Abbieann to have have raged very violently on the second day was a rather mixed up although most stubbornly fought contest. Through an unusally big confusion of orders and directions nearly every general was forced to fight as he thought best. At the Main road called Abbieann Road general Francis Vivianannas divisions aided by other troops, and a strong battery soon silenced the many glandelinian battel batteries of the enemys fortifications called Fort Clintonia and the impetious general Richesconia coming to his aid when the glandelinian generals hurled against him an overwhelming counter charge and when he was almost exhausted made a glorious dash, and after most severe fighting in which the loss was dreadful on both sides secured the rifle pits and trenches, thus causing the enemy to retreat. While this was going on it was reported that another spot along the extensive line of glandelinian defenses seemed to be not very strong (go to hong (nog.)

The territory was one called Dam Number Nine, and general Blain Nightlinger with his own and additional troops and covered by heavy artillery fire was sent forward to crosss the stream and secure the strongholds ct on the other side. with general Blain Nightlinger, was general Lieutenant general Francis Nemo the same who later in the war became the great dane danger of the enemy in the wars progress on northern Angelin Angelinia soil. There were no bridges over this narrow stream, and soldiers had to wade across waist deep in the water, but the enemy position here was far stronger than expected, and the position though secured couldn't be retained under such a galling fire, that in half an hours time mowed down ten times more men than fought in the whole merican civil war, and cut last the enemy was able to recover their position and drive the christians to their own, and in counter charging a lmost even captured the that. soon afterwards however recieving more men and and covered by a heavier artillery fire, these two generals advanced again and war was warmly recieved by additional Glandelinian troops under Belboa and general Henry Lace. The fury of the conflict was quadrupled and general Lace and many other Glandelinian officers were wounded, general Blainnightlinger on the christian side too was wounded, and many more soldiers than ever were killed or wounded upon both sides. At first ti appeared as if the Glandelinians would be again victorious, but at last they were forced to withdraw to a more secure position. Here they defended the position as if they knew not death, and the advance of the christians was finally stayed but not driven back. Out of all this Jennie Turner know nothing. As she rushed away from the terrible scene of carnage her mind seemed to be a total blank. The worse of it all was she could not recover her breath,, she gasped in vain for air, and strangled, everythirgwas black before her eyes, (pies) and she felt as the end of the world had come so far as she herself was concerned..... She felt herself go down into the dry dust of the road, and there she lay not unconscious, but unable to move, unable to breathe, unable to think, with a roaring in her ears, a strange flash of bluish light before her eyes, and a severe pain in her lungs which no pen could ever describe. What in the world had happened to her! The answer of course is very simple. A shrapnell shell not yet exploding had rushed close close past her mouth just at the second time when her lungs were heaving out air. The vacuum thus caused had drawn forth more air than was safe or healthful------in other words had collasped her breathing apparatus and left her almost powerfull and in peril of dangerous suffocation. If any one of the readerz wants to exp experience somethi ng of the sensation experienced by Jennie Turner let him or her blow all the breath out of her of his lungs as far as they can and then stand without air for half a minute, a full minute, or longer---if it can be done. Of course now she began slowly to regain her breath but there was a pain as that of fire in her chest every time she drew her breath carefully, and her head ached as it had never ached before and she was terribly dizzy. Slowly and painfully she came to a realization of her condition. With a groan she could not supress she sat up, and tried to grasp in the scene about her. The effort was a failure. On all sides seemed to be darkness, while a roar and other varied sounds as if from the infernal regions was in the air. An explosion of which she was not then conscious of occured in the stream near by hurled up an enormous mass of water and mud and it fell all over the land about her as if it was a torrent of rain, the water in coming down splashed upon her head forming a good sized muddy pool at her feet.She was also pelted by great splotchy splotches of mud, river gravel, small twigs, fishes, toads and even weeds but so was her condition that she did not pay any ate attention to this. She even in her half dazed condition scooped up some of the water in he hollow of her hand, and drank it..

"I wonder what's the matter with me"she though, as she felt herself all over, and to see too if she still had her teeth"I don't seem to be shot, and yet what a queer sensation that was when the cannon went off. I believe it took away my wind, and that's all, but oh how I did feel.I wonder if a person feels that way in an air tight safe."

It was some time before she felt strong enough to sit up, and even then she was decidedly in a trembling shape, and felt sick and giddy all over and strange lights still seemed to glare all around her, and she almost wone wondered if she was dead, and was in a new world.. Slowly and painfully she limped to the shelter of a clump of trees, to escape bullets which she heard singing everywhere above her. A groan t startled her.It was followed by a nother,and then another..She went around to the other side of the trees, and saw five soldiers lying there, two blue gray coated christian Calverinian soldiers and one Abbieannian soldier, and the others from their uniforms she believed to be Domdobians.All were badly wounded, and were huddling together in their misery. The sight too made Jennie Turner more desperate and downhearted than ever, especially as w she was not able to do much for them.One of the Calverinians begged to be propped up against a tree, and Jennie succeeded in causing him to be as comfortable as it was possible though it was all she could do to lift up properly. The other simply glared wildly tward the direction of the battle lines.

"I dare the Glandelinians to touch me."he growled growled."The Glandelinians are responsible for this, and the Old Nick himself will burn them all". and he turned his begrimmed and dusty face away, that Jennie might not see all that he was suffering.

"If you would please bind up my head."sighed the Abbieannian, who had been fighting under Hindernine for hours."A Glandelinian soldier clubbed me badly with his rifle stock." Jennie bound his head up as best she could with two of her bandage roole she always carried with her, and the soldier said it was a great relief.

"If I can find any help,I'll try to get you to the hospital"said Jennie as she slowly moved away."I'm suffering from a certain mysterious injury myself, but I'm not half so bad off as you soldiers are."

She had scarcely finished, when there came a gleam of bayonets, and sixteen rough and uncouth appearing men in purple uniform burst into view from the brush somewhat in the rear of the trees.At first Jennie wondered who they were, but she was not long in doubt as to the identy indentification of two of the number.

"Ha little girlscout of the landelinian army so we meet again and caught you spying round here in purple uniform eh!"came a hoarse chuckle, and in another moment the soldier George Fox was beside the girlscout."I was just wishing I would run across you indeed I was."nd rushing up he caught Jennie strongly by the arm.

"Who is the girlscout?"asked another in the crowd.

"It is the same one who got away from us just ten minutes ago and whom we fired at three times."came from another, and Jennie now recognized another but whom she could not place her his name."Don't let her got away now Calebib.We have too much trouble to settle.We were after her for a long time, and now she's caught.She stole the plans belonging to general plain night linger and got away this morning.We were searching all this time.and caught with a purple uniform on."

"She ain't getting away don't you fear."growled Calebib Fox."If she was a Glandelinian soldier I would for two pins run him through with my bayonet."

"I'm not a spy, I'm Jennie Turner"cried Jennie.

"Oh yes!"cried Calebib."Well then I'm Emperor Vivian, and these with me are the generals under his command, excepting that one(pointing) and that Jennie vivian the Princess.Well Miss Jennie Turner come along and explain to the original Jennie Turner why you're trying to be her double.Come thing else against you .spying, and saying You're Jennie Turner."

She of course was so disfigured with mud and so forth that she was not recognizable.. he had not suspected what the mission of the men were and had wondered what brought them here.The whole crowd, had recently cut captured a whole band of Glandelinian battlefield vandals, but had been searching for the real Glandelinian girlscout, and mistook her for the one.Seeing the wounded, they proceeded to bring them along.

"And now you march along and be quick, no your identifaction papers and pass won't do ye no good.Stolevthem too most likely."growled Calebib George Fox to Jennie, and another man caught the little girl by the opposite arm, and gave her a violent shove.The men were heavily armed, and in an ugly temper over general Blain Night Lingers loss of his plans, and not believing it wize to argue with them then, Jennie did as directed though in fact had they been Glandelinians she could have found a way to escape from them even then.

The sextet of christian soldiers who was under the leadership of a top sergeant, had evidently been out on their searching expedition for some time, for it was a fact that eneral general Blain Night Lingers headquarters had been raided by a Glandelinian girls cout almost the exact resemblance of Jennie Turner but somewhat stouter and taller, and therefore no matter what Jennie showed or said, they would not believe believe a word, for they said"All Glandelinians wether men women or children are born to be liars."Old Hooked nose Arlington will find out sometime if he continues to send more girlscout spies of his over here"remarked one of the men sourly as they pushed ahead, tward the main christian lines.

"What's the girlscout spy got with her!"demanded another of the crowd, and all halted, while Jennie's pockets were searched and emptied.As a protest protest would have been only foilded by nagging,Jennie said nothing to this nowing they would not find anything of evidence against her anyhow.

They found nothing on her but her own private property, and the pass signed by the Vivian Girls , a pass which it was impossible for any one to steal from them and this convinced the men they made a real mistake.

"Well it's safer for the child to come along with us now to camp where'll she will be out of danger"said the Sergeant."but now that real spy brat has escaped for sure.Drat the luck,why couldn't we see in the first place that we had arrested the wrong one."!

"Well the blunder was caused because she was the only girlscout out here" said the copr corporal."We can't help mistakes you know, and we,ll have to make the best of our hard luck.The spy had escapedand that is all there is to it."

A quarter of an hour hours journey brought all to a hollow of some sort beside a small stream.Here close to a shelving shore, was situated a picket tent, sheltered in front by an overshot of rough boards and limbs of trees.Before the dugout a small but bright campfire was burning, and to two elderly men were cooking coffee, and a pot of beans and bacon, while others stood on guard.

"What in thunder, did you already capture the little spy.!"Quested one of the pickets.

"Better not leave the spy stay here, she'll escape, you understand that well enough don't yo.!"demanded one of the older men at the campfire.

"She's a special."Grinned Calebib Fox."We made her a prisoner by mistake. We captured Jennie Turner believing she was the girl spy we was after. Nevertheless I and other have got an account to settle with those Glandelinians and we believe we have a right to treat them as they trat treat the vivian girls when they capture them.Ain't no use to alarm yourself we have a little girl a friend in our midst and not a Glandelinian.Her Pass and Identification papers proved that beyond a doubt.Rush yourself little girl so we can identify your face."

The young girlscout as she obeyed could not she help shuddering shudder irgat the news of the spies raid and escape and for which she had been arrested for my blunder. When she was cleaned she stood before the soldiers.It was likely that Sergeant Samuel Hanson facts guessed what she really was for now he did recognize her as his own friend.

"I'll settle withthese Glandelinian spies if I ever capture them."remarked cop corporal Fox, and others nodded approvingly.Jennie now was made their guest instead of a prisoner.

From the position she occupied occupied Jennie because of the smoke haze could see little of what was going on elsewhere but the roar of the distant battle was louder than usual, the sound was dreadfully wild, and not even the wildest uproar of the loudest firecrackers could beat the din of so many hundreds and hundreds of thousands of rifles along a battle front of two miles..The most frequent words which indistinctly reached her ears were ones requesting that the coffee be passed this way or that, that she herself should recieve her share of the beans and bacon.As her hosts ate and drank, the little girlscout listened bravelry at the awful battle sounds but as when simularily situated she was unble unable to find out what was reallly resulting.At last she gave everything up to what ever might come, silently praying to God that the battle might not turn out to be an enemy victory considering that general Aronburg was fighting an army six times his own size... AA quarter of an hour passed,and the sixteen Angelinian soldiers,, still hung under the strange overshot roofing of the dugout, when a sudden roar of scattering rifle shots, but many thousands of them at once rang out deafeningly a short distance up the river followed by an answering fire that came like the rolling crash of a million explosions. A long wave of Glandelinian soldiers the Robbonites had come forward in this direction with the purpose to assault the christian rear. Soon half a division of retreating men in purple came running along close to the waters edge, and stopping several times to fire at the advancing enemy with withering effect.

"The Glandelinian devils are coming."two of their officers shouted, and then one of them fell pierced through the head.

"better get away from here, while the getting's good, if you men and the litt le girlscout want to save your hides."cried another.

Instantly there was a commotion, as the sixteen men leaped up and reached for their guns. The firing now was something awful and the scene became hidden in a gray curtain of smoke but the Glandelinians now yelling like demons and giving vent to their blasphemous devil yell came on as fast as men could leap, jump and run over obstructions.

"Down with the Christian Hellhounds we,ll remember Abbieann to their own sorrow" was their cry as they rushed on.

"et along and don't delay little girl for heavens sake."cried one of the men. They had her by the arm to pull her forward for she was so dazed by the sudden appearance of the enemy that she did not realize her grave danger..As they started off with her, the nearest of the enemy must have seen them for they opened fire.Ten of the soldiers with Jennie were hit, six fatally including the top sergeant and the corporal,the corporal recieving an ugly wound in the left arm.

"I'm shot too confound those gray coated devils."he groaned, as the arm dropped limply to his side.

"Come along little girl quic "cried samuel Jacks."If we remain here we'll all be killed or captured."come on.".just as Jennie for an instant hesitated in bewilderment a shell explosion from its concussion hurled her into the dugout, against the wall, and another x exploding closer by sent the fire brands flying into the hut setting fire hay within the corner of the structure. One of the survivors of the men dashed for the entrance of the hut just as more of the thousands of clattering shots rang out and he pitched headfirst into the hut dead.

"To perdition with you fiend , burn there you human devil burn."another man yelled as he lay near the door and opened fire with his rifle just as the roar of firing increased.Then he too was hit. The explosion of the two shells hurling fire into the hut nearly too away Jennie's breath.The burning brands from the force of the explosion near the camp fire flow in all directions one large bit of flaming bu brush landing directly at her feet.The hay in the corner blazed up as if it was a furnace. She watched this anxiously and saw it blaze with increasing vigor at the open doorway cutting off her escape throwing up a cloud of smoke and flame almost almost into her face as she strove to get out in vain.

At the same time the firing had increased to tenfold fury and she heard the ping ping of many bullets as they lnded on the woodwork of the dug out. She certainly was in a perilous situation.

"We've stirred up the hhhhhhit christian dogs boys, come on."

"It was one of the Glandelinian captians in the front line who uttered the cry.He had under fire forded the little stream, and a few regiments of his followers came awaafter him but so severe was the christian fire that the regiments were speedily wiped out.Glandelinians elsewhere were dropping before the christian fire, as fast as you'd look at the numbers of men and still they were not checked. Nearly as it seemed a million rifle shots were sounding out in perfect volleys and fusnilades up and down the water course for a distance of several or more miles, and so severe indeed was the christian fire that the Glandelinian soldiery pused their way across with the greatest care. A minute after on the opposite side another strong wave of christian troops appeared, and opened a blaze of fire that made a dreadful noise.They were from the Turner Anna Volunteers, and were headed by general Nathanel Hornsby.In some manner the Turner Anna Volunteers had become detatched from the remainder of their command and were moving forward with a strong Dominbian division also detatched. Hornsby had noticed through his field glass the advance of the Glandelinians and had with the aid of his lower generals led forth as many men as could be mustered for the defense of this locality, aided by generals Harry Bingham and Collings.He had asked general Jerry JohnHowe to come but he had been held at bay by another division of Glandelinians before he could advance very far.

"Here's a camp held by our troops down below."cried the general, as they came in sight of the place where six or seven men were trying desperately to get into the hut. If "If something had not set fire to their dugout."he added.

"We'll get down b there with some of the # men before the Glandelinians forces them back."put in CollingsIf we can drive--------live or listen."

"They're crying to us for help."put in one of the soldiers."Somebody is in danger in the dugout and they can't get in."

"Some poor wounded soldier maybe is inside and they're trying to rescue him but the enemys fire pickts them off.,said the general."They can't dare expose themselves."Let us rescue them.It's awful to let anybody burn up even if it is the enemy.."

"I' m with you"said one of the colonels."but be careful general,the enemy may put something over on us."

The men swarmed down there in great numbers and opened fire so dreadfully that the enemy along this sector suffered such awful losses that the survivors were even glad to have the chance to retreat while to the retreating was good, and cautiously but carefully while retaining their withering fire the christian soldiers advanced.. In the meantime the firing far down the stream and elsewhere distant and near became heavier and much louder, showing that great christian columns were massing heavily at this pointe and that the enemy was slowly giving giving way.Soon general Harry Bingham though he recieved a shot in the arm and thirty men fell near him gained the dugout, and with rifle butts the men beat ow down a part of the shed shed not afire and burst in, the general Hornsby following.

"Why Jennie Turner, is it possible."

"General Hornsby.Oh how thankful to God I am that you and your followers have come.I am almost suffocated."and the last word fairly chocked in jennie's throat.Her eyes were bulging from their sockets, and she could not have held out much longer.The general himself did as directed, and brought her out into the fresh air, where the wind then blowing soon revived her.

"So you and a few christian soldiers escorting you got cornered by the enemy here."said one of the men..

"Do you know who these Glandelinians are under general. ?

"No."

These Glandelinians are under generals Jum Jacks, Caleb Fox, and their followers."

"Really."

"Yes,and that is not all.The whole crowd are nothing but most desperate fighters,"and in a few words Jennie related how she had witnessed the beginning of the fight after the men had first mistaken her for an enemy irlscout they were after.."I'm mighty Glad the christian troops came up in strong enough numbers tobe,pose them successfully"she concluded.

"Those Glandelinian generals are dangerous."answered one of the officers gravely. "Why general Johnson, Hiller and Thomas of our side have been wounded.This is sure a tough battle, and seems to be raging everywhere.."

There was no time to say more for the christians nearest them were retreating, and some of the christian cavarly men were returning, shouting that the Glandelinian forces were too much for them.Jennie was carried by the general back to the camp of the child scouts of general Aronburge and the few slight burns she had taken care of..during this incident a discovery awaited the highest christian generals under Aronburg.

During the full fury of their covering artillery fire that dominated dominated the territory all about them, and the noise and smoke of the now most frightful battle,the greater part of the Glandelinian forces had been attacked so vigoriously by reinforced divil divisions led by general Memo that they were forced to withdrawfrom their main positions to the right of the still remaining floods. floods, thus continuing their retreat toward Abbieann but contesting every step of the way as if they delighted in getting killed, and in most desperate fighting. Put for all this the way was not clear for the christian forces, even though the onward advance was resumed not directly for Abbieann, but tward Great Number One During that time a branch of the christian army sent the enemy flying from Morbib road not half a mile distance though it cost most bloody fighting and unestinable losses on both sides to win this position point.. The advance of the christian lines on account of the enemys fierce resistance, and the miserable heat of the weather, and the wretched condition of the roads and fields caused purposly purposely by the enemy was a delayed one, and full of peril.On the way to reach a more better location to do their work, the boy and girlscout regiments sought to take a side road not too close to the battlefield just then, hoping too to find a better position to watch for chances to warn the generals of the enemys doing here and there.They were barely on this road, when a strong body of Glandelinian cavarly the Zimmermanians somewhat three times the number of child scouts, and added by infantry soldiers, dashed down upon them suddenly and unexpectedly, sending all for a moment in confusion. Then ensued a dreadful fight between the older child scouts and the enemy and the boyscout Andy Johnson took part in this conflict, but all nevertheless though overwhelmed handeomely repulsed these regiments of enemy soldiers who in their fierce struggle strove to outflank them..The Glandelinian captian of one of the regiments was captured by susan parrol and jerry Howe, and when he then tried to escape susan shot him down.

Then to get even to show what they were made off the boy and girlscouts recing their chan ce renewed the struggle by attacking the Glandolinians who survived the first squabble and drove them pellmell upon their own baggage train, upon which had just passed Mew town, throwing the train into great confusion.

"Forward boys and girls"shouted Angeline Richee her sabre gleaming in the air, and away when the child scouts.The teamsters nearest them yelled in alarm and the cavarly trying to rally opened a withering fire, but not a child scout was hit, and every one forhook every wagon of the train the cavarly retreating as if the very evil spirits were after them. verb.
Everybody ran for their very lives.

"Hurrah we,ll pay the enemy back for their attack upon us..ere are sixteen wagons.shouted the boyscout Andy then as Angelinian Richee dashed by he continued."Miss Richee can I drive one of the wagons, before the Glandolinians can recapture it."

"Yes"was the short answer"But don't lose your own horses."

"We won't miss Richee."Come on Francis, here's a lark," and hopping from his own horse Andy leaped upon the seat of the nearest turnout and whipped up the team.Francis caught hold of the boys horse, and rode alongside glancing to the rear occasionally in order to cover up the rear.Up along a side road Andy lashed the animals gently over stumps and stones, and through dust more than foot deep.Once he glanced in the wagon and saw that it was well filled with some articles carefully covered with oiled canvass.

"Something worth having in there I'll wagon a good fortune"he said to himself."I hope it is good food.Won't our whole regiment have a feast if it is.This is the repay the enemy got for coming at us that way."

The thought was so pleasant it made him smile and he urged forward the horses again while he shouted out on the side of the covering:-- "Any Glandolinians coming Francis?"

"Some infantry overto the right."answered his friend."I am not able to see because of the battle haze so I cannot say who and what they are."

"We won't run any chances.Phew, won't those Glandolinians be mad when they find we have deepened their cavarly and run off with sixteen of their wagons."

"I see a big box sticking out labeled canned peaches."went on Francis.
"And there is another labeled catsup.We sure hit it rurich and no fooling Andy."

"We'll divide with the boys and girls to night Francis—it will help them remember this capture so much longer.put in Andy, and a true vision of a heaped up plate of canned peaches loomed up most appetizingly before his mind.on and on they went until a downgrade was gained. A quarter of an hour later they were at the spot they selected to do their scouting and hurl warning duties.Here too they decided to eat their dinner for four.

"Canned peaches and catsup and lots of other good things in this wagon girls and boys,"Andy sangout, as they halted here, and he promised to share and share to all alike.Now a motly collecte collection of boys and girls gathered around the wagon.The others were found to have munitions and wagon hard ware tents and pistols and rifles and other side arms.

"Now for some of them canned peaches and some catsup."cried somebody, and the oiled canvass was hauled aside and the boxes were lifted carefully to the ground.The covers were partly loose and were speedily wrenched off.

"Great Gumbolls."cried one.

"It ain't only canned peaches, but look at the fowl, ham, and what not.potatoes, and everything fit for a king they all cried.

What a howl went up at the sight.They sure had more than the whole regiment could disposed of at a months meal. in that one wagon.
The passing of the shell, and the peril endured in the dugout had had wi weakened Jennie somewhat, and she had not accompanied the regiment on this raid but plenty was to be saved for her nevertheless.

"I! I'm glad the christians are advancing at last"she said to one of the soldiers who was dressing his wounded leg."Another such experience would do me up."

"I never saw such or so much fighting in my life during a battle before, Miss Turner, but see I believe they are going to soon secure a good strong positi position of the enemy, well up the side of yonder slope.That will mean a whole lot to make up for our losses in this beastly battle."

It nearly took the christian army nearly two days to capture this portion of the Glandolinian position, and now this vast body of victorious christian soldiers occupied a territory about four miles in length which the enemy was making a most fierce effort to recapture.It was was amost imposing sight There were miles after miles of christian batteries in thundering action, with here and there occassionally many big crashing explosions that made eruptions.There were also line after line of smaller cannon in action on other elevations, and ammunition carriages a vast collection of wagons, and thousands upon thousands of horses, while the purple coated soldiers filled every trench or breastwort ever and anon shrouded in the smoke of rifle fire..

mock(put in the black) loomed up a long line of christian troops of the army by navy and many hundreds of big transports and everything was alive and bustling, and "chock full of battle activity and indeed it was a scene worthy of the greatest artist or painter in painter in the world. If this great and active christian center could not conquer it was because they not not Glandolinian enemies, but n brothers on the opposite side worthy of their steel.

Nearly a whole hour had been spent by the christian troops in this dearly won Glandolinian position,and that hour despite,,, the fact that the enemy had made to two most desperate attempts to recover it, was a noisy lively,and bloody one for both sides, although nowall of the christian d soldierz got their proper numbers into position and the enemy found the resistance more severe and desperate than any one can describe..

Near to where the Glandolinian position now in the hands of the nationals were situated, flowed a small stream, and in this under cover the assaulting Glandolinian soldiers, waded forward and tried to snip off the christian soldiers with a continuous withering fire at close range but to no avail.They were picked off themselves like flies by a fly swatter.

It was rather an awful and frightful sight to see hundreds of men drop every second into the water or by the waters edge, or pitch headlong upon flat stones shot through the heart, or head Despite the danger of so desperate a move upon the christians even the Glandolinian soldiers had to laugh at the situation, and as fierce as the firing was many were the jokes passed about getting a job in the Deville Laundry when they were killed.

Some of the Glandolinians were too feard fearsome to attempt a charge of this sort(enofit) upon the christian line, but the majority would go a long way to try and recapture with that coveted position.Of course machine gun fire covered these demonstrations, and one Glandolinian soldier Louis Wringly, sat behind a high stone for hours that day, trying to shoot down as many christian soldiers who had the fool chance to expose themselves.

Studying plans during this battle was an unusual cent with every general and the general who did not decide on the best thing on time was the object of real true sympathy. After the communications were delivered to different officials to be carried out, they usually brought good results and therefore general Arlington of the enemy was astonished that even with his vastly superior army he wasn't able to accomplish very much.General Aronburg had been shown the letter written by Penrod who had told of the call he had recieved from the mysterious man h who had threatened him with a military cult unless he abandoned the idea of what had been accomplished by Violet,and her sisters in solving the mystery of Abbieann.Jennie Turner had learned that the man who had hoped to find to be able to put off this interfering boob had left the neighborhood of the city of Calverine and went to Angelinia Agathia city,(Angelinia state) to live.Were it not for the violence of the war, and the distance of the city Jennie would would have communicated with Mr Daily at once and see if she could not get him to settle with the meddlesome spy.put as matters now stood, her hands, and even the hands of Violet, and her sisters seemed to be tied...
Indeed many of the child scouts ardently wished the dreadful w dreadful war was over, and even hoped at the earliest opportunity to get this matter straightened out.For it worried everyone greatly.

"This is certainly too bad"the general had murmured."If Daily went to Angelinia Agathia we won't be able to get at him no matter hochurd we try, and probably secret enemy agents won't do their best to prevent anyone doing so.I wish I could help Penrod and his followers out if this trouble.If that spy would only come here and try to get into our lines we'd have him bottled up."""QA.QQ

Thus far during the battle of Abbieann the boy and girlscouts of General goncentinian Aronburgs army had lost six members and only by wounds.Besides this nine were in the hospital suffering from the effects effects of the terrible untimely heat produced by the distant forest fires,four had been wounded through their own hand through accident, and five down with some sort of swamp fever but not dangerous, and other illness.
For the ill ones the boys and girls not on dutyand soldiers too did all they possibly could, securing for them delicacies, and the like. and sitting by them and reading the news of the progress of the battle in a low one tone so as not to disturbe the many wounded soldiers..

All this while many other sections of the army now was in motion with every ones face tward Abbieann.The great crisis of the second day of the unusual battle was at hand.

"We're off(boff) for Abbieann now(get your cow)"cried one of the boyscouts Harry Hoole, enthusiastically, as all the boy and girlscouts now stooood at "fatade rest" while waiting for their turn to fall in with the advancing column of Burrough Rangers..."If everything now goes right, and the enemy continues to fall back I'll wager we'll be walking the streets of that the great disaster had left of the beautiful city inside of another week..."""
"I trust you say the truth,, Harry dear"answered Jennie Turner,,,."The quest ion is will ever everything go right.The enemys defense and offense is more spyare than before, and they say the christian positions are heavily manned lifted everywhere else , their losses are becoming terribly severe, and and all the roads are far from safe because of the heavy shell fire 306 sweeping them."

"I so can't see the roads we can see our armies drive the Student hatted Glandelinians from them, or we'll go on over other roads."rent on Harry Poole in an offhanded way, as though to see christian troops drive the stubborn enemy off the roads were of small importance."The only trouble ahead that I can see is, that this confounded Landelinian shell fire may increase and sweep much of the christian army into eternity.Creation but never saw such a shell fire, nor heard so many cannons thundering in my life, and I've been at Cedarmine ,Evangeline St Claire and other big fights.,by ever since the battle of Abbieann started, the progres progress of the christian advance has been dreadfully slow...."

Harry was right about the shell fire. Pr Perhaps many of the readers may grow somewhat tired of these oft-repeated statements of so much shell fire but they are neccessarry in order why to explain why it was the armies moved so slowly against the enemy, and why advantage after advantage here and thee was there was more gained by the enemy than by the other side.

Many of the christian officers who had been in this peculiar battle at Abbieann have declared over and over again that they never saw or heard of a desperate battle in which so much cannon and shell fire played such a large nd and important part, and even many battle reports usually supposed to be the briefest of communications, were written of this. In many places before the battle had started corduroy roads had had to be constructed or the cannon would have disappeared disappeared in thevquagmire formed by water hurled over heavy dusty roads by explosions in the river(appearing at times as if they were volcanic eruptions under water,) and many a faithful horse was maimed slain or disabled by the terrific explosions.,hen a division of soldiers moved,and had to do so under this awful shell fire, every man choose his own path and the way that seemed to be safest hopping from one safe part to the next but at times their losses from shell fire amount to full regiments even during this advance... Thus under such shell fire it took reinforcing divisions of troops more time and endurance to cover one mile here than it other wise would have taken to cover twenty.....2.2.2.P uring the whole battle so far bridges of pontoon sort had been building by the christians across the Abbieann with long approaches of logs.The boy and girlscouts when not on duty of military sort had did what they themselves could do to lend a hand in a part of this work which though progressed slow for the workers were constantly under severe fire. Jerry Powe the boyscout was disgusted as he watched proceedings .

"I didn't enlist as a boyscout to see these things going on."grumbled Jerry Rowe, as he joined the crowd of boys and girls at the river."The enemy doesn't seem to know when he is licked, and I'll not stand any more of his behavoir than I have to."

"hy not make the best of it Jerry."said Jennie Turner who was close to him."And too the quicker all this workid is done, the more rapid will be our advance and especially the advance of the army, and I'm sure we all want to see the battle come to an end as quick as possible and have a successful ending too."

The labor had been going on for several hours under fire too but no one being hit, as the laborers were covered by fire of their own gunners, and Jennie Turner was wondering if it was was not aboutbtime for the main christian line to advance, when a loud childish shriek from some part down the river came to the ears of all. At first it was thought some boy or girlscout had been shot, or hit by a shell frag ment, or set upon in ambush, but this was not so.A little child refugee had been watching what was going on, but had been too closevto the edge of some small bluff overhanging the river, and this had given way precipating her into the water, and the swollen and as swiftly flowing current of the still flooded riveras river was carrying her rapidly out of sight and hearing of her companions who had been watching the soldiers and the child scouts with her.

"Help,help."she screamed.I can't swim.Help"

"it's some little girl refugee."burst from Susan Farrols lips."What shall we do,no one can swim that dreadful current. "

"aren't there a long rope somewhere handy?"asked Jerry Rowe, and then as he saw the little girl sink,he added"get one somewhere quick, and follow me."

With the swiftness and agility of a cat he fled from the half constructed bridge and darted along the overflowed bank of theriver..Once he tripped tripped oversomething and fell down but he easily arose to his feet again, and continued on his run, which however was with the current... .. "here are you going Jerry."somebody demanded, but he did not take time to give anybanswer.

A little more than fifty feet farther on a gnarled pine tree stood ,its twisted branches spreading in every direction and as high as it seemed equal to a ten story house.. One long branch stretched acrosax the river its outer end at least fifty feet from the shore.....

Jerry sprang up into this tree, and crawled along the branch,stilll the middle of the stream was gained. Then he carefully swung himself downward, under the leaves.... The soldiers,and boy and girlscout scouts standing near observed his plan, and cheered him even though jerry did not pay the slightest attention. For his dee face was now scanning the swollen stream at a point where he had seen the little girls face bobing up and down.that face was comig, nearer, and nearer..It came then two within twenty feet of the tree, and then when it almost disappeared,Jerry had let go his hold on the big pine branch, and went into the water with a splash and vanished himself.Then he was seen swimming lustily forward...

"Come tward me little girl, I'll save you.,were his words, but if the little girl heard when she reappeared shecas too scared to reply..

Then Glandelinian soldiers on the opposite shore to try and prevent the rescue started firing onJerry, but the boy and girlscouts answered the fire with such telling effect that the enemy retreated.

"Help save me."Those were the only words the frightened little girl could utter,when she was ready to disappear again.Then Jerry clutched her by the arm.

"All right little girl you're safe."

Before Jerry could say another word, the little girl felt the boys grasp ,and swinging around clutched him with the strength found only in those who are drowning.,but she didn't clutch too hard, she only endeavored to hold herself above the current.Then from another spot Glandelinian soldiers again appeared and opened fire on both, and jJerry had to duck himself and the little girl to avoidbeing hit.

"Get those Glandelinians on the opposite shore"he had managed to gasp. At that dangerous moment Susan Farrol arived with a long rope, which she had recieved from one of the soldiers.,he knotted one end into a thtttw noose and threw it out to the struggling pair.It was a very long rope, but some Glandelinian sniper had aimed at it, as Jerry made a clutch for it, and the bullet cut it in two.The line still long was thrown a second time whole a long row of boys andgirls hidden behind trees and other objects of protection now continued such a rattling storm of fire aided by soldiers,even with machine guns that the enemy didn't dare show themselves, and Jerry caught the rope as it was thrown a second time, just as it as it was floating out of his reach.Then Susan and a dozen others pulled on the rope with might and main.Jerry felt the bottom of the river with a sigh of relief.

Two of the boyscouts then helped the little girl to get ashore, and it would take too long to describe how she showed her gratefulness here. "By gosh"muttered the boy scout Jarry, as the excitement was over."If there are meaner fellows in this world than Glandelinian soldiers I th have still to find them. "

"They' sure didn't worry about wasting ammuntion to try to prevent the little girls rescue, did they?"put in Fred Dance, who was in the crowd.

"The chances are that I couldn't have saved the little girl if all of you hadn't fought off the snipers."answered Jerry"when he had recovered his breath."And I'll bet that little girl will tell everything, if she remembers or knew it happened."

Despite her peril she did remember all, and unknown to Jerry or others one of her arms the left had been scratched twice by bullets, and she while having her arm attended told all, and all who who heard her were disgusted, and decided to give the enemy their own medicine.

During the battle the building of the pontoon bridges had occupied nearly two days.Serious fighting was raging elsewhere, and all the soldiers not yet engaged were under the strictest discipline.,he rival armies were indeed probably engaging in the first of the greatest and bloodiest battles of the war extending in battle lines for many miles in extent.

To go into the details of the remainder of the second day of this battle, great and important and terrible in its results as it was would be beyond the purpose of this tale, if it is desirous to read of the ape experiences of the boy and girlscouts during the titanic struggle, so we will go through a brief review of the conflict along the main christian lines of the Central Left wing ere we return, to follow the fortunes of Jennie urner and the other child scouts.

The battle along the left center was fought mmtty mostly upon level and sort of hilly or rolly ground, abounding in sections still partly flooded to appear as if they were swamps and covered nearly everywhere with the heavy debris of the remains of flood swept and torn up houses trees and debris of other property.The Mic-ollester and Pandora railroad the only one open despite the disaster past ran nearly north east and southwest,, and parallel to it half a mile southward, ran the soon to be famous and the most bloodiest road in the war "The yellow Brick or big girl ,nool road.. There was also a cross road called the St Peters and St Johns roads.The debris and scattered wreckage of forests were thickest near these roads, and here too many remining trees had been held low to serve as a rampier to the Glandelinian troops and the emplacements used to obstruct the advance of the christian armies.

[illegible] the battle all along the line all men on the christian side not in action, had continued the construction of bridges even under fire but this enabled other portions of general Concentinin Aronburgs troops to be advanced to a position which was within five miles of the city of Abbieann.The bodies of men in advance along this sector of the left were well supported by others and also there were strong divisions also a scattered to the east and west.In the meantime general Arlington seeing the battle almost turning against him in other sectoions sectione had become afraid that another part of the christian army under general Francis Anna a part that had been watching and shelling Abbieann, would join general Aronburg in a general assault upon his main right wing.He had called upon general Aloyis Skenner, and An Agustine Flynn, who had been confronting general Fra c Francis Anna, and was assured that his so too aide would continue to keep general Francis anna"very much interested" where he was, and did.General Francis anna's command had been promised to the aid of general Aronburgwolft, and to have it held back was a great blow to this christian commander in chief. [illegible] Had general Anna's troops been able to do that way and come to the aid of the left wing it is certain that general Arlingtons army would have been in far more greater danger of being crushed and dispersed than it was.
It seemed that general Francis would be held at bay, and ordering reinforcements of his own,the Glandelinian general resolved to force the main fighting of the battle, instead of holding on the defensive as before. He understood that the right and left wings of the main christian armies were divided by the small sector of the Abbieann Disaster flood zone, and he choose for the counter conflict or assault, when hi his heaviest artillery fire might help him.Therefore the heaviest artillery fire yet seen in the battle was now raging, and the christian lines already torn up became [illegible]ordered,the artillery fire even sweeping away some of the soldiers, and put a stop to advancing, or further bridge building out of the question.In this fearful a artillery storm of both sides, the main of the Glandelinian troops had been brought forward some on railroad cars to confront the christian left wing ward one in the early afternoon,general Arlo Arlington feeling very much assured that he could defeat defeat this one main wing of the christian troops before the other could come to the relief.

However the assault was wholly expected and all the troops had been held in readiness for action.Many of the lines of soldiers confronting the enemy he spent six hours under terrific fire in long rifle pits .
The shell fire torn up everything horribleonly all about them, and shell explosions tore and swept so much water high up into the air from streams, floods and the river, that all of the fighters in their positions were up to water or in water up to their very thighs, and the explosions often gave them showers of recent flood debris of every sort ,even it rained spoiled canned goods, and other artilces, even feathers, and before one of the Colonels directing the christian artillery a music box fell hurting his left foot badly so badly that he had to go to the rear.Explosions made household goods of every description fe fall as if all had been swoped up by tornadoes and then let to fall. The noise of such shell explosions was ear splitting and many soldiers suffered from the noise such disturbances as deafeness and even shell shock.

"By ginger this is worse than being lost souls in Hell."grumbled one of the officers-when crash-bang came a earsplitging ear splitting noise as if from the loudest thunder crash ever imagined and something as if it was a flash of lightning followed by a huge cloud so dense as to darken the sky overhead as it spread upward and outward, and a score of trees were rended to fragments and sent scattering in every direction while water came down upon everybody like a cloudburst, let go by a waterspout....Before the concussion b one great pine tree also toppled over but fell in the direction of the enemys front line and a scrambling of many graycoated fellows in the territory followed showing these fellows hustling to get out of the danger of that.

A moment later came the explosion in the nearest flood stretch of a "gang rang "shell, and the water that came pouring down rushed into one of he to the rifle pits in a stream, in such a flood, that the defenses had to be abandoned.Even one regiment of soldiers in recoiling were pelted with everything which children play with, though where the explosions got that no one could tell.Even one man was hit on the head by a rubber doll, and another got a paint box full of water colors right smack into the face, and his face had many colors after that.

At one in the afternoon the Burrough Ranger child scouts were ready for other battle duties and for the march for their own respective positions. Dirty and wet. they yet presented as determined an appearance a re as the soldiers, as they drew up in two lines, each boy and girl in light marching order, with a days rations in their boxes and one hundred rounds of ammunition in their catcartridge boxes and belts...2.3.334

Each gun had been cleaned,, and the boy and girlscouts observed that the bayonets of the soldiers some distance before them were on bright on when it had left the arsenals. For the terror of a christian bayonet lies in its brightness as well as its sharp point..

"Forward march everybody.""The word of command signalled, did not come until until nearly half past One and even then the vast column of men only moved a few hundred feet and then recieved such a rifle fire from the enemys lines that eleven thousand per mile of battle line along a w twenty five mile front were mowed down in fi ve minutes, and the remainder thrown into the wildest confusion.

"This darn battle is going to be another fizzle."growled Jerry Howe the boyscout under his breath"Oh how I'm going to hate those Glandelinians if this continues up"then a sharp rattle of thousands of [illegible] muskets ahead caused him to jump and turn pale as he feared all his own friends would be caught in the face of that fearful firing he heard further off.
Indeed the revenge battle of Abbieann Jerry, nor any of the boy and girlscouts never forgot.

The main assault along the St Patorn road had been repulsed with a crushing immeasurable loss of men and officers, but other divisions were sent [illegible] forward in a long line but the same horror from the Glandelinian rifle fire was repeated, while reports came in by couriers that along another portion of the battle line seven hundred and seventy thousand soldiers had been shot down along a twenty mile front in ten minutes.
This news however whether true or not(it was true) was not allowed to reach any of the boy and girlscouts by Violet, and her sisters main special orders, untill the news could be confirmed..... The awful battle had been in wild thundering progress in front for about an hour, when there came a sudden panic brought on by the retreat of a portion of the Fifteenth corps under general Schlenderlin which had been almost cut to pieces by the maddest assault ever made by the Glandelinians before in any battle..They were seen by the boy and girlscouts coming forward teard general Tiffany Darrown divisions as if in the wildest a panic themselves but it was an On insane onslaught.

"They're coming at us a hundred million strong.We'll hve to fall back to the rear"was the grim grimly exagerated report, and which cry made Jennie Turners heart leap into her throat.Was the awful scene which occured at the first part of the battle the day before to be repeated.
He had her followers go to points of Advantage and signal with their child scout signal flags warnings of the impending disaster to the officers while the rest of the child scouts hidden in trees, or behind strong bushes, trees, stumps and stones and other objects of protection poured in an incessanty and destructive withering fire upon the successful enemy but nothing seemed to stop them and they came in a headlong crash upon the Schroderlinian divisions that almost carried all before it.

"Halt men don't dare retreat, reinforcements are coming.About face"came the command.Don't be cowards now when you never were before.We can whip these fools yet.Remember Poor Abbieann." and soon fresh division was advanced, and those who were retreating regained courage and rallied.How to cause more courage to come into them the Gordon Abyssinian volunteers, were going to the front, and a division of Dombobians from the Ninth Corps.Other columns mobed across the railroad, and the Big Kirkwood road in the greatest numbers, in the face of the enemys heaviest artillery fire and rifles that lined these road with fallen soldiers, carrying the dirt embankments which had been thrown up and driven the enemy from them only to finally cover the captured position with their own fallen in the most fearful numbers.

The whole christian wv wave now pressed on.The enemy had rallied and was also moving b forward again, and the front line of the Glandelinian soldiers had opened a general fire upon the christian troops. Own most of the christian troops dropped in front dead or wounded, many on their knees., but still the survivors prepared to meet them and returned a fire that brought down a whole long line of the enemy into dead alone.

Then a strong Glandelinian battery situated in a long stretch of woods to the right opened its crashing rolling thunder with grape and canister and many regiments of christian soldiers fell dead and wounded atbthat one discharge and the survivors became confused..
Forward"came the command along the enemys own lines and on the enemy came for thirty yards more.Fire away at the christian dogs"WAS the next cry, and from the long lines came walls of smoke and scores of regiments of christians were seen to fall never to rise again and the whole line was almost cut to pieces. The enemy was easily having the upper hand.Even when distant christian batteries tore their lines through and through they did not waver, for they had been and were still being con stantly reinforced, and came on blazing away as rapidly as the men could load, while their own batteries roared and thundered more spitefully than ever, and no matter how great their own numbers were it was im possible for the christians to stand before it without being totally annihilated.Therefore they were compelled to retreat slowly, being driven toward the rear foot by foot, yard by yard over the torn up and still partly flooded ground. The heavy and thick smoke of such awful firing also was hiding everything from view.

"If only those batteries could be captured."

This indeed was the thought in the minds of many a christian commander, and attention as well. A great demonstration was made, six whole divisions advancing upon it and the enemys infantry line in one long solid wave. They were covered by the heavy fire of a christian battery. Ten times the Glandelinian batteries belched forth with the roar of volcanic eruption shattering the whole christian wave of assault, and the enemy infantry greatly added to the destruction, but nevertheless so many were the numbers of the soldiers in purple that they soon were massing forward at the very muzzles of the guns, but the infantry of the enemy was as strong as a wedge were wedge and displayed effectually a forest of bayonets against which the boldest and most reckless of the purple coated soldiers couldn't press on. Then came a deafening universal demon like yell and shout from the Glandelinian rear. An immense wave of Glandelinian Wheeler cavarly, from because of their swift horses it is impossible to meet with or stand against, was coming up with the speed of race horses, and in the fore were the gallent Swoodliers and Gargoylion Guards, with general Andy Moldon in the lead appearing as brave and as dare devil as any of them.

"Charge" came the cry from their chief general Montgomery, and the Glandelinian cavarly charged as cavarly never charged before, riding fairly on top of the forest of bayonets of the gallent christian soldiers. Too many of such men fell dead or wounded to be mentioned here, while so many saddles were emptied of soldiers who would never ride again, while many horses also were killed or wounded. The shock of the crash was fearful, and it was instantly followed by a fierce hand to hand upon every side for miles. For ten minutes this hellish bedlam continued, and yet the christian infantry were too many of for the cavarly, for sometimes six men were at one horse savily shooting stabbing to death or pulling a cavarly man down from his horse and slaying him right there, during the dreadful melee General Montgomery received a severe bayonet thrust through his right arm, one of his men soon the act and shot dead the christian soldier who did the deed, but three more men were at him and the general was made a prisoner. A desperate fight raged to rescue him but when it was accomplished a hundred lives had been given for his rescue, and five hundred were wounded. Then an additional force of cavarly dashed up (pop pop) and finally the christian infantry was forced to retreat leaving two hundred thousand dead and wounded upon no vast a field..

"Jennie dear"

"It was a call from Violet Vivian who came riding up, and it appeared that she too was wounded, but who stillll sat upon her horse,, although pale and weak from loss of blood.

"Yes, Princess." and Jennie gave her best military saulte.

"Ride down into yonder woods at the left, and ask general Mullikan if you are able to find him, if we can have the chance to cross the new branch road at that point with out biggest troop of cavarly and infantry. I located with my glasses that the enemy had a strong battery up the hill some where and is sweeping away all the attacks made in that direction. "

"I sure will gladly Princess But Violet don't you think it is best to go to some doctor and have your wound dressed. How did you get it.???""JJ""

"I will later on. It's a bayonet thrust accidentally done to me by one of my success when I accidentally got in the way of his bayonet and the enemy he was fighting. hurry now, for every moment is precious.."""

Saluting, Jennie dashed away up on her mission. The woods mentioned were low and thick, and the christian engineers had cut two roads through them to transport supplies from one part of the vast battle field to another. Never dreaming of danger Up in that territory, Jennie dashed swiftly along among the trees having no coat on but her yellow purple bodiced dress, and gay waist and an old worn out enemy hat she had picked up to replace her crown for the time being, and soon she reached a turn in the path. suddenly a loud shout went up.

"A Glandelinian girl scout, and on horseback trying to escape our lines. Must be a spy, capture her."

Instantly Jennie halted. but it was too late. From the woods upon either side of the road appeared at least a dozen christian skirmishers, and the young girl scout again found herself mistaken for the enemy, and she was instantly surrounded, while four rifle batteries barrels were pointed directly at her heart. heart.

The young girl scout realized without much thought that had she really been a enemy girl scout she would have been in a perilous position. Now six rifles were pointed at her, and the owners of each gun seemed both willing to bring her to a speedy military death, and capable of doing so.

"Do you surrender?" demanded one of the men after two or three instants pause.

"I--If you were of the enemy you wouldn't capture me alive, but as you're really Americinians I don't see that there is anything else to do gentlemen" replied Jennie with a smile. "But I got papers here to prove you're arresting me by mistake. I'm Miss Jennie Turner, and have been sent to general Mullikan on a mission."

The man looked at the papers.

"You're a sensible girl" put in another. "I see its a fact as no one could get such a pass under any conditions providing they're a stranger to the Vivian Girls. Girls. But you're taking a dangerous course and better let us escort you and present you to the general. He had his horse killed under him an hour ago and is wounded himself. Put maybe he can help Princess Violet out..."

"Then turning to one of the men he said."

"All right James, you take the horse and girl scout in front of us and have the other cover the rear" "we can't stop here."

"Are you fellows thinking that I'm afraid of the enemy!" demanded Jennie, her eyes flashing.

"We'll little girl maybe you are not but nevertheless the enemy these days are not to be trifled with. "was the cool response of one of the soldiers. "I'll sit with you to be sure you are safe. But first here is a sabre, and a couple of pistols which I believe you will badly need."

Jennie received the bright blade and the single rear weapon and holster. She had two pistols of her own in her waist, but of this she did not think at the moment. Having given her the weapons mentioned, the Abbieannian soldier leaped up behind her. "Now comrades no funny work remember you're we'll all dead soldiers. "he said evidently being the leader as he was dressed as a sergeant.. "Move on at right ahead until I direct you to turn to the left."

"It looks to be a pretty bad road." remarked Jennie.

"It sure is but its the safest route I'm sure little girl scout."

Seeing that there was no help to it, but that it must be safest to go by this one road of road, Jennie spoke to her horse Jane, who instantly set off on a trot. The peril that was expected was now at hand than they thought. Instantly a burst of noise and more than thirty Glandelinian soldiers came dashed at them. The soldier rescuers of Jennie's opened fire but not without effect, and so quick was the rush of the enemy that they were speedily overwhelmed and half of their number cut down by the enemy's sabres. Jennie murmured to urge her horse into a vicious jerk movement to one side, and the horse made a wild leap to one side, and started off on the swiftest run. Two Glandelinian soldiers however were able to follow rapidly alongside, and cut down the soldier rescuer riding with her, but with her own sabre handle she cut down a Glandelinian soldier herself, and then with the handle shoved the other soldier violently. There was a yell of alarm, a few blasphemous words, a clutch into empty air, and away went the Glandelinian soldier tumbling over backwards into the dusty road. His officer was disciplined but the shot merely whistled through the trees. Jennie's escort had been annihilated but she did not stop to look back upon the catastrophe as it was of no use and only dangerous for her to lighten ing the reins again and bringing down two more enemy soldiers who suddenly set upon her with a wild dash, she spoke to her horse, who understood her young master, and horse and rider turned to the right and entered entered a thick belt of timber running off in the direction of the Abbieannrivers. At first those left behind tried desperately to pursue her but soon their footsteps faded away in the distance for they were afraid to go into the timber after her where she might be able to ambush them, and soon Jennie found herself utterly alone.

To go get back to her own lines was now the one consideration. She had a fair idea where the christian troops could be found as the sound of battle along their own lines was still plainly heard, but how many of the victorious enemy lay between driving onward, there was no telling, and she too didn't want to get caught between the firing lines. She resolved to go forward slowly, and with great caution and to get out of sight at the first signs danger.

"Perhaps it might be best to wait until darkness set in." she mused but suddenly it came to her that the distant glare of forest fires was so bright at night that she would not be able to conceal herself anyhow, and the horse continued on untill she reached a cross road. and then halted the horse house. near a clump of bush.

"Well done girl scout." sang out a voice, close by. "Where are you bound gay shirt!" and a tall girl scout of the Camp Five Girls Style but wearing hat and uniform of the Mascot angers, and not much older than herself appeared directly in front of Jennie. The girl scout was speedily followed by another and then three boys, who were were good well drilled recruits.

"Gracious I'm glad to meet somebody." answered Jennie Turner "I hope you are true blue to Our Cause." she went on.

"Are we! What do you think." cried the boyscout nearest her "Of course we be.."

"Then since I'm now lost and can't get back I am sure you will befriend me" went on Jennie. "I------"

"You are a rebel girl scout, ain't you!"

"I certainly am not." said Jennie in a most decided tone. "I am Jennie Turner, the famous secret girl scout spy of the Vivian Girl Princesses and they sent me on a message to general Mullikin but I got detained and set upon by a party of the and got lost. The Pickcane rushed to get some information from the general at once. I had an accident who first mistook me for an enemy but this pass I have proved I was not. The enemy who set upon us killed them all. I thought I could get through the lines here without any trouble. Have you seen any whole about?" Jennie added suddenly. before the other had time to think once.

"There ain't no Glandelinians in this neighborhood, Miss Jennie Turner" and the boy scout touched his cap, thinking it a great honor to be taken into the confidence of the little chief commander of the armies, private spy, girl.

"You're on the picket line as we not you not!"

"We sure are" came promptly from all.

"Then show me the closest way to general Mullikins lines. Of course I need one of you as an escort for the way I'm damned I don't want any of them to see me coming over alone as they may take a shot or two at me. And I don't want any of the enemy to overtake me again, for that would mean a volley of shots as before they would like to avenge what I done to them over yonder and to see they killed by accident."

"We'll take care of you Jennie" answered the girlscout who appeared to be a sergeant, and led the way along the edge of the wood, with the girl and boyscouts about her, and Jennie bringing up the lo closely in the rear (don't once)

"Where did you get the uniform girl dear out child?" asked the girlscout sergeant, as they proceeded us slowly an Jennie Decided.

"It belonged to a captured Glandelinian girlscout." answered Jennie truthfully. "you see on my mission I was afraid I might encounter Glandelinian soldiers and I hoped to fool them, but I'm sorry to say I don't believe I can after my brush with them a few minutes ago."

"I'd like to do spy work." commented another of the boys.

"Would you?" answered Jennie. "All right comrades, I'll remember that, and if I get the chance to night I'll speak to any one of the Vivian Girl Princesses about it."

"Will you surely!"

"I certainly will."

"I am much obliged I'm sure if you do that for us."

"Speak for all of us." put in the girl sergeant. "I'm sick of regular girlscout fighting work, I am."

"I'll remember you all" answered Jennie, and indeed she kept her word. Indeed it would have been impossible to forget those boy and girlscouts, who were so good hearted to the core, and already have had their arm race as well as their eye teeth cut. The road was now left behind, and the boy and girlscouts led the way up a small hill, where the woods divided, with a large large open space between of grass and low bush.

"There you are Miss Turner" said the girlscout sergeant. "This is another portion of our picket line, and general Mullikin had his line of battle over there but I guess it's gone now. The enemy is winning the battle so it seems."

"Too bad but I'll try and find it." replied Jennie. "Good bye to all of you, and I wish you luck and God's pleasing."

"Don't forget to mention us to Violet, or here sisters when you get back" said the girlscout sergeant, and she and her followers gave Jennie their written names.

"All right" answered Jennie, and away she trotted at a brisk pace while the six girls and boyscouts watched her out of sight with keen interest.

Jennie had passed a distance of several hundred feet into the woods, when again she heard the childish command to halt and another child scout, a boy this time blocked her way...

"It's all right." answered Jennie. "I have just escaped from the Glandelinians who killed my escort, and I'm Jennie Turner." she gave the counter sign, but the who said nevertheless;

"A counter sign is not admitted here. Have you a pass signed in person by any one of the Vivian Girls."

Jennie produced the pass. A minute later she was asked a few questions by an Angelinian soldier in command of a squad, and then allowed to go. she inquired for General Avenbug's Burough Rangers and was told they had withdrawn to another part of the army and then on her inquiring for general Mullikien heard he was severely wounded.

"I'll get even for the massacre of my escort." said Jennie to herself, as she urged her horse down the main road twas Abbieann at full gallop. "I hope I don't encounter Glandelinians again however for a long long time. Hiegho. I wonder how Gertrude Angeline and Mildred Manning is getting along!"

She never dreamed that Mildred Manning was still in the army hospital and that her shoulder wound was a slow healer but that Gertrude was already out.

It was not long before Jennie found the troop of child scouts she was after, encamped on the edge of a large stretch of woods near the Big Girlscout road. Violet hearing had gone to the hospital tent to have her wound taken care of, and the force on either sisters, Angelina was in charge. Here, and her sisters, and others Jennie told her story to which all listened with horror

"Gracious but what dreadful soldiers those Gladelinians are." said one of the boyscouts "and won't they feel cheep when they learn how many of their comrades have been shot and cut down by one girlscout!"

"Not likely they will never find out!" answered Jennie Turner Jennie Turner/

A few minutes after she had returned to camp camp after fiding that general Mullikin had been severely wounded she had tried to find out for herself if it if it had been safe for the christian troops to go across that road which Violet had desired to know and found to my that it wasn't safe but if the boy and girlscout came came did have petycoat did not move pretty soon all would be lost.

"to horse, to horse everybody" she caused the cry to ring out through the camp, and soon every one of the boy and girlscout girlscout were in the rank and all already mounted. Before two o'clock came that afternoon the child scouts witnessed the enemy make a great terrific charge, and the enemy captured a whole row of christian batteries and holding it for good for the rest of that bloody day. They saw through their glasses that the Glandelinian forces were fiercely attacking all along the whole line and slowly the whole Christian line was being driven back upon the road and away from the direction of Abbieann.

Not wishing to be too close to a battle line Jennie Turner and many of her followers took part in the work with many of the soldiers in taking care of the dead or dying and wounded being brought to the christian rear, and never were the true horrors of war brought closer to her young heart than it was now the scene scenes were pitiful beyond description description and her eyes refused to keep dry as she moved here and there, looking for comrades and giving aid and comfort to the many unknown sufferers. She had just found one of her own boyscouts down with a bullet through his thigh, and was looking around for a stretcher, when a groan almost at her feet made her turn There in the brush and dust rested a Glandelinian soldier shot through the shoulder//.

Give me a drink for the love of Heaven" he did came the murmur" and having her canteen handy the girlscout poured the desired water and held the cup to the sufferers lips.

Thank you Thank you even if you are a christian dog" came in a short gasp "Even though I'm a Glandelinian I'll never forget this kind deed Won't you please prop me up against that tree I can't stand it down here in the hot dust/."

Certainly I'll prop you up" answered Jennie and as the man was heavy she got two boyscouts to help and they lifted the wounded Glandelinian soldier as carefully as they could as she worked she caught sight of the manmaiform and a markings.

You are a scoodlier soldier" she said. "Know anything about the Scoodlier Gorging Volunteer?"

I am a Goring Volunteer" came the surprising reply.

"Then Do you know George Radcliffe We's a close friend of mine"

Of course I know Radcliffe---everybody does though when he's of our side I don't know what made him a friend of yours but I don't regret it he didn't know who Radcliffe really was however) My name is Goombering."

"Radcliffe is Radcliffe!"

"He's missing---somebody said he was shot by the christian dogs" "Who are you?" Jennie told him.

"I heard him mention you---and other things" "Strange we should meet here" "But though we're on opposite sides I'll never forget you, for as mean as we Glandelinians are we never forget any one who befriends even a wounded enemy" "I am sorry an enemy. Ah here comes somebody with a stretcher." concluded the Glandelinian soldier/

Nowere could he said, as soon the Glandelinian soldier was carried off, and five minutes Jennies comrade followed What Jenie heard concerning Radcliffe made her feel down as any dwarf - downcast To fight a terrible battle was one thing thing to have them killed or captured was quite another/.

"I trust by the time I see him again

I trust the report is a mistake and he is safe" She thought "For he isn't such a glorious thing after all when a fellow comes to look at it!"

At the In the meantime general Francis Louis 's divisions were fighting against the enemy as they had never never fought before. The Angelinian troops under general Turner were called posted after the first defeat of the shattered christian line at a point about a mile south of the battery of he the Glandelinians under general Grainville. They were baked up by a fringe of high brush and trees, and to their left were planted fourteen batteries of christian guns with twenty eight guns each, to cover a large hollow in the forest one some distance to the front/.

Beyond the hills and heavy thickets every every n ook was filled with Gado linian soldiers Glandelinian soldiers who poured in a perfect hurrican of bullets and a rainstorm of shell fire u onthe christian forces and sent one high ex losive shell after another shrieking and thundering loudly overhond.The din all alon along the line of battle for many miles was something frightful, while the smoke became so thick and how heavy even das ito the breeze blowing it nearly chocked everybody/.

"I'm sick of this, I'm sick of this.I can't stand to see the enemy do this any longer."blurted out the boyscout Jerry Rowe as a shell went whinning and shrieking directly over his head and ex loding exploding in the rear --gn and grasping his rifle tightar he made a wild rush for the battle lines.But one of the Vivian Girl Princesses Jennie saw him coming, and she tripped him up un.

"Go back to your command you little reckless fool."were the words which ran rang in Jerrys unwilling ears.

."I'm sick of this.I've got to get at the enemy---I can't stand it to see them continually win like this, really I can't"he whined/.

"You are one of the most reckless boyscouts Ive heard of or ever seen young fellow" said Angeline Vivian herself."Go backwards to where you belong and don't dre dare come forward untill you and the rest recieves the command to do so.The iden of you recklesely ex osin ex losing yourself outhere like this.Go back or we'll stick you with this."and the point of Jennie's sabrecwas thrust under Jerrys noise.

With a grunt of disgust Jerry turned back but as he did so he gave the blackcat looks tward the enemys lines.After that he remained where he had been but only because h e didn't want to offend the Vivian Girls.

"Jerry is getting more reckless every day."observed James Gannon one of the eldest boyscouts."Why that young goat wants to go out and fight the enemy single handed and for his age and size is a riddle to me by goose flesh.Of ho---"forwards" th my the christian troops chase those Glandelinian dogs into the river and out of Calverinin."

And as the whole christian line in the distancewas seen to surge forwards the boy and girlscouts at the direction of Violet's sisters also went forward.The hollow sd the opening in the woods and many other points had been crossed under the fiercest enemy rifle fire ever heard or experienced, and general Balboas divisions were ascending a small but long half wooded hill beyond, when the Glandelinians under general Given ap e appeared not only in front but also to the right and the left.
this movement of the enemy was terrific and very extensive and they came on like a roaring yelling and screaming hurricane and they suddenly o ene opened fire all along the line so fiercely that they almost annihilated the whole christian wave in front within a very short space of time.The very boy and girlscouts too were caught in the path of this same awful melee and disast er but were not in such a peril peril so far as the christian line was. Down came the Glandelinians from the summit of the hill with a roar of yells and noise of rifles that deafend deafened ev rybody and they closed with the christian line with a shock that almost carried all before it.General Balboa was killed and two i of his generals wounded.

"Forward comrades we must cut out way out"came the cry of general Wheelen as the Glandelinians firing as they ran rushed irrestibly into the hollow with the fury and irrestible power of an advancing flood and the christian troo s appeared almost surrounded.Violet's sisters had ordered the child scout regiments to retreat to a better position while they remained to try and rally the soldiers by their own presence.The christian soldiers had fired six times and brought down six lines of Glandelinian soldiers each time but there was no time to load again and on as the Glandelinians firing as they ran rushed irrestibly into the hollow with against the roaring enemy they went guns to their breasts and the long lines of brightly polished bayonets sending a brief chill to the hearts of the enemy before them.But the Glandelinians yelling their blasphemous devil yells stood firm in their ownadvance and continually drove the Nationals back.Violet's sister Angeline had seized upon a flag and waved it defiantly in the air but as the enemys fire increased to a most frightful din she felt a quiver in her arms. The flagstaff had been struck by a shell fragment and was broke into three pieces the u per part coming down and the flag falling over her head.A cantian who was beside her at th moment was hit by the sh same shell fragment and went down on that savage battlefield with a groan which rang in the princess's ears for many days after.

Again in another minutes the two forces came together.But now it seemed as if the Glandelinians retreated for they were giving way, but it evidently was the enemys purpose to cut off this section of the christian army from the main/.
In this they they were partly successful, for the one grand division which had gone forward was not pro erly reinforced.The desperate and bloody fight went on in much disorder and a portion of the very boy and girlscout regiments found themselves also isolated from the rest of the command.

They were however able to get out of the zone of danger nevertheless without a single loss.

"We are in for it."cried Jennie Turner who remained close to Angeline Vivion.
"Look the Glandelinians are on every side of us."

"Surrender"came the sudden cry of a Glandelinian commander."Down you co you c ion little christian cur"Angeline Vivian heard poured in'o h r ear, and then she was struck by something and s nk to earth.By the time she could rise Glande linians were all around and she was a prisoner, and being hurried to the rear of the Glandelinian o position s.

"Hurrah we are bagging every one of the christian dogs."came the victorious yell, as Angeline and a hundred others all strangers to her were being u pushed along."We will soon have them all if not by to night."

"Say r pretty little christian rumpy(to Angeline Vivian) don't general Aronburg wishe he had stayed where he belonged instead of coming here to fight general Arlington.He'll get more than his share of fighting before we are done with him, the christian dog."

Angeline did not reply to any of these taunts, and indeed it was not safe t o do so for many of these Glandelinians were the Omarian hotheadsand would have glorried in torturing the little prisoner to death where she stood.
As Angeline went on she noted with a sinking heart how thickly the active enemy Sr troops were massed against the slowly retreating christian lines, tens of thousands of them moving forward over two miles of ground on every hand, and yet she knew that that was a very small number for the real force massing on a very wide and long front.

"Mr Soldier"she whispered to one of her fellow prisoners"What do you think of this?"

"I thin k the whole christian army is done for, unless general Nemo arives to hel the christian forcescout."was the low reply."But that ain't our affair just now.Princess it looks like we were are in a bad fix."

"I doj don't think so for myself, for if I couldn't be sure to find out some information within the enemys lines I wouldn't allow myself to be a prisoner even now for I and my sisters have a way about us that they couldn't capture us if we willed against it.But something is wrong why the enemy cannot be beaten and this is an opportunity for me to find out.And sir I'll tell you what.Ifyou are placed with me in some prison I'll prove my words by helping you to escape with me."and then from the enemy came the order for silence, and no more was said.The man whom she had spoken to was a man called George Cohenin. The prisoners had been carefully and slowly passed along, from one guard to the next, untill a strong well armed fortification just u on the northeastern butskirts of Abbiemn city was reached.
Here they were searched and everything of value was taken from them.Had the enemy under general Arlin ton known who Angeline was they would have watched her more closely, but they did not know the importance of their "catch". The soldier prisoners themselves were even tied up in pairs and made to squat down upon the ground, but Angeline was only told to stand by a tree, and two guards laced placed to watch her.So strange was even this situation that had she wanted to she could have even then easily escaped.But hoping to gain information she was not tempted to do so.And as will soon be seen she had done the wisest thing, for her being ca tured was the cause of general Arlingtons disgraceful def at in the end of the battle . The sentinels had been cautioned to shoot down the soldiers at the least sign of an outbreak, but nothin nothing was said concerning about Angeline.The fact is though she was not arrested by Glandelinians who were the child murdering kind, or otherwise it would have been easier for her to give up her l plan and esca e while she had the opportunity/.

During this time all on up to three oclock the christian soldiers were being steadily driven back)(put in the black) untill the reinforcements mentioned by the nun Cohenin arived, when general Nemo put an end to the vigorious and almost irrestible advance, destrovin destroying half of the attacking Glandelinian wave, and driving them back, the counter attack then being pressed with renewed vic vigor, the christian general Nemo leading the attack at one point, and general Turner at the other. The fiercest of the charge was bravely met by the Glandelinians all along the line in such fury as to redouble the violence of the battle, and they even pressed upon the attackers in such numbers that they could not hold to the assault any longer, and the new simultaneous counter attack of the Glandelinians gained the day.For his second day of the battle the Glandelinians claimed the victory.The remainder of the day from five oclock on till dark was spent in gathering up and buryin buryin g as many of the dead as possible, and caring for the wounded.During this contest, the Glandelinian commander in chief general Arlington was first hit by two bullets, and then knocked from his horse by a shell fragment and dangercusly wounded.Th command in the field t was thereupon assumed by general Francis John Smith, who remained at the head of head of various Glandelinian armies untill killed at the battle of Logan Zoe Rae Run many months after.

At the spot where they were placed the prisoners remained all the rest of the day,and all night, and as soon as it was day break Jennd Angeline was marched into what remained of Abbiemn in com any with a large number of other Glandelinian rprisoners.It was learned that all of the bigger remaining houses were full of prisoners to overflowing, and therefore the prisoners were divided, Angeline, and fifty others being sent to what before the outbreak of the Abbiemn disaster had been a soap making factory.

The enforced march to this makeshift Glandelinian prison was one that Angeline never forgot.The streets of what remained of Abbieann were lined with a motly collection of slightly wounded Glandelinian soldiers,, who had come to cheer their own comrades, and sneer and un insult the captives . Some on the side walks were very vindictive and had to be forcibly restrained from doin the christian risoners bodily harm.

"These Christian dogs killed my son."shrinked one wounded soldier, as he ran directly in front of one of the soldiers next to Angeline."I will revenge his death." And he drew a long knife.The Angolinian soldier caught his upraised arm, very roughly and firmly, and held him untill another Glandelinian soldier disarmed him and ordered him to go to his house where he belonged with the rest of the wounded.At such a scene Angeline's heart was in her throat---nevertheless she felt sorry for the wounded soldier for she saw that the loss of the soldiers son had almost caused him to lose his mind.After that all the rest of the prisoners and even Angeline sticking close together ke t a sharp lookout for an attack.

The temporary i prisoj prison having been gained, the captured ones were agi again examined to see for sure that none of them had obtained any weapons on the march, and then led into the gloomy looking building half in ruins too and which still smelt strong of soap lie and rotting fats. Angeline and George Cohenia were placed with sixteen others in an apartment on the first floor(first floor was ten feet above the ground) a very gloomy looking place eighteen by twenty feet in size with a very low ceiling,,, and lit by one small window. This little window had chhh once held sashes of glass, but these were broken by the recent concussion of one of the explosions and the opening was barred by several pieces of strong timber, spiked fast, to top and bottom .

"We are in a beautiful sour pickle bottle ain't we."sniffed Cohenia as he took survey of the situation."Cosh what an all fired rotten smell."

"Wonder how long we will be forced to remain in such a hole."Iput in another of the prisoners."Sergeant, what do you think about it? ""and he turned to the Glandelinian officer(who was a top sergeant) who was posting threese guards at the doorway.

"What do I think of it, why I believe you'll stay here untill Abbieann sinks under the earth."was the answer with a grin. The prisoners learned too that the Glandelinians would only feed them every twenty four hours.And in the place there was nothing to lie upon but the hard and sloa y soapy floor, with ones cap for a pillow, and no blankets but such as a few had brought along and which may be taken away from them on the morrow.The small had made Angeline sick at the stomach and she hun g at the window for fresh air untill one of the guards ordered her roughly away.A little after a soldier appeared and gave them each only a cup of black strong coffee in tin cups, stale bread in loaves a bowl of soup with meat and some beans and bacon and told them all that should last untill the next morning.It was all the l plainest, and not overly wholesome, and when one of the prisoners complained the Glandelinian soldier said;

"What are you kicking about.It's the same ration we get and we're lucky the wan way your army has us pinned up that we get even anything at all.We don't eat any square meals either, and for two days most of us had to w fight you christi n christian dogs on an empty stomach while you can eat your fill.It's good for you to experience some of our hardships and see what it is.""

From one of the small o penings in the window the prisoners could by looking out one by one a side street of the ravaged city the opening looking also down upon a yard littered with casks and barrels brought in there by the floods, and surrounded by ruined business structures of wood and bbk brick. The streets since the ruined section of the city was now in possession of the enemy always presented a lively a pearance beca se so many of the soldiers who were wounded slightly but able to work were doin a doing this or that.

"I'm soon going to try to get free."Whispered Angeline to George."I have no desire to remain a prisoner now in such a lace and on such ration s when I can accom lish something now, and while my sisters will be worrying about me,."

"Hush "murmured George."I was thinking the same thing Princess, but don't let the guard even dream of what is in your mind, for it is said they put mind readers to guard us, and if he catches on he'll shoot you down like a dog h who is mad."

"Will you go with me if any chance to run for it happens.?"

""Yes if the chance is not too risky."

"Will the others try it with me?"

"No.They're afraid to."

"Well then I and you may try it soon."

No more could be said for a few minutes.But as the minutes went by,Angeline while walking around the lower end of the room saw something projecting from a shelf four feet and a half above her head. She drew George Cohenia to one side, and when the guard was not looking, got the many to hoist her up .The object prove to be a short of prying s i spike and chisel, three inches broad, eighteen inches long and very thick and heavy. Ge George himself at her request hid it in his clothes.

One of the other prisoners saw the movement but he did not say anything and merely grinned.Then when the guard was not yet looking the man himself at Angelines request examined one after another the fastenings across the window. Most of the bits of stout wood were too well spiked on for him to even try to loosen without making a loud noise.But finally he discovered that there was one which was very shaky and by inserti g inserting the spike like chisel under it, the lower end became detached from the windowsill.

"Hey,hey,hey, there you big prisoner what are you doin g so long by that window."!!!!!!!"called out the guard .

"If you don't like to see me stand by this window so much why don't you allow us prisoners to have some fresh air."answered the soldier as coolly as he could."This l place is worse in smell than a slaughter pen."

"It's far better than you christian dogs deserve, and what you will get in the future."growled the Glandelinian, and went on reading his long sheet.

"The board is loose Princess"whispered George to Angeline a minute later.

"I'm going to risk the danger of a drop to the ground if I can get half a chance if it is s pi possible."declared Angeline.

George shook his head .

"Those dirty Glandelinians will shoot you Princess if y they see you even trying it."

"But I always did escape the Glandelinians before.Why not succeed now."!

"Well maybe you would, but if you do get away, where are you going,tell me that."!

"I'll get out of the city nevertheless.I've got this gray waist on you see.....:."

"Yes, but you must understand there are millions and millions of troops and cavarly and long lines of Glandelinian infantries between us and the christian lines... :""

"S ies Spies manage to go and come on both I sides George.If s spy can take care of himself-----I guess I can----at least I'm goin going to try."

"And get catched like the one my Jennie your sister was apprehended.?"

"Well anyhow A nglinian soldiers held spies were tighter than the enemy does"went on Angeline but George would not listen.He would rather put up with ill treat e treatment than to run too much risk, much as he desired his liberty. The Glandelinians were very dangerous too...

Angeline feeling sure the guard [illegible] lay down in a corner close to the window, but not to close alone.In fact it was day an hour and frith frightfully hot outside, and the w [illegible] and also(peop) [illegible] the prisoners [illegible]

Her mind was in a tumult.She id she dare to attempt what was in her heart.She knew for sure she could crouch aside the loose board and drop from the window into the yard below with comparative ease.But after that.The guards were very watchful.Ah that was the question an all important question.She might surely drop into the arms of one or two guards below and that would mean close and solitary confinement and possibly death.Or the guards might see her only to fire upon and kill her as she was in the act of leaping out of the window."Imute after minute passed by and then she heard a clock strike six o'clock.It was getting pitch darkoutside, not because of a storm brewing but because the strong hot winds outside were blowing from the southwest bring ing up so much thick smoke from the distant forest fires that it al cured much of the light from the sky.The dim light from a lantern in the hallway where the guard stood far from lit up the room, and the guard half asleep leaned heavily against thewall, while his companion a few feet further down the hall was, in a mid slumber from the afwful heat rested on an empty box.But they were r professing to sleep nevertheless to try and catch the prisoners na ping, for Glandelinian guards are dowed with something that prevents them from falling asleep on guard duty.

As slyly and quietly as a lowcat Angeline moved for a forward untill she rested directly under the window her friend George had worked upon.The end of the board was within reach, and softly but firmly she pushed it aside, so slowly that it scarcely moved in one move.

"Do you really mean it that you are goin going to take the chance?" It was the voice of George in the girls ear.He had been watching the window in silence for that short space of time.

"Yes indeed my I meanwas the soft answer.I'll try it no matter what comes.They'll really have to kead me to keep me here and I positively mean it.I'll die first bfore before I'll remain a prisoner under any conditions."

"Then I'll go with you Princess, and Heaven be with us in the undertaking."con cluded George, and he gave Angeline's hand a tight squeeze.An instant later Angeline was up on the window sill.Turning about like a flash, she lowered herself to the full length of her arms.A se second she hung there, then she let herself drop. Surely it must be acknowledged that the young Princess's heart was in o her throat as she let go of the window sill.There was no telling where she was going to land and what sort of a reception she would meet.All was fortunately so dark as mid night now only a few dim conflagration lights here and therebrightening up the horizon line in the southwest and piercin g the blackness.The sound of battle too had died out because it was too dark to fight.Creek.she had landed upon a number of old broken boxes hurledthere recently by the receding flood in a reach and tumble way.Down she went a hinterlay some of the boxes and rolling over on o her back, with a number of the boxes crashing down on top of her and making a frightful rack et. she had just t hurled the last box off and got to her feet somewhat bruised when George came after her making a greater racket than before because of his bigger weight.

"Angeline,My gosh are you safe.Confound those tall tale boxes."

"Yes.Come on before they come to find the reason of the noise."

And Angeline extended her hand.George took it, and side by side they sped forward to where a long board fence separated the yard from the street.They didn't know that the top had a barbed wire fe running around it .As they reached the fence they heard a commotion inside the old soap factory.Their escape added by the noise of the boxes had been discovered.

"Never mind what'll happen to me.Up you go Princess.Make your escape." whispered George, and gave Angeline a boost.Angeline saw the barbed wire fence, but nevertheless managed to reach the top without grasping the wire and gave one glance over the fence and then dropped back into the yard in a hurry.Clasping g her hand over Georges mouth she drew her companion back.

Gland "Glandelinian soldiers are swarming out there in the street lookin g for us."she whispered in the old soldiers ear."We must find some other way.Let's try the back."

"But there are nothing but buildings there "Cried George.

But nevertheless they both stood there motionless, their hearts at almost a standsta standstill.They had no wea pons but what good would weapons be against so many when you're down there cooned up in a yard.The ar alarm too war was growing more general and torches could be seen lighting up the street outside.

"Two prisoners have escaped."Some one cried."

"Who were they sir?"

"An old soldier and a girlscout of some sort.You can recognize the girl easily enough even if she would disguise herself as she's unusally pretty."

"Where did they go."?

"That's what we're tryin g to find out.We just discovered that girl was one of the Princess's.Drat the luck.And she had escaped.They say no one can capture them or hold them oif you do."

Angeline wondered which way she and her companion should turn. There were many boxes and barrels in the yard and they might readily have secreted themselves in one of them, but the boxes were now afire being full of grease, because one of the soldiers in holdin g up the torch too close to the fence had bumped his hand against a board protecting out and dropped the torch inside.The fire wouldn't do the two any harm except by its light reveal them there, and then the yard would be investimated for the purpose ost especially for the fire. Besides to remain in the yard a prisoner without food or drink, was out of the question.

Cautionin g her soldier companion, both moved slowly and noiselessly to the extreme rear of the yard to avoid especially the fire which grew bigger and hotter. Here was located a two story building probably facing the the next street.The lower windows were closed, but a upper window was raised all the way, and the room beyond was totally dark..Close to the open window ran a sort of fire escape ladder and catching hold of these Angeline went first her friend following.Angeline raised herself up untill she was on a level with the opening.For a moment her heart was in her mouth because the fire could have revealed her, but no one fortunately looked up.Without hesitation she entered the window, followed by her comrade, y just as half a dozen Glandelinians entered the yard below to find the cause of the fire. The soldier who had dro ped the torch finally confessed but one said to him;

"Good for you.The light will reveal us the escaping prisoners I hope!

"but they're not in the yard."said another.You can see that."

"Sure both of them didn't jump the fence. "Angeline heard another Glandelinian ask.

"Neither one of them did.How could they with that barbed wire on top.They must have gotten into that building in the back."

As Angeline and George waited to hear no more, satisfied before the search was over the open window would be noted, and an examination in that direction would be sure to ens ue.Sendin g from the room into which they entered was a passageway or hall between a great number of water soaked boxes showing once the flood had been deeper than the height of this building, and there was also loose piles of moulded clothing, and down this bothmoved cautiously, for it was so dark they could not see a foot in front of them. Presently Georges hand struck a railing leadin leading to a pair of stairs.At the bottom of the stairs was a door, and from the crack above this streamed a dim flickering ruddy light showing that the room below was partly lit up by the box pile fire outside in the yard.Wondering if she and her companion could escape to the next street before the alarm was given in that neighborhood, the two slipped down the stairs and entered the store or what had been a store but it was empty.The store had a damp and mouldy odor.As Angeline taking the lead was advancing t q ward the front door which was half off of its hinges she heard several men come up to it from the other side Angeline stopped her companion from proceedin g forward and then the two had barely time to hide themselves behind a broken counter when three men entered.

The men who ever they were were talking English in a broken accent for some reason or other.

"Indeed ze was lucky you have found me at the camp."said one of the new comers in a high pitched voice."I ain't zare all ze time ye kno."

"If we hadn't found you Mexican Pete, you'd have lost a good chance."came the ready in a voice that sounded strangely familiar to Angeline.At the rink of being discovered she peered out from her hidin g place and saw that the person who had spoken was in a gra gray uniform of a Glandelinian officer but that he was Gingigore.

With him was Whillian Sebu Schloeder, while the third party was a stranger.

At first Angeline was both astonished and mystified.What had brought these two Gesini Captions to that place at this hour of the day.

"We've sent over to the christian lines by wireless a fine collection of lans Iplans which ought to upset this Glandelinian army and turn it topsy turvy George Cinclgore."said Whillian Schloeder in good en l english which Violet and her visitors understood as well as their own lan u language."Just be we ought to see results.Now to get into the christian lines to day."

"Take the attempt to get back at this time of day----"Cried Gingigore."You must be crazy.If yeuse thinks I wouldn't geeve fife hundreon dollars to even stay here rather than go out."Maybe youse want to committ sucide maybe.Better wait.We go when ze Glandelinian army, he een w i whimmed.Besides ze city ees all ze excit. Zay say two prisoners one a goil and wan a man o heem both escape.Zat too may make the enemy suspicious of us.No.No.We wait untill ze excit, heem ees all over."

"Could it not be possible we meet the prisoners and hel them."

"O.And anyway off cot ees the Vivian Gril what zay say she ees not ees not necessary.Zay can no nevare geet her again now once she ees free.She could be our salvatore herself.But just lookie ze Glandelinians out een ze streets.No safe to go out while zay are zare ain't that so Sam?"to the stranger.

"ost excited and dangerous Glandelinians I ever saw."he answered in good english."If they discover us or suspiect us we're lost.And the worse of it is "I have general Arlingtons Iplans.Remember we got to do something."

"I'd give anythin g to meet the Princess.she could take it out."said Whillian Schloeder."Remember we got to get it there to general Aronburg somehow."

The trio moved to the center of the sotre, and lit a candle.Then they had the package open, and with a well trained eye Gingigore looked it over in a careful manner.Some talk followed.Angeline and her com anion listened to the talk with keen interest.They understood they were the three famous christian spies and therefore she revealed herself to their sprur surprise and she readily recieved the l plans. She heard some knocking at the door and told them to pretend to be searching for her. They did and she hid again.Then two officers and a guard from the prison presented themselves.

"We were searching for those prisoners ourselves."answered Gingigore in his own tongue in re l reply to the officers questions."Sam have you found anybody yet."

"Not a soul"answered Sam who alone had not seen An e Angeline at the time she showed herself to Gingigore."I heard something going on by the prison but that is all."

"The window upstairs is open."said the officer."We think they might have climbed up to it.We want to make a search."

"We'll h l help you"said Gingogire to stall him off,so his men would not go near the counter.He and his two followers went up stairs with the soldiers. Angeline and her friend scarcely dared to breathe.One of the soldiers remaining below moved forward to the front door to watch.Then he came behind the counter and walked slowly tward the spot where the two christians were in hiding.Angeline herself felt that a crisis was at hand.Moving along as if in deep thought,this Glandelinian soldier reached the very spot where Angeline and her soldier com anion was in hid ing,behind a number of loose shelving boards standing upright under the counter.His legs were within easy reach of the Princess,and had he leaned down for even a few inches he could have seen the hidden child and man without trouble.But maybe it would have cost him his life if he had for the two were now dangerous when at large, and Angeline had concealed about her person where the searchers had not found it, a long, sharp stabbing knife, and she could draw that and use it simultaneously like the rattlesnake of lightning.

"James!James."It was a call from above and at once the soldier moved away. A moment later Angeline heard him ascend the stairs,and an earnest talk and some swearing on the next floor followed. Angeline suggested to her com anion that it was now high time to make their escape.Even if the others should go away, some of the men might be placed to guard every room of the building to prevent their escape if it was suspected by the enemy they were hiding on a out of the way place.

Without speaking one word, both of them arose from their cramped position.As Angeline stole out of her hiding place she saw close at hand a long pistol, and a double cartridge belt, evidently left there by mistake by one of the soldiers searching for them.The man told her to use them for herself, but she almost forcibly made him put on the belt, and slipped the gun into his o pocket saying finally;

"My stabbing knife can do more for me than a gun in case I'm attacked at close quarters.The gun anyhow is too big for me.I need a smaller.This done they both ran lightly for the open door.A look outside told her that the street in the immediate o vicinity of the store was clear but that she had to be careful as it was getting much lighter, again, though the darkness still prevailing had a strange red coloring, and the sky was deep crimson red, with a blacker hue down to the east. How would the street be further on.That question could not be answeredd.Those upstairs too were now coming down.Angeline beckoning to her companion to followe moved out side, and the man closed the door noiselessly behind him as he came, and both made a dash across the street, to a yard between a factory half in ruins and a dwellin dwelling house still intact.

"Halt there you two."

"It was the command of a lone Glandelinian soldier, who had seen them running.But the two fugitives however did not reply,, but kept on their course the man did not dare to follow, and therefore leaping the fence, the two crossed another street, and finally found themselves in the rear of a badly wrecked apartment house(not mouse) surrounded by a once well kept garden but now covered with wreckage and thrush of every descr pt description.A half wrecked tumbled down barn was near at hand and the two entered this,,, thin ing the hay loft would surely offer a hiding place, but they saw they couldn't hide under the hay d for it was wet, and frightfully hot in the interior from wetness and weight produced by the water. !!:!

Only ten minutes was spent in the barn,,,,,, was spent without disturbance, and Angeline herself was wondering what she should do next for now she heard the roar of distant battle again but this time much louder.Then as the sound slightly slacked down or receded, she and her companion heard the clatter of hoofs,, and a Glandelinian boyscout or what appeared to o be one on horseback entered what was made into a sort of path in the garden, and rode straight for the barn.From the heyloft Angeline saw him dismount and take some papers from a secret pocket in his saddle. Then came the slow shutting of a house door,the rush of feet, and a very sweet looking girl in civilian clothes rushed up.(PC').

"Oh Adelefob,are you safe?"Ang line and her companion heard the little girl exclaim----in most anxious tones.

"erfectly safe Lucy Gray although I have had a tight squueeze of it."

"And did you get to general Aronburg and----"

"Hush my dear sister"the boyscout put up his hand warnlingly."No I didn't have the chance to see the great general, as the battle cut off my way to him but I saw general Hindernine and surely that was just as well.The plans of the enemy fortificatiojs fortification s will help along the c r christian army in this battle a good deal.Has anybody of the enemy officers been here since I was away?"

"General Jackscnie Andrews.He wanted to know where you were and why you were so often absent from your quarters.I told him you were somewhere about town doing some military business.Adeldefob I am afraid those Glandelinians are beginning to suspect everything is not rightt ."

"Perhaps they do.But as lon g as they are not able to get evidence against us Lucy we are safe.I hope you have something ready for me to eat,,I'm as hungry as a child ale When St Johns,there you are old boy.Lucy , St Johns is a marvel to travel through such flood territori s and muck holes and the like. "

So the talk went on(get the hun) while the boyscout lit a lantren,and cared for his horse. That the boy was Angelines boyscout christian friend Adoldefob there was no doubt,and the girl was his darling sister.He had just made a visit to general Hindernines headquarters with the plans of the Glandelinian fortifications in about Abbiann///.f.f.f.

Angeline felt her heart beat bound within her.Here were friends within the very enemys lines would who would surely assist her.She came to the edge of the loft,and so did George Ochenia.

"Hey down there."she whispered, but loud enough to be heard/.

"What do you want?Who is there?" ejaculated the girlscout herself leaping back, and drawing her pistol,and then looking up.

"Don't fire Lucy.Don't you recognize me.I'm Princess Angeline Vivien.I heard you talk and we two up here beg of you to help us.The man with me is a National soldier, just escaped with me from the prison three blocks and a half over from here---a place that used to be a soap making establishment---and the guards and other Glandelinian soldiers are searching everywhere for us.So far they have no clue as to our whereabouts, and---

"Come down here and let us look at you"was the interruption, and Angeline came down the ladder, the soldier following.The boyscout Adoladfob help us his lantren.

"Golly it's Princess Angeline alright."he said briefly and in surprise."How long were you and your friend up in the loft Angeline?It's a sur rise to see you here."

here within th[illegible]!"

"I[illegible]ll assist us won't you.We want to find out something about the enemy too.That is why I and he escaped."

Angeline looked at the girlscout .

"Bring them into the house,Be Adeledfob."she said turning to her brother."I am sure the man with her is even George Cohenin for I know him and believe I recognize him despite the smoky darknesss.And when I was wi at th e window I heard some men goviby on c horseback who were talking about a man and girl prisoner having just escape escaped and one of the men was growlin g about it over the "Drated luck that it was one of the Vivian Girls who got away."

"They were myself and Angeline Little girl."

"Come along Princess"said Adeledfob."And if you wish to obtain any news of importance the sooner I can help you accomplish it, but nevertheless the more you keep yourself hidden the better it be will be for you."and taking Angeline by the hand he led the way through the wreckage strewn garden into the house, the soldier following .....

Once inside the house,?Angeline and her friend were conducted to a large sitting room, once well furnished but partly injured showing it had suffered from the concussion of one of the big ex losions. Here Angeline and her friend were invited to take a seat, while their host locked to it that every curtain(painted black) was draw drawn down, and all the outer doors locked.

"Now I will listen to your story."said Adeledfob dropping into a half broken chair which seemed too brittle to stand for his weight but it did.....!:!

"Won't you have your breakfast first brother!"interposed his sister."P erhaps Princess you and your friend are hun r hun ry hungry too !"she added turning to the two fugitives..

"We are---but we want to be sure we're safe enough from recapture by the Glandelinians so we can accom lish our mission before we began to eat."was the quick reply.....!!.:..

"You are safe here Angeline my Princess friend---only for Heavens sake don't speak of Glandelinians so confounded loudly,,,, for the sayin g is walls have ears too you know ."

Ththenthe boyscout drew up two chairs up to th the table.

"We'll eat here sin;it will be safer9-in case there is an interruption from from the outside."

In a few minutes a stez str steaming hot breakfast was brought in from the kitchen.Evidently the girlscout had cooked it herself.Never had a meal tasted better to Angeline since she made herself one of the chiefs of girlscouts, and she said so too,after she had eaten and related her story at the same time.

"You were lucky to get away Princess."said Adelefob."And you were still more lucky to strike this place too don't you think so."!

"I do Master Gray------especially after such a breakfast of Hot Wheat Cakes!"

Angeline smiled at the girlscout, who smiled back. "This beats rations in the ..., for even though we're Princesses, I and my sisters we share the same rations as thesoldierz soldiers."

"I dare say it does Princess.But now Princess, the question is,Having esca ed ron the prison with your man or soldier companion, what do you intend to do now?"

"Get back to the christian lines------if we can."

"Yes--precisely if ---you can.It's going to be dreadfully difficult, Princess, more dreadfully difficult and dan e dan e dangerous than to believe.G etting through general Arlingtons lines is not have as light work as you may imagine.I know from my own ex erience and yet they even think I'm of their side.Yet you're a fugitive with your companion and that makes it almost impossible without inside help...."

"I believe you Adeledfob.But I don't intend to remain e here---so I'll make the attempt at whatever cost, that is if you can give me a little aid...!."

"I'll give you all the aid that is possible in my power.You two however had not try to start now.Wait untill the battle again gets in full sway, or at least wait untill four oclock in the afternoon.Then you can go down close to the picket lines, and break through---if you can----when it grows darker.If the smoke of forest fires made it as dark again as it did early this morning that would help you too."

"The trouble is, this confounded uniform of purple and yellow dress too is against me.'!."

"No, not so much as you may thin k Prinbess."Many of the Glandelinian soldiers to try and trickbyour own side are wearing either new, stolen or cast off christian soldier uniform of clothing.All you must do is rip off your numbers designs and letters and dirty your purple coat and dress somewhat, and it will pass,,,, combined with that "College High Ducky Duck square topped hat" which I will furnish to you."

"And what will be my best rout e out of Abbieann?"

"That must lie with yourselves since it is very diff c difficult for me to ster e what is best, and often I have to take chances myself.I will as soon as possible take you to the top of the house, and through your field field glass you can get some idea of my of how the ground lies."

"I'm sorry I have no field Glass.The enemy took everything I had, even my hair ribbon and uniform hat, and wouldn't leave me have my hair bend."

"That is all right.I'll let you use mine."

After this the talk became general.Angeline and the soldier learned that Adeledfob often pretended to serve in the Glandelinian ranks to obtain information to send over to the christian lines, and that he was always with the aid of his sisters, and child slaves whom he won into his confidence giving the christian armies all the aid within i his power .

Having taken a wash after eating, Angeline was taken to q a room where she could rest a while untill the boyscout thought it time to bring her up to the roof. Angeline knew she indeed was about to start on a most dangerous mission.Would she succeed or fail.And then Angeline thought h of her sisters.Where were her darin g sisters doing now and where was Jennie Turner?W ere they missing her! In fact they were not, missing her for they didn't even know she was within the enemys lines believin g she was at a far distant part of the christian lines. From the window of the washroom Angeline looked down two streets of Abbieann.Occasionally she saw a long train of Glandelinian ambulances pass along, and at times lon g columns of Glandelinian infantry passing with colors flying, and drums beating gaily on their way to the front .

"Maybe we'll have to fight our way through those rebels to night."she thought as she turned away to avoid even the possibility to be seen.She was seen however but the Glandelinians thought she was a Glandelinian girlscout and did not do anything.

It was ten oclock in the morningwhen Adelefob called her and both went up to the roof of the house by the inside through the attic skylight, for they wouldn't dare to do it from the outside of the house.The boyscout had brought a pair of powerful field glasses with him,and through these he pointed out to Angeline the various roads leading tward the direction of the christian lines, especially to the north,, and east.... He advised her to keep the field glasses for they would help her through the enemys lines.It was a grand battle sight to Angeline...!

On all sides of her lay the ruins of what remained of many of the buildings of gone Abbieann hemmed in with fortifications, and swarming with soldiers in action like a gray ants at war around some gigantic ant hill.Here was a single division cut off from its comrades being slowly driven back, but there a brigade was moving to the rescue, and over yonder an entire ten divisional column adva advancing under cover of a terrific shell fire, with in the further distants christian tents and wagons innumerable all afire.How that happened no one could tell.From the fortifications great walls of smoke belnched forth from the many active a batteries, and through the smoke haze Angeline could dimly see the gunners as active as the very ants them selves, and the officers a parently seeming at that distance to do all sorts of antics.In one section of the great field of battle a long immensurable line or wave of christian troops in purple and yellow was moving forward against the enemy as if on drill the men rushing forward swiftly but in splendid order with fixed bayonets sparkling somewhat despite the strange reddish darkness overshadowing everything.

Angeline saw that huge wave for a moment and then it disappeared away in a cloud of smoke and there was an awful noise in that locality.

"Tough job for general Aronburg to get in e here eh!"said Adeldefob, brieftly/

Angeline drew in a long breath. "Indeed I don't say it really will be a tough job.What I say is do you really think general Aronburg can do it at all.I don't."

"If general Vivianannas's army comes down yes.If they don't--" the boy scout did not finish. "Com e down if you have seen enough."

"In a minute."

Angeline turned the field glass to the southwest." Our troops have their baloons up and one aroeplane."she cried."They are taking or trying to take obser vations."

"Those baloons makes the Glandelinians awfully mad."said Adald Adelefob with a laugh."Time and again they have tried to shoot them full of holes."

"There they go, they're hit"cried Angeline."

"They are!"

"Yes indeed."she said hurriedly and half frightened."Heaven help those men in the basket and even the aroeplane.It's hit too."

"Come"said the boy."That incident will bring many out to see the disaster, the roofs will be covered with the enemy soldiers here and some will see you and grow suspicious."

They went below again, and now the boyscout brought forth the faded Glandelinian College "Professor"hat he had promished Angeline as it had belonged to a enemy boyscout.It seemed a little bit too big for her but Adeledefob made it fit.It made Angeline feal queer to put it on.

"Seems like I was insulting my country."h she explained, at which her host smiled broadly.

"You'll get used to it.Now remember both of you, if you are asked any questions, that you belong to Compnay C, Second Infantry of the Omarian Corps, Brigadier general Glandeco commanding under general Francis Smith and that you are lookin g for your company somewhere down the Big Girl Knool Road and that you lost your regular army clothing during the battle which you rwl reallly did.That will carry you outside of Abbieann, and when you get near the pickett lines you must take care of yourself as seems best, even if you have to temporarily join them to make your escape.My advise however is don't move untill dark.It's impossible to escape during the light.During the battle the enemy guards are very watchful."

"Just what I was thin i thinking "answered Angaline,and repeated the name of the organization to which she was supposed to belong, that she might get it right. Soon after this she and her soldier companion were bidding their kind host, and hostess goodbye.They left the garden by a back gate, and Angaline with a heart that beat rapidly ,led the way as they hurried along the street to where one of the main thoroughfares led out of ruined Abbieann to the Big Girl Knool Road.At first she imagined that everybody of the soldiers they passed was looking at her and her companion and suspexting them, but this soon wore away, and they continued on with greater confidence.The enemy at the prison had sent word to go everywhere so every soldier within a and without the city should know by description the two escaped prisoners, but fortunately the report had not traveled as fast as expected, and all the enemy soldiers here did not know what Angaline and her companion were,and then therefore thought they were a girlscout and her soldier escort. She had no Glandelinian girlscout rifle but in her pocket was a small pistol whic h the boyscout had given her fullllly fully loaded .

Coming to the corner of the tno thorouthfare, the two paused for a moment,to avoid some soldiers thousands who were marching past.As they lingered,Angaline chanced to glance tward the rear and saw a boyscout coming tward her.At that distance though was unusally good looking he was nevertheless very tough looking, but as he came closer Angeline gave a gasp, and almost chocked herself to keep from cryin g out, and betrayin g herself and the scout// It was Radcliffe.He stopped before her almost at the point of showing fight for in her disguise he did not know Angaline, and also did not have the slightest suspicion that any of the Princesses were within the enemys lines.'

"I'm no Glandelinian girlscout I'm Angeline Vivian the Princess."she said.

"Oh yeah."he ojaculated scornfully."Well I'm your sister Jennie.Out of the way girl or I'll forget I'm a boy and get ro g rough.You scouts don't put that over on me.If you know who I am and dare to beyray me woll--"and he had a long dargger displayed as quick as a flash."This doesn't make no noise"he added.

"But Radcliffe I tell you I am Angaline Vivian.I was captured by the enemy and just escaped. "

Radcliffe gazed inquiringly at the a parent young girlscout in her tattered uniform.

"By Golly You are Angelins"he exclaimed."You are so disguised that it was at first impossible to recognize you.."

"Excuse me Radcliffe"said Angeline but I am in the greatest haste."and she spoke rapidly."Will you tell tell me how to get out of the enemy camps."

"I believe I c u could.But I have often gotten in and out myself under the greatest difficulties.How did you get in yourself, and with that soldier in l plain purple un iform coat and yellow trousers."

"We got in by the he p help of the enemy!"

"By the help of the enemy!"

"Yes indeed."

"Did you fool them or put something over!"

"No we recieved the help muc h against our resped respective wishes.We were taken.We're as you may call it escaped prisoners."

"Oh that's it is it."

"Do you believe"she continued"that our side may lose in this bloody contest!"

"I do---to my sorrow!"

"Is general Arlingtons army as big as they claim?"

"Not in the least.His officers claim he has the biggest Glandelinian army in the war so far, but I believe their claims are worthless.But its far bigger than general Aronburgs and it'll be a miracle if he whips general Arlington."

"He has been lauc launching awful big attacks against general Aronburgs army lately because me and my sisters discovered the cause of the Abbieann disaster

Angeline continued .

"The rascal.But it is just like alll Glandelinian generals.I have been praying that his army will be worsted.It is said the Glandelinian generals claim they could not lick our armies because they put too much against them.Wouldn't it be a joke if general Arlingtons army is licked.But since meeting you Princess, when I'd like if you will to do me a sort of favor.I am afraid I will never be able to enter the christian lines again unless I have a pass signed by any one of you Princesses.Therefore could you give me a pass.I have risked a gr at deal doing all this spying work within the enemys lines.".QA ZSSWEW

Angeline Vivian, mused f rv for a moment and ga gazed keenly at Radcliffe.(Biff) "This is--- er--er--er-- a rather unusual proceeding"she observed."Of course a stranger couldn't even get a pass from me by force and I'm awfully particular to whom I give one too..."But as you are well known and as you're a friend all right.

I understand you well-- since you are one of the best of the Child scout spies that is known and as I know really who you are too."She closed one eye suggestively.

"Yes I will make you out a pass, duly signed, and witnessed by my soldier friend here.I have come to hate these Glandelinians generals, in fact I can't help doing doing so and would like nothing better than to put a hole in their efforts.Since the discovery of the Abbieann disaster I and my sisters have been hotter than ever against them. I want to have you do something for me, with me.While this dreadful war is raging in horror and great magnificience everywhere throughout Calverinia and back and forth across Angelinia State, and up and down our Lovely Valleys of the Mic-Hollester Run, we you know are having the deadly little war of the spies too.Men and women alike have tried it on our side, and failed where we child spies haven't. I cannot sent my own child scouts I cannot spare them that's why I and my sisters wage out our endless conflict of ingenuity, of disguise, and subterfuge and cajolery, and stealth and daring.Many of our spies have fought the enemy by their spying work, every day, and every hour in the sure knowledge that to erris to die, even o horribly as you know how Glandelinians kill spies.We on our side hang spies, Glandelinian torture and murder them.On our side Radcliffe as we all know captured Glandelinian spies, men or women, if successful in their work or having caused disaster to our armies were hangal always at sunrise.And because every one of us have really seen at one time or another during this dreadful strife, a dying spy, an enemy jerking grotesquely at the end of a rope against a morning sky of red or gold, or gray with storm clouds we came to call the death we all have dreaded but escape escaped so far."The leg juggling dance."And the image of that dance goes with us everywhere.Do you think you could do this if I ask you to.If you agree, I'll make out you the pass."

Radcliffe did not hesitate in his answer.He himself remembered all the glamor and the real drama and the heroism of all of those unaturally brave, alert and impul sive men and women spies of the christian lines but none of them were successful while girlscouts, and girl and boy spies were always successful and none yet were ever captured and stayed captured if they were.One girl spy already he remembers whose name he wouldn't reveal had already served the christian cause for the war up so far as a spy in the very Glandelinian capitol and fountain head of all of Glandelinia's strategy.And who can dare give no credit to Angelinia Aronburg the most daring, most fierce and savage, and greatest ofallchristianspies.The story does not give record of all she does but once she entered the enemys lines disguised as a Glandelinian child slave being forced to decieve the very slaves with whome she was put to work on the fortifications,again disguised as a Glandelinian boyscout ,she actually got a commission commission of a girlscout troop in the enemy lines and secured considerable information for the christian lines.She also had discovered and exposed a perfectly made and most effective gunboat the enemy had constructed, and so saved the christian navy at Gertrude Angeline City from destruction.No Glandelinian spy ever dared to attempttes attempt anything like this.

Gertrude Angeline also once took advantage of her dashing and glorious beauty to try and captivate Glandelinian officers in Glandelinia city itself early in the war and won from them plenty of information helpful to Emperor Vivian.Who could really fancy the real courage,the breathless excitement, the qui quivering terror these devoted girl and boyscout spies when they played their unbelievable parts in this vast and tragig tragic drama of this dreadful war. But Radcliffe knew Violet and her sisters out did them allSo why should he refuse Angaline Vivian his best Princess friend.

Ther r There was the sound of horses hoofs,strange jungle of chain and spur and equipment.From an upstairs room of a single house in Abbieann, a house which had been on high ground and probably too low to suffer much from the shock of the big explosions, a boy and a very pretty girl looked down, and the girl none other than Angeline Vivian, former prisoner, giggled.Three strong looking troopers with an officer(maybe the highest king couldn't dress in uniform like he wore) had ridden up under some flood torn trees in front of the house.The soldiers carrying long gray ploed lances garnished with red yellow and purple pennons were none too surprising for the eyes of Radcliffe and the Princess.The two regarded them with scorn.The Glandelinian captian strode into the house aftervhe had dismounted his sabre banging at his heels, and the two children continued their pretended occupation before a sort of mirror.Within the structure were gathered in conference several solemn civilians or what appeared to be civ ilians and officers.Their cigarette smoke drifted acroass the room,through open windows and out into the smoky atmosphere outside.Outside under tall shattered trees longed eighteen men all gaunt and beared, and in the eyes of all was the same in definable strange look, men who would sucide before they'd let a coiled rope be around their necks.For these were dan e dangerous Glandelinian spies, scouts and couriers of the Glandelinian army which was striving to win the battle of Abbieann all awaiting duty.And any one who was called might return with information or might die a sucide within the christian lines or be a han n hangmans prey.In the smoke filled room below for a moment there was no sound except the strange rattle of of a military telegraphic instrument or even a typewriter. A tall high hatted landelinian detective of war slowly paced the hallway, with two pistols in his hand guarding the closed door of the tobacco reeking room.Then with abrupt steps another tall man came out of the room where the telegraphing w or telegraph ing was going on and after glancing about suspiciously entered the room.He was a smooth shaven man but his face resembled that of a bulldog.

"All right g n gentlemen."he said harshly.

The castian arose politely,the chiefof the Glandelinian Secret Service sat down in it after a salute salute,crossed one knee over the other, lit his pipe and starting smoking like a volcano.

Just a moment or two more comrz comrades."said the Major grimly."They are makin g out my report for the emperor.

Then the hallway door was g flung open, and another man entered, cloaked in gray, slouch hatted, darkly handsome, and as gracefully sin ister sinist er as an or opra devil about to betray what the Infernal Region really looks like.He shook hands with those he knew, bowed or saluted to others, flung aside his cloak with anuperb gesture, and then shook a or took a seat at the head of the table.He was the head of them all.

"All right everybody"he rasped."There's lots of diss dissatisfaction in general Arlingtons main headquarters, with my department of spies gentlemen. You all know it.Know this too;I'm not apolizing for my department, or for my self.It's the result of those infernal child scouts that are in general Aronburgs Christian army.My general has to know what is going on along the christian line but through him he can't. Those child scouts frustrate everything.No one can tell now what measure I am taking to find out how to stop those brats.It's dangerous my plan but it has to go through.Six of my spies have been killed l already whom I sent to try and watch the enemy.Well I'm sending two more to spy on those darn scouts.Knowing what christian child scouts are, that'll be more dangerous yet.I'm sending my best spies this time.That's all"

There ensued a brief uncomfortable pause, then all but colonel Hanson rose to take leave.When they had, fearing they'd come upstairs the two children hid themselves. The two children Angeline and Radcliffe were the greatest of all child spies.They possessed enough fearlessness and daring to overcome th e sense of danger, and yet found strange pleasure in situations involving great peril. They recieved their names"Guttersnipes" because they're as dan e dangerous as those reptiles.But they're clever, quick witted,, observant,and not fool hardy,and they do feel enough afraid to realize the consequence of detection, and therefore do their best to avoid detection. They knew what was up for they had heard an enemy general say-

"Jim when you sentout spies are are seven Vivian Girl Princesses,, and four chief girlscout leaders,and boys too you must be aware of.The worst is so far Angelinia Aronburg,general Aronburgs chief scout, she calls him her uncle when in reality he's no relation at all,There's Jennie Turner, and the very devils are afraid of her little as she is.There's Angelinia Francis Richee,Em eror Emperor vivians chief scout, and who does devils work for him. Watch out for them, for no one knows in what army they'll be.They a pear in various christian armies and ourocwn out own too like ghosts,and disappear the same."

When they ca e came out of the building Angeline Handed Radcliffe an envelope.

"There Rad,take that.You will be easily able to get into our lines again.But I myself do not wish to go to the christian lines u just now as I need to get some information if possible and I need your help.Stick with me untill I accomplish my purpos purpose and we'll go together."

They continued on through the street s of the city but you must know that even though only a high part of Abbicenn city was left intact from the ravages of the flood it itself, that"small section"left was New York and Chicago size com bined and to get out of such a large place would indeed be a difficulty.They had been stopped three times, but Angeline's answers in each instance had enabled them to proceed without trouble, and the fact that Radcliffe was with her made it easier for he had so fooled the enemy that they really did think he was a Glandelinian boyscout of the highest order. One Glandelinian officer gave An e Angeline minute directions as to the whereabouts of her "company,and for this Jennie thanked him profusely, but Radcliffe inwardly shivered for fear the fellow might chance know many of those "Omarians of Company B. and ask them concerning a girlscout known as Jane Marie.Angeline reckoned that she was many hours to be getting out of this now dangerous city to her filled with millions of the enemy, and that in surviving parts of the city there would be enemy encampments and even picket-lines.She and her two companions had just passed a small en- campment of glandelinians on Abbicenn Square(park) who were breaking up to march t the battle front ..She also though the other two didn't just then heard the thunder of cavarly down the street and stopped behind a tall big tree a little to the edge of a e damaged street to let them p ass by.They soon came into view, and she recognized the fierce and swift horsemen of the enemy, seen in various Glandelinian armies"The Irrestible Whe lers".

"General Andrews Troopers."sh e muttered as she warned the two others to keep strictly hidden.The cavarly took some time to pass there were so many troopers,then she and her two companions resumed her journey,but with greater caution, feeling that she must for a lon g time go into hiding untill night fall.A short truce brought them to the top of a high gently sloping rise in the city.Here it appeare d like the high hilly spots of San Franc isco city in California.From this she and her friends made out Glandelinian troops to her right and left in the lower streets going to the battle front, while the wide street ahead the very one they were on, was as alive with them as two dead horses would be alive with flies.

"That settles it."she said.

"I understand"declared Radcliffe.We can't go much further in this direction.It's dangerous."

"Let's strike out through this ally.It's difficult traveling because of wreckage but no one is there."

Leaving the wide street, they persued a course in the center of the risin ground thus avoiding the the main streets.A few minutes of cautious walking, and Angeline Vivian suddenly stood still.A riderless horse was coming slowly toward her, walking slowly and painfully.The animal was bleedin g from a bullet wound in the foreleg.As the beast gradually came closer Angeline recognized it.It was the horse belonging to Adeldedefoh..

"Beau"burst from the lips of the youn g Princess."Whom old girl.There is your master.?"

Adel Radcliffe looked worried, and the soldier cap ared aghast.At this question of An e Angeline Beau halted and looked at Angeline as though she would like very much to talk.The beast quivered with pain from the bullet wound, and the Princess stroked her affectionately.

"Been in a bad scrimmage,I'll bet"The Princess went on."Was Adeledefoh killed!Oh I sic sincerely trust not."And something like a lump came u up into her throat. Beau whinnied and shook her mane vigoriously.Then she turned, as if you lead the three down a narrow half wreck strewn alley branching off from the main street.At once Angeline uhd understood, and heeding to the others she followed the animal. Scarcely three hundred and fifty feet had been passed down the alley when Angeline heard the murmur of voices coming from a small side street behind or near a wrecked house.As the three drew closer they recognized Adeledefohs voice.

"Let me alone Johns or it will be the worse for you."the young apparent Glande linian boyscout was saying."You are a wicked foriegner, not even a Glandelinian soldier despite your uniform, you are a thief I know but you shall not rob me."

"We are three to one boyscout."came from the one called Johns."And I have not forgotten how you interfered with me and my partners up near Jane Run.I intend to have my revenge and I'll get it. "

"The kid has a mighty fine watch"put in another."It ought to be worth thirty or fourty dollars or more."

"You wounded my horse and made him run away."went on Adeledefoh."I ought to shoot you both for that."

"You Glandelinian boyscouts can't frighten us."chuckled Johns."You're nothing like the child scouts of the dangerous Christians.I wouldn't dare tackle them but you're nothing.And besides we know your pistols are not loaded either.And if you try to draw that sabre."H Johns finished by suggestively tappi nghis own pistol.

An instant later however there came a curse and savage howl from the second man who had come close to Adeldefoh with the intention of searching him.The young boy scout had whipped out his sabre,, and had driven the point through the fleshy part of his side mortallywounding the bandit.

"Back you bandits ,I say."Cried Adeldefoh as he stood a stand near a wall."I'l holler to the soldiers for help."

Wild with rage Jos Johns drew a long pistol from his belt.

"I'll fix you you little Glandelinian devil"he fairly hissed, and aimed the weapon at the boys head.Before however he could pull the trigger whic h really was his intention,there came a sharp crack from behind a wrecked telephone pole and the pistol fell to the ground, while Johns was shot through the chest leaving on y one man to meet with.

Then An e Angeline and her two companions appeared.

"The Princess, An e Angeline."Burst from Adeldefohs lips."Was it you who shot him."

" It was accurate, and I'll shoot the other bandit if he attacks.Rascals like these in our own o holy country is a disgrace.They're a disr disgrace to even the Glandelinians.Up with your hands sir." For the man had made a motion toward his belt. Angelines pistol was now on a level with the mans head,her eyes shone with cool determination---and the hands went up as requested.For the scoundrel recognize her also and knew she was dangerous.

"This ain't fair nor square, you comin in this city and spying on the Glande linians and shooting my comrade down."Said the man." Put that gun down it might go un."and he endeavored to get out of range.

"Stand still sir"commanded Angeline with a dangerous flash in her eyes"Or my pistol will go off, and your wounded companions can testify to what sort of a crack shot I am.And it's none of your business what I'm doing here.Adoldefoh take the pistols from those bandits."

"You young girl villian,if ever I get a chance---""

"Not a word out of you sir."

Adoldefoh picked up the pistols.Then he asked;

"What brought you here Princess.I thought you were gone and--and--"

""I'll explain later.At present ---hi there mr Man, stop."

But the bandit was not stopping just then.Watching his chance he had leaped for the shelter of the nearest bu wrecked houses.Now he went tearin g alon g at tearing along at breakneck speed.Angeline didn't dare follow him as he would only cause a persuit upon her.

"The bandit is gone"she announced.

Angeline and Adoldefoh shook hands.

"I owe you one for this"said the boy scout with a warm smile."If you hand't appeared there is no tellin g what those three bandits would have done to me." r Perhaps they might have killed me and pitched me into the smouldering ruins of that house over there"And he shuddered at the thought.

"It was Bess who brought me here."answered Angeline, and she patted the animal affectionately."But why are you out here alone."

"I am supposed to be carrying a message to general Hanlon to general Arlington but I am taking it to the christian lines, and I reckon I got on the wrong road.
But what have you got to say for yourself.I thought you were gone a lon g time ago since I showed you the how and where of the city."

"I was trying to learn something of the enemy."

"Don't you know you are still in the most dangerous territory."?And Adoldefoh looked deeply concerned.

"Sure indeed, and I know that only too well.I suppose I'll have no easy time of it running the picket lines."

"Hang me if I don't wish I could f could he help you through, An oline Angeline.I know it's awfullyy dangerous but blood is thicker than water you any and such a friendship of ours."--"

"Can't be shattered by the bullets and shells of this war"finished An eline Angeline."I thrust not Adoldefoh.Come what may I shall always look upon you as a brother.How is Mildred Manning and Angelinin Aronburg.Heard anything lately."

"Angelinin Aronburg is quite well again, but Mildred is far from recovery yet.
Penrod sents me a letter very week and last week he wanted to know if he could get a letter through to you, or any of your sisters.The situation near Big Girlhood is very grave."

"We' ll be going there soon.However remember us to Penrod and his c followers and t ll him we're doing nicely in spite of this big fight and bad forest fire weather.If you, see---Hark some soldiers are coming.They must be the Glandelinians, therefore they must not redorecognize me with you or they'll be suspicious of you too.I must be goin g.Good by, Adoldefoh, and may we meet again soon."

"Good bye princess.Oh If I could only see you and your c ompanions safe in the christian lines.Yes you must hurry, for thousands of soldiers are comin on the double quick.Hark there are rifle shots.They must be after more escapin g prisoners over to the left."

"If that is so we'll have to make ourselves scarce ,Adoldefoh.Good bye."and with a fervent hand clasp the two chums parted, not to meet again untill the most orable and most bloody battle at Big Girl Knool.

As they continued on, neither of them spoke.Angeline moved on lightly ,gracefully.A little further off to do some scouting down the street Radcliffe moved across the .Still on the hill part he then turned to the left and glanced out over the scene of wrecked scenery before him.Haze softened the distant hills to a delicat e purple-the great Abbicann river gleamed below.On the highest portion of the city to the left a standard was flying lazily over what was believed to be general Arlingtons headquarters.The apparent boy stood unquietly looking out over the valley below to the onstward.There the flood still remained a huge shining riv ecn but further off he could hear the roar of battle where th e huge christian army was in action, but perplexed, uj undecided and still badly shocked from the crash of the great battle of the day before, where t o ten million Angelinian soldiers lay dead among twelve million Glandelinians also dead in the lovely and fabal valley of Abbicann.As he stood there two rebel boyscouts were seen comin e ening along and he hid himself.

"Nice view of the city"said the first one, drawing bridle.

"Yes, but I want to ask you something.Hienie; you know a christian dog girl when you see one despite her disguise ? "

"I reckon I sure do."

"And boyfriend you can always tell, no matter how disguised they are!"

"I certainly do."

"How much danger is there in meddling with these christian child scouts.Enough to take the courage out of the bravest of us !"

"I reckon not Ja ke."

"Are they as dangerous as they say they are."?

"I don't exaggerate but they'll better to be left alone."

They turned and proceeded tward some half repaired houses where were lodged what was known as the Glandelinian Secret Service, Jake walking with one hand on his pistol butt.Keeping himself hidden Radcliffe followed to the consternation of Angeline who wanted him to come back. The two boyscouts drew up before the building.

"General Mongovon sent for me."remakr remarked the other."I heard there's a Vivian Girl Princess who has escaped."

"He sent for me too."said Jake.

They found general Arlingtons chief chiper operator talking in the house to Colonel Henry Arentor, Arlingtons chief of Glande inian spies and spy catchers.

"Heinie"said the colonel, did you get through to the christian lines?"

"I did sir(saluting).The christians to day are dangerous sir."

"Any record of a princess Angeline or Evangeline Vivian getting back there."

"Her sisters werethere sir but she's not there."

"Did you get her description?"

"Yes sir.I reckon she's the same guttersnipe that's spying on us somewhere even now.That's what she'll likely do now since she is loose anyway.."

"Are all her papers you captured in order?"

"Y es sir."

"Then you are satisfied that she's escaped."?

"No"drawled the spy.

"Why not?""asked the con colonel sharply.

"I know it sir.She's loose in the city somewhere.I've sent some of my boyscout s to try and locate her and have her shadowed.And that soldier with her too."

"Well then have her watched closely.There's too muc h talk going on in its this camp and throughout the city.The very dirty little child slaves brought here to work in repairing some of these buildin s buildings for us are discussing secret orders from us and havin g the christians hear of them but we can't detec t them.Any body here now can pick up enough loose gossip even to damage this army and damn the Glandelinian nation to perdition." Then to J ake;

"Did you learn anything about those two strange boyscouts, called Adoldefoh, and Radcliffe that often is known to work in one army after another."

"They don't seem to do anything wd we can detect sir."

"Do they gossip any.?"

"No."

"Do they know anything."?

"Yes.They believe that some of your generals are goin g to raid the christian camps to night."

The Major said angrily to the colonel;

"I told you how it is with these damned christian boy and girlscouts.How do you keep your own camp clear of christian spies."

"Put them to death."replied the colonel tersely."Arlin gtons orders."

"The Colonels right.You two spies if you hear a word out of these two look thes up.And you Jake find that Vivian Girl.I've sent for the girlscout of ours Jane Lenesson to turn her loose on that An eline Vivian.she's in Abbicann yet with her soldier friend.Find her and fetch her to me.She's a spy, and those soldiers who first captured her yesterday did not even know who she is ."

Angeline herself had been while waiting for Radcliffe to return had been hiding but hearing officers state about taking two batteries of a hundred guns apiece and mass them tward the center.She also heard something about a general Blackheart about getting the christians away from the North Bend of Abbicann river.

Soon Radcliffe came back.She told what she had overheard.Radcliffe looked at her pale and startled.Then his stiff scared face relaxed and cleared, because to him it seemed impossible that this pretty Princess could know about a flying battery of Glandelinian or horse artillery and the like and hundreds of thousands of reckless horsemen destined to terrify half a world.As she was standing watching she felt a heavier touch on e her shoulder and turned slowly to turn to meet the sombre gaze of a well armed Glandelinian orderly on oborseback, and with him w re were ten wheeler cavarly men all Scoodilers.The orderly also was a Scoodiler.

"One moment girlscout."he said.

There was a ghostly silence.

"What is it you wishsir?"she managed to ask him.

"The provish marshall wishes a word with you.You are to follow us."

Angeline s ightly paled, but she lifted her head calmly.

"Will you lead the way?"she murmured.

The soldier friend of hers looked after her dumbfounded as she roved away with the Glandelinian. Could we send officers out to arrest Princess Vivian and stop looking, the scene grimly.

Radcliffe said to the soldier;
"There are hiding places behind you.Go and hide there."
He looked up stupidly, and then s he obeyed Radcliffe following!
"What has happened to Angeline!" he asked.
"I'm afraid she has been recaptured.They have her in the provost house.Four boy-boyscouts of the enemy who believe they recognize h r are there to question her.Somebody it is said must have discovered evidence against her in s in or in s her features if not her actions.I don't know what the evidence may be, but there's a military court sitting drumhead now.You had better try to get away sir."
"You better go yourself lad."
"If I go it will look bad for her."
"If you stay they will hang you too,and that won't help her.Have you a horse hidden sir."
"Yes."
"Then get back to general Vivians army far away if possible or go to General Aronburgs and tell him what Angeline overheard.For God's sake hurry."
"Are you involved in any suspicion Radcliffe!"
"Not that I know of."
"You dare to remain here to take your chances. "
"Yes."
The man strode forward.
"Let's go together.I'll see you through with me if you say so."He whispered.
"No.I won't and can't desert the Princess.I must find a way to outwit those devils."
Radcliffe turned "him"back on the soldier therefore and walked away down one of the streets,hurrying as soon as some of the ruins concealed her or him breathless and anxious to where a bunch of Glandelinian girlscouts were doing some of their own work.
"Where have you been!"asked a girl scout who was nicknamed Bob for she was a tomboy.
The girl scout was suspicious.
Radcliffe giggled.
"Trying to work in with some of those christian girlscouts to try and get the credit of capturing them yourself."sniffed "Bob".Colonel Slipper has been asking for you."
Radcliffes heart stood still.
"What does he want "Bob"!"he managed to ask lightly.
"Cannot say exactly"declared Bob ominously"You got to go to the house where there is a court marshall going on.They want to see you over there too!"
"Who me!"Radcliffe asked saucilly but with a feeling of coming death in is in his heart.
"Yes indeed you are the one."They believe you know all about what is going on in this camp about christian spies."
"What do you mean christian spies, Bob!"
"Well one escaped and is retaken.You were with her when she was.They're going to shoot or hang her if the evidence is against her.And Colonel Slipper, he said---"
"All right"said Slippers voice from the darkness again caused by forest fire smoke.He came up, took Radcliffe by his arm, but not unpently.Clear the tent Bob.Clear out every body.I want to talk to Radcliffe---and alone."
He led Radcliffe into the tent, dropped the flap, lifted a bright lantren and took his hand turning it over so that he could examine the finger nails, for it was strange to say it, but christians could be told by their fingernails.Christian finger nails were much whiter than those of Glandelinians,and too they could tell another thing.Glandelinians don't keep their finger nails clean, and the Abbiennians do. The Glandelinians kept their dirty on purpose so they could tell who is who.But Radcliffe knew their way and his finger nails were the dirtiest ever seen and never trimmed properly and neither where they as white as they should be.Well then the officer thought"he's no christian dog.
"We are have you been since the spy and Princess was captured.
"I've been over here where you found me."
"Well listen to me Radcliffe"he said,"They've caught a Princess of the christian dogs known as Angelinia Vivian.There's no mistaken identification about it.She's the dangerous sister of the Vivian Girl Princesses, and the originator of those boy and girlscouts.Do you know her."
"Yes I do .I know them all."
"I know you do.You were seen speakin g with her several times to day and so was Adolfoh.Besides she admits it.Now Radcliffe how did you come to know those Princesses!"
"I became acquainted with them on many occasions when your officers sent me into the christian lines to do spying duty."
"That she denies.When did you leave them?"
"When I had to come back to the Glandelinian camps."
"Did they ever attract you any despite the fact they're enemies!"
"Yes.I couldn't help it.They're so pretty."

We I you were sure to tell the truth.That is what she says also.Besides I'm certain that you are of our side after all.I'm sure you're what you show you are.But you're being with her to day brought you under suspicion.The gentlemen(what do you mean gentlemen) of the military court has a great desire to see you.Come with me and don't be frightened.They only want to find out what you know of her and her sisters."
They walked together across the st reet.Radcliffe was somewhat faint with grief and fear but pretending on it s he asked;
"The head of the court marshall won't scold me will he Colonel Slipper."
"He isn't there."
"Are they going to suspect me as a spy of those Christians."
"No indeed, but this is a dreadful thing, that this Princess of the christians has tried to do to us.Betray our secret movements to the christians on the very moment----he checked himself with an oath.
"Radcliffe pretended to whisper.
"I hope they don't kill her."
"Why not!She's a devil of the christians.She and her sisters have been in the camps of other armies many times before, though this is only one s here.We've got her.But why do you not want her to be killed."
"If she is the armies will recieve no quarter.Emperor Vivian their father is danger ous and many of our scouts too are prisoners in i his army.They'll be hard up if she is killed for they say he's as merciless as the devil to us."
The clustered elctric lights in the great hall dazzled Radcliffe as they entered the house where the c ourt marshall was going on.Sentries on guard hold them, then they went into a well lit room where six officers sa sat at a table, and Angeline was sitting on a chair between two strong armed guards.She sat up straight or when Radcliffe came into the room.
"Well sir"demanded the major in charge, very quietly.
"Colonel Slipper, at attention said;
"This boy(indicating)raRadcliffe) is a real scout of our side, and is perfectly truthful sir."
The officers decided to examine him,and he was formally called and sworn.
A captian of cavarly said to the boy;
"You recognize this girlscout!"
"Partly yes. But she's in the uniform of "our side"."
" Pre presi recisely.She is the Princess of Emperor Hanson Vivian.!"
"I couldn't tell sir. It was said he had no children. If she is his daughter than he concealed something.Emperor Robert Vivian has seven daughters but surely you don't sir try to tell me she is one of them.I know the Vivian Girls, but who in s hec k
i s she."
He turned to an officer of horse artillery, who shook his head and said;
"I do not wish to question the boyscout."I never believed in the first place that he really could recognize Hansons daughter.As we are humane Glandelinians in one sense of the word we I suppose cannot condemn her to death.But we'll hold her and not let her goluntill general Aronburg moves off from this territory.He's responsible for the Princesses and he'll do that to get her back."To Radcliffe;
"That is all.You may go."
Rade iffe looked at An e Angeline, who looked steadily back at him.
"Then pretending to be offended he said;
"I had begun to like you girlscout---only you turned out a christian and a spy."
"I love you stillwhether you're a Glandelinian or not""said Angeline."but be careful you don't get caught within the christian lines.They're more dangerous than those here."
"I hope nevertheless that you'll not come to a death penalty."faltered Radcliffe.
"Nothing can really harm the soul."said Angeline.
"What soul!"" demanded Radcliffe pretendin g to be ignorant.
So on they acted the last scene, and parted, the ruling passion strong in death and both of them perfect in their art, even in the shadow of deaths descending curtain.
Sometime later Radl Radcliffe heard a noise of spurs and sabres.The "Gentlemen of the drum head Glandelinian court marh marshall were returning.An eg,ine appeared between six troopers with drawn sabres and she moved with all the strange dreamy acquiescence of one prepared for death.Radcliffe's legs trembled.
"Are they going to hang her after all."he whispered to a Glandelinian soldier.
"Yes.They don't believe she's a prince ess but one personating her to spy."
"Now!"
"To morrow morning.They are taking her to the provost guardhouse tent.Shall I walk a little ways with you. "
"If you so desire."
They moved slowly and in silence across the street.No lights were seen anywhere sentries walked their posts.
"Is she in that tent!"asked Radcliffe.
Before the officer could relpy a hissin hissing rush and a glare of light dazzl d them as a large "star sh ll" soared skyward from the river beyond. Another more blinded them, another and another, an ster shell after starshell swished

w ard, and then came a roar of so many rifleshots that no one could tell what was up followed by an earth shakin g cannonade.Instant y their ears were deafened by a perfect hell of firing, added by t rumpet and bu l bugle blasts, shoutin of offic ers rushing out of tents.Torches blazed up, everywhere men of the cavarly were hastily saddling up, pulling their mounts into line, infantry were rushin past as fast as men could trot and volley after volley apparently miles lon g roared and rattled out alon gthe river.An officer of high rank riding up called out to a c olonel riding past Radcliffe-

"Christian infantry attacking in general massive force near Abbicann.Our army has by this time given way at many points.Christian dogs are winning."

In the most frightful racket and confusion, and noise of battle, amid darkness and fitful torchlight,Radcliffe ran crouching tward the big provist tent in the park.Under his single trousers, strapped to his naked leg, was a long razor edged knife in a velvet sheath.He threw himself flat on the dry parched grass,felt for it, and reachin g out, slit the tent wall swiftly,and without a sound.So keen wasxthe knifes edge, so silently did he accomplish it,that Angeline lying or sittin g up in the tent corner neither saw nor heard her, nor did the armed sentires, cranin g their necks out the open flap to grat stare at the c ountless rifle flashes alon g the river below.It was only when Radcliffe entered the tent by the cut u opening and shook Angeline, that she took advantage of the opportunity, and the next instant she and Radcliffe were out of the tent, and off in darkness down the hill street.

As they passed by they saw one of the c hief generals rush up on chorscback and say to another coming up-

"General Windernine had broken through our lines with the help of Nemo and will soon capture the city.Sir I give you twenty minutes to throw them out and across the river.

In the darkened quarters of the city Radcliffe and An e Angeline lay behind a stone in a dark ally.Sometimes she shivered, and sometimes she quivered with queer joy in the dreadful game so saftly ended so far.Close to their hidin g laplace Close to their hiding place immense bodies of troops went on their way down the hilly streets laughing, jokin ,g and braggin g that they had twenty minutes in which to chase the christian cavarly out of the position they had gained, and that ten minutes would be quite enough.As the Glandelinian general had said it,the sounds of such heavy firing had come from the left of the stream and unusally close to t he the city.Angeline and her companion o however could not see the battle in the city even up on the hill for the conflict though heard was too far away.Leaving their ally hiding place,Angeline and Radc liffe c ame on or kept on untill she reckoned she was about midway between C enter and St Anns Street, although still to the south of the noise of the battle . She then seeing no Glandelinians around slowed upand proceeded through another alley but with great caution, his her pistol whic h had not been taken from her c ~~ttt~~adcocked and ready for instant use.Les s than a hundred feet had been do covered in this fashion, when they reac hed another open square of the city.The firing though still far distant vwas so loud and vigorous as to seem to be close at hand, and presently from around a corner of one of the streets came.suddenly into sight a large number of Glandelinian cavarly on the hasty march for the front followed by twice their number of men on foot.

In the meantime the man who had accompanied Violet : as a prisoner had succeeded in reaching the christian lines.The man was c onductnd to the rear, where he had to give a strict account of himself to the general in charge of the division in activity against the near near the Dencenis woods.This of course was done in order to be sure beyond all doubts that he was not a Glandelinian spy.He was informed where his own regiment was located, nearly two miles away, and a sergeant was detailed to conduct him there,and learn if his story was true.

"George.We have given you up for lost.Where's the Princess."cired one of his comrades,when he appeared and the soldier was soon surrounded by many of his friends and comrades.He lost no time in reporting to his commander.When his commander learned that the soldier had really been in Abbicann with the Princess and had gotten away with information she had learned, he sent word to headquarters to that effect. Only half an o hour later came an important order for George.It was from general Con- continian Aronburg to the effect that he should present himself at the headquarters of the ~~commander-in-chief~~ commander-in-chief.

George's heart indeed(you are in need) gave a great bound.He was to visit the great christian commander in chief of the christian armies.He had often seen general Concentinian ~~Aronburg~~ Aronburg before, for the general was unusally popular with all his men and officers,and loved always to roam among them and play games with even the privates,but George had never had yet the chance e of speaking with so good and distinguished an officer. The day bec ause of the violent battle, was a very noisy one,through the great camp as George walked from the quarters of his own regiment, a a distance of nearly three miles, to where general Aronburg had stationed himself and his staff.

The troops along this part had not yet recovered from the shoc k experienced in the fearful conflict of the day before, a and while waiting for the call to go again to the front lay resting, here, there and everywhere, although the picket line was ever on the alert.For this occassion George had donned a real new uniform, every s particular button of which it shone its brightest/.He had more over the day before had his hair trimmed by a soldier or army barber, and although he did pr esent a prepossing prepossessing appearance as he came up, saluted, and told the orderly the object of his mission.General Aronburg was just then bust bu sy dictating reports to his secertary about the progress of the battle, and giving orders to several of his highest officers, and George had to wait over an hour and a quarter before he was admitted to the presence of the commander . Finally he was told to enter, and when e he did so, general Concentinian Aronburg recieved him with a kindly smile.

"Private George, my friend, general Nemo reported to me,that you with one of the "darlings of the Nation"were taken prisoner by the Glandelinians---caried carried off to Abbicann, and that after you escaped you had a very fair chance to get a view of the enemys pso position before you escaped with her, and got back into camp.Is tha t true!"

"No sir.It was Angeline Vivian who got the works down and she gave the plans to me.I did not have much of a chance to look around, but she herself did, and she re a re mains in th city to learn more details of the enemy.I'm worried about her."

"I'm not"said the general.

"Not worried about her, the best of the children we've got!"

"Why should I.?It's the enemy that 'll worry.They'll never take her again.Did she take note of any of the enemy fortifications, or the number and disposition of their troops."!

"She took note of all she possibly could sir---feeling that it was knowl dge worth while for our side."answered George with pardonable pride for her.

"Tell me your story of how she accomplished it.But please be brief for wit h this battl battle raging I'm busy to day,and should also be out there watching the movements of the troops.Never mind how you were capt ured or who took you to Abbicann with her."

"I'll tell you all I know in as few words as I can sir."and being motioned to a comm chair,George relaited how she and he and the others had been imprisoned in the soap making establishment, how Angeline and he had escaped, and how she had given im him the plans telling him to get to the christian lines, and of her doings at where Adeldefob and Radcliffe were.At the mention of the names of the b two spies general Aronburg elevated his eyebrows for an instant, but did not otherwise betray his surprise/.

"Here's the p; plan which she has dra n drawn of the enemys fortificat ions as she took them when she was on top of that high house."The soldier went on, and drew a roll of yellow paper from his pocket."You can see she is an unusally good artist sir.Those mak marks and round things represent woods, and those lines of dots are Glandelinian soldiers.All those long lines of little bars on the enemy works and fortifications are batteries ."

"Hum".General Aronburg spread the paper out on his camp table and glanced over it earnestly.

"Those strange lines and shapes resembles I suppose the surburbs of the city of Abbicann, and this stretch of something means what is left of the flood south of the city!"

"Yes sir. That oblong shape represents the remains of the Railway station of the Mic-Hollester and Pandor Pandora lines, and that is the Big Girl Knool Road.That fortific ation is near Abbicannville bridge, diredt directly in front of these head- quarters."

"And what is that"And the great christian general indicated what he meant on the mapwith the point of a e pencil.

"That is a long line of fortifications commanding the Abbicann River to the northwest of the city.I heard that general Arlington used to stay hthere before the battle started two days ago,and I also h ard heard the Glandelinians have a large munition camp there.And sir I heard that general Arlington is severely wounded and that general Francis Smith will take his place, and the Glandelinian generals think that general Myletze if he can get past Vivianna will come down to Abbicann from the south and reinforce general Smith . !?!."

At this general Concentinian Aron ur Aronburg smiled again.

"You have had your ears and eyes wide open for one of your age, in chelping the Princess"he said."This map willsure prove of value, and it has brought me some thing better than what even our regular spies have already furnished us with."He looked at the paper again,and continued to ask questions all of us which George answered as well as he was able, and told how Angeline had outwitted the enemy since he was there with her.."."""

In twenty minutes the interview was over.

"One thing my friend, I desire to give you caution about," were the great generals final words. "Do not say anything anywhere even within t he c hristian lines about Adeldefoh, or Radcliffe, nor Angeline Vivian either. Do not say anything to her sisters either for they know where she is and only hopes she succ ceds. The word you know may get back to Abbieann and cause the three who be friended you muc h trouble."

"I will rem a remember general."

"For a nice young man of your age you have done remarkably well in escorting the Princess to safty when she and you escaped. Kee on as you have started, and she and her sisters will come near future day see to it you'll be also wearing a generals shoulder st raps." and the general bowed pleasantly, while George saluted in is best in his best manner and walked out. The cordial reception had made George the great generals best friend for life (get you a wife) It must not be imagined that George was really worried about Angeline Vivian. His first words in getting into camp had been conc erning the princess. Nothing had been heard of the Princess. As a matter of fac t as other parts of the story will show, it was better for the enemy if they had not in the first place d captured Angeline at all, and it was on one occassion by good luc k to him that general Arlington was not shot and killed.

George recieved an ovat ion whi when he returned t t to the ran ks of his own Regiment.

"I'll bet he was sure dining with general Aronburg and the Princesses" said Colonel allings. "orge what did you have, qual on toast or stuffed turkey or d chicken? Did he treat to Havana c igars or Angelinia Agathia stogies?"

"I'll bet the general called him a bully boy" put in one of the soldiers. "And that is what he is---the best soldier boy in camp hey??!""""and he slapped George so heartily a c upon the back that the young soldier had the breath kn c knoc ked out of him. Jerry Rowe said nothing just then, but stood by lookingas pleased as he was.

In the meantime that late morning as soon as she could, Angeline still at large in Abbieann wrote a long letter to her own folks at home, and with this sent a plan by hand of the Geminie there to general Aronburg.

"There I hope that makes everything right" she said to herself, as she dropped the communication into the mess ing or trouser pocket. She was very happy to realize she had not both Adeldefoh and Radcliffe, but her happiness was c ut short when word was heard half an our hour later when news c ame by courier that a number of christian men couriers and spies had been cau t captured and some mail matter found in their possession were found and destroyed. This news made Angelines heart sink like a lump of lead in e her bosom. Then simultaneously with that news there was a slight c ommotion in the city. Being c autious enough so she would not be seen Angeline went to the spot to see them for some Foriegners it was said had been captured. To her sur r surprise one of the men who through c owardice had once deserted her and her sisters were amongst them. Both were wounded though slightly. They were immediately shot. In the meantime during the progress of the battle the c ommands on both sides had been strengthened so far as such a c ourse during battle was possible, and again general Aronburg sent out his call for reinforc ements.

Heaven knows how he gets here from general Manleys army a hundred and fifty miles away at Big Girlknool, but Gerald Starring was h ere here. According to all christian boy and girlscouts and generals too he was a bad and dan e dangerous boy scout but he was a good youn g lad to gaze upon, even in his careless attire as a Vagabound boy.

He came along sauntering down the street from general Arlingtons headquarters under the overhanging ruins of buildings. Even guilaless gaisty made even more apparent innocence in his smallboyish suntanned face. But his secret young mind even for his age was dark with deadly even almost wicked thoughts, for he was even mediation medidating stealthy and slick schemes, as he strolled along, looking carefully at every child slave especially of the girls and others he met and even watching carefully so carefully Glandelinian girlscouts that they wondered what was the matter with him. Geralds Starrings clever brain was busy indeed with most dangerous designs because a chiper dis a dispatch from his friend Fredrick Darger, General Manleys chief boyscout in his army at Big Girlknool, had just come in, warning all the highest leaders of the very Glandelinian Secret Serl Service in general Arlingtons army that somewhere either within the lines or in the city an escaped Vivian Girl Princess was at large and was even takin g advantage of her escap escape by spying round. Whic h information indeed made it grimly nex necessary ti to identify, catch, and hang that girl Princess lest general Arlo Arlington go to utter ruin in this lon g and bloody battle of Abbieann with nearly fifty million Glandelinian soldiers.

H e now came in sight of Dargers place, a three storied half wrecked but solid house nevertheless, but at points almost smothered in wreckage from other places borne against it by the receddin floods.

Near the house sat a strange ragged girl. He saw her, then suddenly as before and always to his surprise and chagrin he experienc ed that same odd reathless excitement at sight of the little girl, felt the same fearsome throbbing trouble in his heart, and a swift heat in his boyish cheeks, at the mere nearness of his little strange tanned skinned young ragged girl. He thought shere sure he had se n her at intervals, and this had happened to him from the very first sight he had had f Violet, and her sisters, themselves themselves, had even increased in violence, his sudden fearsome awareness of them, and now of this one, he could almost swear to t that he had seen her before for he almost recognized her by or despite her lovely ale brown features her strange velvet fringed eyes, and the c ender grace of her war arm breathing little body.

That such a little "Glandelinian girl" ragamuffin" could have the same emotional effect upon him that the Vivian Girls had caused, seemed incredible. He was highly fearsome, suspicious, and dreaded her. Annoyed, perplexed, ashamed he would not even dmit it to himself, and yet it here was here happening to him again--the swift flush ainfully warm on his face, and the same trouble with heart n and pulses. He was despite any fact he might try and capture them, afraid of the Vivian Girls, deadly euthly as afraid of them.

"Morning Mast r Starring." she drawled in e her sweet childish treble. "Seen anyt n b anything of the Vivian Girl?"

"Good morning Jane. No I haveh have not." he replied with forced carelessness. Are Schloders boyscouts at home?"

"No Master Starring but I reckon your friend Fredrick Darger is. He's a expec ting ou. He says you are late."

"who told him I am late?"

"He told me that himself."

"He glanced down unwillingly into her little upturned face. The girlscout was so lightly brown---scarcely darker than a tanned person---so daintly made and so unaturally pretty, that now he saw her again his suspicions were reviving, for he felt sure she was the hunted one in disguise though there seemed to be no evidence to prove it.

"How are your ways with my boy anf girlscouts going on?" he inquired with dry humor yet oddly unquiet.

The girl giggled.

"You better keep away from the scouts." he added harsly. "They don't want nothing to do with beggar girls. They're too busy."

"But they're always pestering me." she laughed. "You did kiss one of those Vivian Girls yourself once, at Cedernine. I saw you." he she added.

"I did he said reddening" but I had a great reason."

"What reason Master Starring!" she kept on busily al playing with some of the boards she had brought out from a wrecked house. "Well I wanted to look at her face for one thing, so I could recognize her. And it's lucky indeed you are not one of them, though to me you look it."

She laughed.

"You almost have the suspicious I'm Violet coming into your camps to spy Master Starring. Why who is Violet?"

"I wanted to be sure." Starring admitted sulkily. "Violet is one of those Princess's."

"That's the only reason you kissed her, because she was a Princess."?

"No, no. It was to get a chance to rem ember her face so I could recognize her. And also wanted to take a very good loo k at that little bridge of of cartilage whic h divided her nostrils undern a underneath, Jane."

"why for that Master Starring!" she asked opening her dark eyes.

"So I could recognize her. If you were not what you appear to be I would have arrested her. You resemble a little their sister Angeline. She is the most dangerous of them!"

"Most dangerous of the Princess. Why. I didn't know they were dan gerous!" demanded the little girl, laughin g and wide eyedes laughing and wide eyed with surprise.

"Whatever you are, Jane there seems by your way of speech enough C h i Christian n you you give you away to whoever would suspect you as a christian spy. And only or the certain sign I see in your hair and forehead;;"

She lifted her slim fingers.

"If I was a Calverinian or any person of any of their states You would be suspecting me, Master Starring.!"

"Certainly, Certainly" he said dryly. "As the Vivian Girls are so unusually pretty always suspect every pretty girl I see unless I know them well."

"Ain't you sorry I am not one of the Vivian Girls." she said with an enchanting smile over her half bare shoulder. "But that is how things are in this great big war Mast er Starring. You ought to know it too, because I reckon you are also a boyscout though you dodn't look it."

"You think I am Jane."

"Yes I do. Your very speech shows it. And your manner of walk."

"Your ways too shows you're a girlscout whether you're of our side or not."

Her eyes instn instantly opened wide again, and he felt the blood stir in his face nd heart.Then he set his jaw firmly and almost scowled at her.

"Well no matter who you really are that Christian Princess and spy got away in he excitement when the Abbieannians attacked near Abbieann and are still attacking" he said."I am wondering where she got a knife to slit the provist tent."

"Land sakes indeed."said the little girl."You are kidding.It's not true."

"It certainly is true."

"And did she reallly do all that."!

"Indeed that is what sheadid."he said grimly, and yet it is said she's still amidst these ruins, while one of her "Com Confederates went to the christian ogs with gar sack of news.It is lucky for you too girl that you told the truth about our acquaintances with her to the soldiers of the military c. court."He gave her a hard look."Untill I had taken a good stern look at you"he continued bitterly,"I was pretty ure you were one of her helper spies, if not one of her sisters.That is what the others hought too."

"If I was a christian spy, would you hang me Master Starring!"

"I have nothing to do with the business of hanging, though our soldiors do not ang children spies .But they meant to kill her in the worst way possible."

"Kill the Princess!"

"Why not.She attempted to sent general Arlington and all his army to death, estruction or capture.Do you suppose the Glandelinian Government can afford to take hances with such sort of children.Why they're more dangerous than gor grown up spies.Do you think we could take chances with such a spy as Angelinia Vivian!"

"No Master Starring."she sighed."I rec kon"she added sadly, that general Arlington ain't going to win this battle.Oh goodness me.I was hoping and hoping how the general would launch such a awful big attack that he would soon be having general Aronburg out of here and be possessing the whole of Bengall S tate.And that is what I was wishing and hoping for, when you came alon g."

"Don't worry Jane."he said smiling at her fe fervor.

"No Master Starring.But I was wondering how general Arlington come to send me down here to Fredrick Dargers headquarters.So I was puzzled and wondered, and figgered he sent me away bec ause he's going to make a flank attack wounded as he s,and---

J"Jane,Jane"interrupted the Glandelinian boyscout sharply"If you don't try to eep things to yourself and mind your own business,and to hold your tongue you'll be sent out of this camp as a common nuisance."

The girl seemed very scared.

"But the yellow haired child slave told me."she whimpered.

"Told you what!"

"How general Arlington is going to move half his army to strike general Aron urg in the rear."

"That foolish yellow haired scamp is too talkative."said Starring angrily."I'm oin g to tell the general how he braggs and gossips .If any chris tian spies gets n this camp, and listens around thes e c hild slave camps they'll learn enough o destroy this whole army."

"But everybody is talking about the contemplated attack Master S tarring."

"If that is so, then there won't be any atg attack of that sort.And listen to me Jane.If you hear any such gossip or talk you come to my tent and tell me and 'll sent or bring any blabbing child slave, or even soldier over to the provist marshall.and if you hear of or happen to see any person you don't know prowling around anywhere come instantly or let me know, or tell some officer.Don't try to ake capture yourself or you'll get killed.Do you understand!"

"Yes Master Starring."

"Very well then, be a good girl then, and mind your own affairs and say nothing f what you hear."

He then walked on abruptly tward Fredricks headquarters.There had c ome into his flushed features, a strange strained look.When he had finally entered the ate way, and seen sated the debris smothered veranda, he saw on one part still free a boyish figure seated on a big roc k, but not dressed in uniform either.It was redrick Darger the most celebrated agent of the Glandelinian Military Secret Service. t Fredricks invitation he came up and seated himself next to him.

"Any news Fred.?"

"That little beggar girl is just a giddy s ort of thing, with no harm in o her Starring."All she thinks of is to make fun of everybody she sees and talks to.She thinks you are a sap Starring to monkey around with the dangerous Vivian Girls. he believes they'll get you instead of you get t hem."

"She does nothing lse but gossip."

"All girls do no matter who they are.You ought to know that Gerald!""

"But she's always talking about what general Arlington is going to do to general C onc entinian Aronburg."

"Everybody knows that general Arlington is going to flank the christian army."said redrick quietly."every c avarly man,every child slave, every camp follower, every body knows."

"That's terrible"murmured Starring .... ::.!"

"It can't be helped"said Fredrick coldly, but regretfully."It always is the name.No secret can and ever could, or ever will remain a secret long inside our lines. I know you say the Vivian Girl Princesses are daring and dang r dangerous spies. Pooh. Pooh Pooh.They're dangerous enough, but let them be.Get after the christian boy and girlscouts and the Gemini.The Vivian Girls spies on us , and yet no really vital secret of ours ever leaks out through them into the christian lines.Do you realize that!"

"You say the Vivian Girls can't spy.They carry out information surely to the rest christian gen rals don't they."

"They don't.they c keep the secrets to themselves and make the generals do against us.But they know themselves half the information they get is only erron eous.The boy and girlscouts are more da dangerous than the fiercest of vipers.Don't you n know Gerald that the christian armies have seldom ever been surpris ed in any sort of engagement major or minor where troops of boy and girls head the armies!"

"That is true Fred."he admitted."The most dangerous ones I fear ,I believe I fear, is Jane Angelinia Aronburg, called Gertrude Angeline, Evangelinia Riches, and the Jenning girlscout leaders.Worse of all is Hettie Kornman.Try and catch them, and you can with the bare hands catch cletric [redacted] ells."

"Let me tell you Gerald what is the trouble with the Glandelinian spy system here. They have a good secret service organization, really and truelly better than the christians in a way(that is a fact((,their operators get into the christian lines,and couriers and the like carry news back to our chief generals.And because the spies are men, always the news is wrong.And that is because the men spies though trained to estimate numbers, and also must have been detectives to trail down criminals and so on, have not the ability because of their size.The child scout and spie because of his or her size can hide almost anywhere without detection, n are more watchful than an adult, and are restless enough to keep out of danger.We being kids are the same.But our men spies they sent back exaggerated numbers numbers and our majors reports these figures to our generals.They therefore metrify the generals, and they demand more troops which can not be obtained.And t hat is why they that is the Natiojals beat us in battle, and continue to hold their lines ith often less than one third the number of troops than we have and less than a quarter of the num er number our generals believe they pse possess."

"My goodness"said Gerald how stupid our spies are.We even found out that even whenever the Vivian girls were really in prison for a time, or thrown among hild slaves they do sent information. Even when they were seperated from ac each other and sent to different prison camps after the battle of Cedornine they kept on sending information into our the christian lines.Under our very noses.And you say they're not dangerous ."

"I didn't say they were not dangdr dangerous.They're successful very often, but they fail sometimes where the girl and boyscouts of their side n ever fails once. And to try and attack even a small squadron of boy and girlscouts, though you over whelm their number is suicide."

"I know it."admitted Fred.

"DrFred"said Gerald"General Arlington telegraphed me that that Angelinia Vivian, one of the Abbieannian Princesses is still at large in this city somewhere."

"So I hear"said Fred.

"Somehow or other general Arlington has learned that this Princess after having escaped from some soap making house which was used as a prison, when she now had all the opportunity to reach o her lines remains here to learn something if pi possible.She's so reckless and daring, that though its my duty to apprehend her I'm proud of her and her sisters and do it much against my will.But if I'm captured would she show me any p mercy if I was a spy."

"Not a bit."

"Our people hanged a girlscout yesterday."said Fred."We thought it was her."

"No it wasn't.These Vivian Girls have been strangled so often that they must be used to it by this time and may have such treatment just for a passt ime now.You couldn't chock them with gas.They any of all the seven Princesses she is the most dangerous.Do you know Fred how w could recognize her amidst all the slaves and child scouts in our ranks.!"

"I don't "said Fred.But as you say I'm inclinded to believe sometimes they're more dangerous in the shooting and stabbing line.How she escaped from that tent seems a mystery but I tell you Gerald she didn't do it herself.I know it.Some one slit that tent, and got away with her.Before she escaped she was tied hand and foot and in that position o how c could she cut a tent open and escape.Her sisters may be here no doubt if not they, then some helper.A Princess of their kind never goes anywhere alone.They take with them clever and shrewd [redacted]Confederates."

" General Arlin tArlington cannot wi n this battle if there is even that Vivian Girl within our lines to report his intentions."said Gerald."Of course if I detect her I'll do my best to capture her but I really hope I don't for I do not like to interfere with her, for though I don't like her, she's dangerous and may have me instead of I have her."

"He told me he was going to win or die, no matter how many girlscout spies or boys either learn i his intentions."said Fred."He says he don't care whether a spy sends out right or wrong information.His generals says it is highly dangerous to try and outwit of capture any of those child spies of the christians but he doesn't care.He defies them all."

"He's a reckless general if ever there was one "said Gerald gloomily."Well Fred, some of ur clever girlscouts of our own side is out prowlin g after that Princess spy they warn us of, and I'm going to ride to general Francis Smiths lines to look about.I suppose you'll do the same."

"Indeed I will."

Fred got down from his orch and both sauntered off.Gerald howev er was raging inwardly.What the devil had happened to him, that such things should be abl to able to outwit him.Instead of walking he began to stride, as though to try to out distance whatever tormented and dogged him.For in his anger, he seemed to be vaguely aware that something was dogging ,haunting him, and taunting him.Something very indefinably alarming.Curiously hebegan to realize--for his minds eye already beheld beheld it---recognized it---the phantom of the little half brown girl with eyes like dark fringed violets, and lovely hands and form and naked feet.

"Fredrick Lowden returning from the cacarly regiments of Glandelinian boyscouts riding his fine old charger reined up on the road or street.

"Well did you discover anything ,Fred!"asked Darger.

"No,I have not discovered a single trace of this mysterious Princess spy of whom all our generals warned us of.The provist guards have arrested many girls and even boys who at first couldn't give an account of themselves, hoping the Vivian Girl may be amon g them, but all knew the countor signs the Glandelinian as pass words, and have written passes signed by our general himself, and therefore nothin g could be found against any of them.Angelinia Vivian was not among any of these girls.Maybe we ought to look for them or her in our own uniform. I've been through the new boy and girlscout recruits and everywhere else.But found no one."

"It wouldn't do for us to look for her in our own uniform for she doesn't wear it.It is said she's disguised as a child slave or beggar.But to find her amon gst these is hard as many are beggars here.I think we should look for this ghostly Princess amongst servants and camp followers at all regimental and brigidier head quarters."

"I have already done so"said Fredrick Lowden."Some how or other Captian Gerald"he drawled"I can't get it out of my head that one particular pretty begger girl called Jane or Lucy is into this business."

"I fear so too but we have no evidence against her."

"But is she a sure enough begger"asked Fred!"

"That is hard to tel ."said Darger.

"What puzzles me"continued Fredrick Lowden serious ly----"is my strange feeling of dread of her."

"That's me too"said Gerald."Sometimes my feelings work like a hound dogs nose.And I always have an instinct when things are not right.The feeling keeps on pestering me till I will find out .And beggar girls are usually very dumb and ignorant.That one seems unusually educated which is another suspicion."

"I have the same feeling"said Fredrick Lowden."

"You had that instinct about the girl who was captured and ha e hanged."said Gerald gravely"and you were right.Have the three of us the same instinct concerning little bega begger Jane!"

"Well it's hard to say whether I have"said Lowden."Sometimes I have, and then again I don't believe I have.But sometimes I feel she is not what she ought to be.And then again I believe she is really only a miserable beggar girl.But spies can pose as beggars you know.You have been watchin g her Gerald.!"

"Yes, and so has Darger.We have kept an eye on her.But then any begger can accidentally pick up information at any time and accidentally talk of it."

"Look at general Concentinian Aronburg over there."continued Fredric k.Lowden."I have not the slightest doubts that any one of their dangerous child scouts c arried news of various intentions of our own generals to general Aronburg.And what do the christian generals all do about it.!Why they scatter their cavarly all over the Abbiesnn territory r preventin g any move that our generals planned to do. We are losing the battle and I don't care who says naught.A day from now and I'll bet we'll be running like rabbits from this part of the country and through that An e Angelinia Vivian.Even the Abbiennnians who attacked so near Abbiesnn cannot be driven back."

"That's the trouble"said Gerald."And yet now general Arlin ton aArlington won't watch for us to catch that spy."

"I know h won't "said Fredrick Lowden."An immense body of our troops are to strike general Aronburgs army on the rear and all our cavarly is going out to cover the attack .."

"Then he'll launch the attack anyway!"

"I believe he will."

They gazed hard at each other.

"I have not the faintest idea where to look at that for that dangerous Princess spy."said Lowden."We have our regiments in every marching order watched and shadowed by agents, and have agents within them, and also boyscout agents within our own companies andnot one of them has discovered the slightest clue.Of course there may be one of the Vivian Girls with a field glass, or a telescope hiding anywhere even outside the lines .And in such a big place of what even remains of this Abbiesnn city spies are still h harder to find.General Arlington wants me to go through to the outskirts of our lines.I'm to take an expert wire tapper."

"You had better be careful.We have stirred up the whole christian army you know, and be careful not to meet with any of those dangerous Vipers the "Aronburg Child Scout Rangers.The Vivian Girls ain't at all dangerous in comparison to them."

"Yes I know that."drawled Lowden."And I am to watch our line of couriers between Abbiesnn,and Abbiesnn Centor.That and other roads are the ones any christian spy or courier would follow out of our lines.And if there is any children especially pretty girls trying to leave our lines, I am to stop them."

"Do you want me to go t co?"

"No Gerald.I'll ask you most plo politelyto see that no body leaves any part of the city.Get all your scouts and even make the elder c hild slaves watch too and threaten the penalty of death, if they allow any one to escape them."

"Why our pr v provist guard;;;

"I know sir.I mean let nobody out who are kids.I'm not talking about men."

There was a strained pause.

"It's my instinct working again Gerald."

"I see Fred.You mean too I should continue keeping a sharp watch on that beggar girl Jane."

"I certainly do."

"Have you discovered anything at all."

"No Gerald not a thing.It's only my feelings that won't stop pestering me."

"Very well Fred Lowden."Gerald said quietly."And be careful. "

He and Darger stood looking after the boyscout spy who [illegible] furious gallop.

At the same time (get thevdime) without bugle or trumpet, or wih without drums at the heat, the gray uniformed Glandelinian infantry proceeded by the infantry and cavarly of the others called Turmerannians began to pass down the city streets, squadron trotting after squadron, and division tramping after division.Glandelinian batteries were on the way too, all moving tward the distant roaring battle lines, and destiny.

Radcliffe in the m a meantime was looking for his friend Angelina.He wondered whether she was strolling by the river bridge or what.He meant to find out and see whether she was as cautious of the danger as he hoped she was.He had his orderly saddle and bridle his horse,and then he mounted and rode slowly down the street tward the River Street Bridge.A small strange white half ghostly figure stood by the railing of the bridge looking down into the river.To his surprise his heart suddenly beat quickly and loudit, and he felt the blood stinging the tanned skin on his cheeks and wondered what he was afraid of.

"Damnation"he muttered to himself.Am I crazy or is that an a parition."He bungled his stirrup as he dismounted, nearly falling from the horse, then he thathered his horse to a broken lam post with shaky fingers.She this time was all in white, and even a white rose was pinned to her kerchief.Indeed to him it was the first time he had seen any one in such lovelinees.

"Good Lord have mercy on us."he said to himself."But to the little girl"

"Again good morning,Angeline.I thought you were on your way to the lines by this time.What are you doin g down here all alone on this bridge, with so many Glandelinians hunting for you everywhere!"

"Morning Radcliffe dear"she replied in her soft voice."I am not bothered about whether the Glandelinians try to capture me or not.They cannot do it if I don't will it.I'm that determined now and the first one that lays hand on me---"and she flashed suddenly her long shinin g dagger."

"You sure would fight the devil young as you are if you could."

"Yes Rad."She added impertinently"Black devil or white."

"But didn't I warn you not to dress too good and show yourself as you are?"he demanded sharply.

"Yes Rad, but I ain't scared of no Glandelinians ."

"It's strange how you and your sisters can really protec t yourself and others when the occassion arises."

"Yes.We learned that."She fingered the white rose pinnedto her kerchief.She was very near and dear to Radcliffe.Radcliffes heart began to pound, while she looked at the supposed boyscout faintly smiling for she too knew who he really was and loved him dearly.They loved each other like relations these two good brave c hildren.

There was a moments pause, and she was tightly in i his arms, warm and yeilding.A few moments not brief---before Radcliffe finally released her.Neither spoke.Then her voice, soft and unsteady;

"Is that why you came to find me Rad--to hug and kiss me only."!

"No he said that's not the only reason.I w want to talk to you.To warn you of something.Watch out for Gerald Starring.He's having you shadowed."

She giggled."Pretty way you have of warning me Radcliffe.I wish you were my sis---I mean well you know."

"I thought I better best begin that way as we're so fond of each other"he said because for both of us the rest isn't pleasent.Because I wanted to ask you bluntly whether to ever see strangers watchin you closely!"

"Strangers!"repeated the girl innocently."I don't know any, and I avoid them."

"You don't know Gerald Starring or his two Confederates by sight do you! "

"Yes I sure do."

"I know you're in very grave danger"he said-"Everybody here suspects you--the general and others.All the officers are having you shadowed.And I'm sorry to say most of the soldiers look at you closely.But that is not what I mean.There are strangers in camp--men dressed like chris tian farmers, planters, beggars and peddlers looking for you, sent by Manley.Did you meet any of them."

"No I didn'T.Why!"

"Really didn't you see any strangers."

"No "she answered.

"Well you'b had better renew your disguise I warn you."Please do for my sake."he pleaded."

"I willdo so now if it is as dangerous as that."she answered.

"He drew a long breath of unconscious relief.It would be terrible for the enemy to recapture this pretty little girl to hang or butcher as a spy.He looked at her lovely little throat and neck(cut in the back) and a shiver passed through him.

"But why do you ask me all these questions,Rad?"she inquired with a childish simplicity that shamed him.

"Oh well,I know you are your sisters.You can protect others besides your elves yourselves."

"Yes,Rad we can."

He began to stride to and fro under the darkening skies his hands clasped behind him.The girl watched him in silence.Then abruptly he bade her take care of herself look out for Gerald Starrin ,g and his followers, mounted his horse, and was off in gat ering darkness at a gallop.The Vivian Girl stood without stirring as long as she could hear his horses hoofs on the street , and when the distant sound had died away,she went into a ruined house where she used for herself.Then she paused beforeca closed door.Opening and gently c losing the door,she stole across to a room which she had alotted toherself.When she had entered the room,and lighted a candle, she mcluelessly bolted the door.Then the first thing she did was to lift her white starched skirt.Under it, belted around her little naked body, was a big long ki knife sabre like in shape in a long velvet sheath.This she slid out and then she pressed some strange secret button to a secret spring in the hilt.This no doubt proved to be hollow.Then out of this she drew asomm e some small bits of thin tissue paper, a tiny but very powerful magnifying glass, an ink pen scarc ely thicker than a hair pin, a fine s onge and a small camel hair artist paint brush, and three glass phials.First of allshe dipped the brush into one of the smallest phials, and with it carefully stained her finger nails to the color of those of the Glandelinians.Then she touched the nails of each pretty toe.Then completely disrobing, and r emoving her leanther belt, she filled a smallwashbowl with water,and let fall into it a few drops of black liquid from the largest phial.Then she went over her entire body face chest and limbs everywhere with the little s ponge--the liquid drying to a dark amber tint.Then she replaced the phials, and the spon e spon e sponge and brush in the knife hilt, emptied the water from the washbowl, cl eaned it and the sink carefully, to leave no tell tale color behind, and then dressed herself.A big American Beauty Rose lay on the table.From it she detatched a broad heart shaped petal, laid it over a little square of tissue paper, and wit h a pair of sewin g sissors cut the tissue into the shape of the rose petal.Then she sat down at a small table, dipped her pen into a fourth phial whic h she had not replaced and wrote on the tissue paper--though her wet pen showed no stain of ink and left no trace of writing;

"Glandelinian army will attack you on the flank at Twelve A.M.
Angelinia Aronburg. Be c areful and keep all army on the watch.
Princess An aline."

This bit of tissue she pinned to the white rose in place of the petal detatched ,and the lovely flower appeared to be perfec t to a l lagain.Now she delib erately rolled together the single detatched rose petal and the shred of tissue, swallowed the pellet, extinguished the tallow candle, and went lightly to the window.

There was now no light anywhere and yet far off there was an awful sound as if the end of the world was already here.She slowly opened the door, and then seeing the coast clear she stole down the steps up.She observed hanging in a c lose closet an old boy scout of the Glandelinians.There too was an old pair of spurred bowscout riding shoes..she pulled the hat over her golden c urls drew on the shoes over her slippers, crept stealthily to the veranda, and then went across the wrecking wreckage strewn lawn.There were no lights now anywh re it was getting still darker the atmosphere was smoke laden, and there was nothing visible in that fog.For the first time the little Vivian Girl felt a lit tle afraid--or perhaps it was some unseen danger whic h she dreaded.She went cautiously up the wreck strewn street(dead beat) then through an alley piled with the wrec kage of fallen houses to what she made out to be an open sq square or something on that order.There was a very bad red glare in the sky to the southeastward and also south and it was getting very windy and awfull y hot.Yet despite the c on ditions of this "forest Fire " a Weather"no one could guess except her that twenty two million Glandelinians were standing to horse at various parts of the city or that galloping mounted parks of artillery awaited only a whispered command to the gunners astride their m impatient horses.So thick was the smoke fog gathering that she could not even see half a block down the street, and she thought that if she was not smothered it would at least help her to escape the all"Seeing"Glandelinian soldiery.

Down along the river there was not a sound from any of the sentinels and enemy vid vedettes.It seemed more than a hundred years-- it was less than twenty minut es before she heard a horse coming, and it was not approaching fast either.In a few moments the hoof beats ceased, and she saw ghostly shapes of horse and rider slowly and cautiously ap roaching down the side street tward her.When the horseman saw her, he looked this way and that first, and then dismounted at her impatient beckoning,,and led his mount tward her.

"Nice dark smoky checking day sir."said the little Heroine softly."It's a day of Reckoning I believe."

This was one of the well known pass-phrase of the Girlscout secret service. The horseman made a sort of mystic sign and then replied with a press ribed answer-

"Beautiful Forest fires, burning up trees and lands for our warmpth.How many forest fires do you count."!

"Ten to twenty five."

"And twenty five to one hundred."

"Done.And the answer is,,!"----""

"Abbicannia Forever."

He wore the uniform of a Glandelinian general.She slowly unpinned the white rose from her kerchief, and graciously handed it to him.

"It's this petal"she whispered,touching it with her smaller finger."It's pinned fast."

He drew the pale blossom through a button ole buttonhole and mounted his horse.

"You are George Augustine!"she asked.

"Yes indeed Princess."

"You have your pass and furlough with you!"

"No Princess.I ride over with general Cantons Horse men.My c ontact is Brane h Number Eight Eighteen of the Gemini."

"Mr Rodney Graves!"

"Yes, Princess."

"Tell him to hurry."

"I will Princess."

That was all then. Angeline watched horse and ridin rider continuing their scundless course across the street.When they had disappeared,she turned back toward the bourse house she had left.After a lit tle way she came again into the court and stopped there frightened.For there was a light in the room s he had just left.Across it now and then, passed the almost phantom figure of some man.Then in the deadly danger of the moment she felt that strange warm c harm of peril flow in her veins.She crept stealthily nearer.She discovered that a saddled horse was tied to a lamp pi post.she glanced up at her lighted window and observed two wavering shadows or figures move on wall and ceiling a man and a girlscout s. Several times the mans face was lighted by the c andle.He was general Francis Smith.Then the girlscout moved into the light for a moment but she had never seen her before. It was that girlscout Jane whom Starring had feared would have been the Vivian Girl in disguise. But she was far more Glandelinian than even he was.She was the deadliest of all Glandelinian girlscouts as beautiful a c hild as she was.The girl came to the open window presently, and shrieked down to somebody she could not see;

"The spy had escaped I'm afraid Starring.But there's enough evidence or skin dye on the floor to tell the story."

"Oh for the love of Mike."cried Starring."We must capture her or she 'll ruin the army."and he cursed inwardly.

"Oh My God"cried Angeline to herself.She must have c arelessly dropped some of the n in dye on the floor.She thought she had taken every possible precaution except this.

"But what makes you think its skin dye?"

"It sure is"screamed the girl to Starring."My hands is fast brown already from touching it.She ain't no such a dark [illegible] all,Starring, that's the [illegible] Girl Angeline Vivian."

"Anything else?"asked Starring.

"Why there's enough evidence here to hang her."

For a moment Angeline felt her limbs body and brain and blood seem to turn to ice, then that strange unusual warmth stole through her again, and she looked carefully at her pistol.She stopp stooped low and crept along the fence under a long stretch of overh ng overhanging wreckage untill she c me to the t ied horse. She untied the horse climbed into the saddle, and freed the pistol from its holster. A mo moment after she had drawn it, she suddenly saw Gerald Starring beside her, with a face full of fury.He had caught the horses head, and tried to drag him forward into t he court yard but she swung the heavy pis tol by the barrle barral and struck him on top of the head as hard as she could, and he crumpled up without a sound his convulsive fingers dragging the horses head down with him to the pavement of the street.She stared down at him.His face and head was covered with blood.Then with a sob, sh she jerked the en snaffle rein out of his nerveless fingers, touc hed the horse with knee and Hellheel guiding him out into the fog where lay her only hope of life.So thick was the smoke fog now that the river was invisible but its flowing could be easily heard under the darkly drifting mist.And the weather was so terribly hot that the winds not only made her sweat like one on a t urkish bath, but the winds felt like they would scorch her face. Yet there was scarcely a sound from the waiting columns of troops, muffledtinkle of spurs from the cavarly, now and then a soft clash of sabres on stirrup irons, metallic stirring of hoofs a on the street pavements and in the distance the unusally str at eady roar of battle, and the drumming undulating thunders of cannons and sharper noise of ex l ex l explosions.

"Yes indede indeed I'm scared, but how can I help it.But I'll be cooler in a moment if this heat will let me."

"Did you kill Gerald Starring Princess?"

"No, and fortunately too.The enemy would never rest till I was captured if I did."

"Shoot him, or hawg stick him or something Princess.I heard a shot somewhere?"

"No I struck him on the top of the head with his own pistol, and I believe I rode off on his horse.If it gets much lighter in case the wind shifts direction someone or many amongst the enemy may recognize Geralds horse, or also notice the color of my face and hands.I meant to put on only a little to look the tan color of the enemy but I dar oned myself too much.I almost look like a nigger."

"Don't worry we're goin g through in a few minutes Princess.Keep cool.It may not be as dangerous as it seems."

Angeline Vivian in her big Glandelinian boyscout hat, and Glandelinian boyscout jacket gave a cautious but desperate glance around her, but could see nothing through the dense almost suffocatin g fog of smoke.

"Oh God help us"she whispered."Why in the world don't they hurry.?"

"Adeldefob, who also was a chief of boyscout spies, wearing a Glandelinian boyscout uniform of the Second Glandelinian boyscout regiment, laid a kindly hand on the frightened girls shoulder.

"Princess we'll both hang or worse if we're caught.We know that.So we better try to forget it, and be calm and quiet.If we appear unusally scared and excited that will bring suspicion sure upon us.And we can't get away now for a while."

"Yes,"whimpered the little girl,"But it's impossible to wash off this dark stain on my skin, and if they see what appears to be a nigger girl in a Glandelinian boyscout uniform it will be the end of me.They don't even so much h as allow collored folks in Glandelinia."

"Princess"said Adeldefob"When the Glandelinian picket lines start out acrosse the fields when leaving the city there'll be heavy firing.You start too immediately leading your horse.And just as soon aze you get to the shore of the river mount and ride for all you're worth."He added, regretfully"if you're shot in the back it's better than being killed the way they kill spies Princess."

"Yes it is.I'll try my best to get through somehow before the enemy suspects me" she murmured,,.She straightened her little shoulders, and lifted her head defiantly,but it was an effort."She said"And you'll try to make make contact with my sisters or the leaders of the Burrough child scouts in General Aronburgs army won't you?"

"I will Princess if Our Blessed Lord helps me through."

"It's Angeline Richee isn't it?"she asked.She knew, but she was trying to regain self command.

"Yes Princess."

"Tell her I'll keep on t o Little Abbieann and telegraph across to the general or his assistant if possible"said Angeline Angeline nervously.

"Again Adeldefob laid a q kindly p hand on her quivering arm.

"Courage Princess.Anyhow I know you.None would dare go through what you and your sisters ever have done.This is your most trying adventure yet though, but you sure got courage a plenty..I seen you often giggle at death, and so did your sisters.Your defiance to the enemy is wonderful . You too have been in worse pickes pickles than this.He too.We never will face real death with these foes.They'll never capture us alive against our wills.They'll never take us.NonPrincess.When the rebel rush against the christian lines begin get onto your horse and ride as if the devil was after you."

There was a moment of strained silence, instead of getting lighter it was darker then noticing the increase in the murk and wind he got into his saddle and started off tward the square where the first cavarly were waiting in close column.He then reached the enemy boyscout column and took his place in the ranks ranks, leaving Angeline Vivian alone in the middle of the Glandelinian division, where disguised acci accidentally as a child negress she had before this been known to almost every enemy soldier in the camp and had been forced to keep in hiding.Now in the smoky darkness which was turning the smoke fog blackish hwr pretty litt e brown tinted face was not visible in the darker shade of her big hat.even her gray coat boyscout Glandelinian jacket and spurred shoes would surely attract no attention, because although many new uniformed had arived for some of the boy and girlscouts of the enemy, the child scouts en mass were still somewhat ragged and any kind of uniform and clothin g was gratefully wron.But nevertheless the poor girl was in extreme danger.The city was too large for her to find herself out in a hurry, and it was teemin g with Glandelinian regiments everywhere.And if Gerald Starring head of the Glandelinian boyscout Secret Service had been too severely hurt by her to follow her, nevertheless Fredrick Lowden or Darger, the clevers cleverest of the Glandelinian spy par operators and also h chief of scouts were now having many of their secret spies searching for her high and low and even doing it them selves.They knew too she had ridden off on Geralds own horse.she was in deathly terror of these Glandelinian boyscouts, who though Glandelinians, and who did not hate her or her sisters by heart, nevertheless never would let country and duty frustrate them from stopping christian spies.She did not know what to do to escape especially the dangerous Darger Spy.She dared not try to join a Glandelinian girlscout regiment and edge into column onthe forde near the river, and she dared not even join any other regiment in the fog.From where she stood at her horses head, among the willows, she could see a camp sergeant anf two or three led horses waitin g, and she recognized one of the horses as ridden by general Francis Smith himself and the other as belong ing to general Arlington.In that case, she realizedwith a pang of fright, the mounted camp sergeant must be Jane Turner general Arlingtons girlscout bodyguard who was a dangerous scout and who could detect her easily.Here was a new and deadly danger a few paces away, if Jane recognized her or saw her color she would either attack her or give the alarm---that if if she had heard what she had done.It was therefore at that moment that all but her latent courage returned.every vein in her body throbbed o to that unusual strange thrill of pleasure which peril excites in many who are forced to do any sort of dangerous work in the shadow of the han hangmans noose or in the face of dri ping swords.That Jane.She had folled her a dozen times that day, and she would do it again if p ss possible.She would do more--she could make a fool of her and get the horses---general Arlingtons and the other generals.At the mere idea of it all the clever reckless sense of humor in the Princess del ci deliciously suffic ed her.Death grinned at her.She only giggled.

Now all the actress activites of the Princess was in confident and controlled ascendency.If she dared however to reveal herself to the girlscout she might or might not have heard that she had been unmasked as a spy.It was possible too that this news had not yet reached Jane, or parhaps had not yet been carried to any headquarters within the city.It was a big risk, a longer and more dangerous chance than her momentary safty seemed to warrent .The next instant she made up her mind, took her horse by the head, and moved through the brush, tward the spot where L Jane sat her own horse, holding the halters of the two horses belonging to the general.

"Oh Jane."she called to her softly.

"Who is that?"asked the girlscout almost sharply.

"It's only Lucy.It's the generals only girlscout waitnr waitress."

"Where in the world did you come from?"she whispered in a passion."You better get out of here if you want to be safe.The general ain't taking every girlscout when he leads upon the christians a big flank attack.It's too dangerous.Are you crazy Lucy?"

"Oh please Luck Lucy I just desire to go to see the battle."

"You sure is crazy and nobody home."Jane muttered."On y I and the general are to ride out with the rest to fight the Christians. "

"I'm just desiring to see the fight and see how the general is brave."

"Why do you want to see a battle.You'll never want to see anot her believe me."

"Well I do!"

"What will the generals say when they see you with me."

"They won't mind I'm sure."

"Well I'm not saying yes, and neither am I saying no.But if anything happens---"

"Before Jane could finish the cavarly was on the way.The next instant she was in the saddls(skeedaddls) close up beside Jane.she could see the troopers and their officers gallop out across the water followed by hundreds of dismounted men all slashing tward the unseen shore far beyond, and in the distance could be seen belted flashes of many pistols and rifles like floating fireflies in the mists of smoke. The unusual steady crackle of pistol fire from many thousands merged into a roaring spasmodic rall rattling storm of volleys from christian rifles added by the sudden convulsive thunder of a long line of cannon that shook the air.With a roaring rush through the smoke fog, general Knaves troops of horsemen dashed into the water, followed by Richesenanias battery,the straining horses bounding forward through clouds of foam. The Glandelinians however were met by a searching fire that drove a portion of the division back with the loss of a whole line of men, and yet across the river a fiercer fight was going on in the smoke fog(get the hog) general Butters Second Secedlier Cavarly horsemen closing with the christian front line, sabre against sabre and bayonet against bayonet.The fog was full of shouting as if a dreadful storm was raging, indeed the din to Angeline was like that of a great Terrucian Typhoon yells from galloping thousands upon thousands of riders, sharp cries from directing officers musketry rising to roaring crescendoes for the length of miles added by the rolling thunder of cannon.

Yet the Glandelinians could not be held back for the attack had been too violent, and too sudden.pistant scampering of many horses hoofs of stampeding horsemen, thrushing gallop of Glandelinian cavarly through churned water, that boiled to the riders thighs there were also the sounds in the darkened obscurity now admit the roar of battle.Two Abbieannian horsemen were seen riding frantically to warn their general that two million Glandelinian horsmen were across the Abbieann river, and that "hell"was breaking loose along the Abbieann Road.On the main downstream edge of the river ford, the second section of the Glandelinian division of Sepodlier cavarly were splashing across the waters in the face of a scathing almost annihilating fire from the defensive lines of christians on shore.Their lines fairly streamed with rifle and artillery fire.

Here the river thr though broad was very crooked, and thrust northward in a very deep angle,the base of which rested on a shore of sand, rock and river willows. From the apex of this angle Jane herself spurred her horse cut into the stream, leading general Arlingtons and Smith horses.Close at the hell through watery and smoke obscurity rode Angeline, hard put to manage Geralds horse which was part thoroughbred.The poor beast and its girlish rider half blinded by driving spray and checked by smoke, and the turmoil of christian firing and plunging horses, and the dreadful noise of bursting shrapnell, reared and shied, endangering Jane and the led horses, and causing confusion among the mounted gunners.

In the middle of the Ford General Pelhandle sat his horse all through the wild fray bringing order out of confusion.

"Oh Jane."he called out pleasantly but loud to be heard above the din"Take the down river edge with the generals horses so as not to expose yourself and your girl friend, and follow the Ninth Corps on the other side.But be careful,the christian fire is getting fatel to many."

"Yes sir your excellency."cried the girlscout, and she spurred out through shoaling water,the two horses galloping gallantly at the lead, and little Angeline still fighting Geralds horse whplunging alongheside him and the girl and up the bank of the christian shore. Angeline had now crossed the river into christian territory but she was still in the midst of the Glandelinian army and mingled with them in the frightful battle.every man of the thousands about her in that small locality was her deadliest enemy, and her life was at the mercy of "chance".Unless circumstances favored her, and God Watched over her more specially, she surely must be discovered and die .To ride with this army into a battle was deadly peril, but to try to ride away from it would mean instant disaster, and yet she too was exposed dangerously to the christian fire.What would happen if a machine gun fire storm would let loose to annihilate all, and probably she amongst them.

But as is usual she passed through without the slightest mishap.

During the final action in the battle of Abbieann,the Abbieannian army moved forward from a mile to two miles, and there opened an annihilating fire of dreadful intensity upon the enemy entrenched beyond there, and occupied this very position nearly during the whole remainder of the battle, from whence it then again moved forward.

The immense christian army was divided into five great corps,three upon the Abbieann side of the Abbieann River and two upon the other,one of the latter afterwards crossing to join the other three in the final fury of the first most ernormous battle of the war..The Christian entrenchments were very strong, the nearest being within half a mile from Abbieann, and the line of the christian armies was about eighteen miles long, with ernormous numbers of guards and pickets and scouting cavarly and boy and girlscout troops reaching out still further,the latter an ever increasing menace to the Glandelinian armies.If it was not for these boy and girlscouts massacres of children by the enemy would have been of frequent occurance.

343.General Aronburg had planned his movements and preparations well before the terrific battle began, for during the weeks before he had come up with a army of one hundred and fifty million men to prevent the holy and saddened ruined city of Abbieann from being taken by the Glandelinians.For many months the Angelinians had before this been much afraid of an attack upon Abbieann toquadruple the disaster already gone on, and therefore they had spent all the time to be spared in building fortification after fortifica fortification,f reaching from what remained of the ruined city itself to from sixteen to eighteen miles in all directions,each well manned and each with its guns of all sizes placed in the most commanding positions.Small wonder was it thatseeing his danger that general Arlingtonhad sent out his calls for extra troops, troops which he never received, for reasons, which was that other armies barred all approaches to him for other troops .The enemy army too fought the battle at a most great disadvantage.The ground which the enemy army occupied and fought back and forth on was still in a fearful condition as a result of the passing Abbieann flood terror.Mud and flood made temporary swamps were everywhere, bushes and trees lay torn up by the roots, and countless numbers of trees,the trunks having fallen over paths and roads blocking the passage of artillery and wagons, making even the regular roads all but impassable.As many during lulls at night of the dead that could be recovered were buried, but the battle ground and other spots were still full of bodies , awful to come contemplate and look upon.Addad to all, for great stretches along the battlefield the soldiers were exposed to such a fierce fierce rifle fire from the christian sharpshooters as to sweep them off like a plague, and soon out of less than a hundredmillion men nearly twenty million were on the dead and wounded list on this terrible third day of the battle alone.The scene within the Glandelinian positions near Abbieann center was scarcely a more happy one.Emergency hospitals were made by the score out of the ruins of the towns, and so severe was the situation that Glandelinian generals gathered in groups to discuss the situation and plan a reverse.The wounding of general Arlington was looked upon as a great calamity, and everybody wondered if general Francis Smith would prove equal to the emergency into which he had been thrown.They did not think it possible as it was said general Aronburg could not be licked.

And then during the early morning of the third day of the battle there came a rumor that general Aronburgs army had been vastly reinforced(it was true) and this nearly caused a panic .

Fierce as had been the wildest and most savage attacks of the Glandelinian forces general Constantinian Aronburg was now in absolute control.General Aronburg had also already corresponded with general Francis Vivianaanna and was assured that general Vivianaanna with his command movingnorthward would be ready to reunite with general Aronburgs forces when ever wanted.Thus was extinguished the last hope of the Glandelinian army of entering any section of the Abbieann territory as a conclusion of the Abbieann~~campaign~~campaign Abbieann campaign/ thanks to the boy and girlscout regiments of general Aronburgs army.

And believe believe me(ladies and gentlemen) the boy and girlscouts even now were not to say only not idle but very decidedly active..A force of fifteen hundred Vivianite Purroughs under Elenor James moved from their encampments near the christian rear over to a district where they saw a dreadful massacre of captured children and condemned child slaves about to begin.The result was a conflict in which no quarter was asked or given,the survivors of the Glandelinians were put to flight without a single loss to the child scout regiments,the children were rescued without a single one harmed, and the child scouts going onward destroyed many military stores from Johns Turners Crossing, to Abbieann Junction Station ,on the Abbieann Creek.From there they moved on to the rear of the enemys right wingthus taking a position directly in the rear of the vast Glandelinian army.

This brought up too the whole "Shebang"of all boy and girlscout regiments to the same location.No prisoners were taken as the child scouts won't give quarter for what has been done to helpless children, and this child scout raid was certainly the most destructive and most daring of the war.Jennie Turner and Angeline Richese-(Not the Vivian Girls though) were in this raid, and Jennie Turner acquitted herself with great honor by single handed capturing four Glandelinian officers of very high rank(spunk), one supposed to be one of the members of the band who alone of them escaped who shot Mildred Manning in the back through an open window, although the men steutly denied it, for it had been truthfully rumored that when Hettie Kauffman at Vivian Wickey resumed main charge of the Vivianites there, she had not shown mery mercy to her assissans assassin, and he had faced the firing squad while the others were to be imprisoned for life..This raid of the child scouts along with other happenings which would take a whole volume to relate, placed general Francis in the greatest danger, and it made him decide immediately to change his base of supplies from that Junction to a more stronger position on the south section of the battle territory.With this change of base however this story cannot well mention for the happenings on the occasion of how the army goods were transported by boat and wagon and auto trucks and that was left behind and burned would fill two volumes.It was a most tremendous change but a most necessary one, and was made none too soon, as the boy and girlscout positions were becoming exceedingly dangerous.All this time the two armies were preparing at each other in the final conflict--holding each other at bay like two monterous serpents, each measuring and testing the strength of the other3.

Everything that the two opposing generals could well do was being done.General Francis Smith was vainly calling for the increase oftroops he could not obtain, general Aronburg was recieving reinforcements from every possible source, while general Francis Vivianna, still manuevering further southward to decieve Izner Mylatze was marching with all possible speed with the main body of his soldiers to help general Aronburg prevent the capture and discretion of the ruined Abbicann city.

The final contest of the battle began by the advance of the christian forces in the neighborhood of the spot where the general flood had swept east during the verse of the Abbicann disaster .At the same time general Francis Vivianianna had come up to reinforce general Aronburg and had made a fierce attack upon the main right wing of the Glandelinian army.This had been done after a short consultation with general Aronburg,and now through this means general Francis Smith had been forced to abandon the attack general Arlington had planned before his fall and henchforth act on the defensive.To go into too much detail of the terrible battle on this third day would take far more space than we have to spare for such purposes as though battle desc descriptions have been long in many chapters, the story lives only through the doings of violet,and her sisters and the boy and girlscout heroes and heroines.If the christian advance was irresistible and masterly equally so was the sku skillful retreat of the Glandelinian forces.every mile of the ground way deep into the night was contested with fury beyond desttttiiiiitt descript ion, as both sides fought their way through ruined flood swept woods turned into temporary swamps and along roads some heavy with mud, and also knee deep with dust,the christian army with its beautiful ruined city and its sumbling behind them, the Glandelinian army carrying with it, millions of wounded and dead and all that it was trying to save and burning the rest, making the biggest bonfires ever imagined.But all these wonderfully interesting details cannot be spaced for description here.We must pass on to the adventures of Jennie Turner,Violet,and her sisters and the boy and girlscouts, and everything they were to exierince during this trying day, adventures more exciting exciting than any they had yet so encountered .

"Oh Jennie dear we are goin to move the army forward at last."

"Who said so sis!"

"I said so.General Aronburg must get t hrough and break up the Glandelinian army so we can find a safer trip tward Big Girl Knool.We're needed bad there.General Aronburg gave us a letter from general Noro Viviananna there, and general Aronburg will have t go there to reinforce him.We must break through, so I fancy we are in for a bit of hard fighting now."

"We have been held back here too long,Jennie to my way of thinking"said Joice.
"We have a t remendous reinforcement by this time and ought to be able to sweep the Glandelinian army away."

It was a reddish dark daywith a smoky forest fire like atmosphere.On every every side great activity prevailed and the noise of battlewas clearly heard.Yet it was not untill eight oclock in the morning that orc orders r eched this regiment of boy and girlscouts to move forward in c heavy marching order to go into position to be able to signal all christian officers as to what to do and not to do.

"This does mean business "cried the girlscouts exclaimed."We are either going to see our army march into Abbicann or---"

"Or what Ora."

"Or we're goin g to crush general Smith."

"C rush general Smith"came from half a dozen throats.

"Exactly comrades.You see""

The roll of drums and the bugle calls c ut the remark short.Soon the boy and girlscouts were hurrying in all direc tions as the c all to duty sounded upon the early morning air, and fifteen minut es later the boy and girlscouts were on the march moving down a road on horseback in the direction of Abbicann Center now in possession of the Nationals. Less than half an mile had been covered, when they heard much closer the deep booming of many cannon, followed by such a din of mus ketry, smaller guns and shrapnell as to shake the air.Also vollows vollows of terrific explosions came in quick succession, showing that the battle was unusally violent to day.

Jennie's hear t began to beat with excitement .She had seen no terrific fighting with her very own sin ce that calamity to the enemy at Evangeline St Claire.
What did the immediate future hold in storeShe breathed a silent prayer that all might go well to day with general Aronburgs army. A small hill was ascended, and before the boy and girlscouts indeed was spread an enormous incredible sized panorama of soldiers moving forward to an attack, of and of great waves of men, retreating, but firing rifles so fast and steadily that the clouds of s oke almost hid the gallant fighters from view. On a distant long hill a long teaming line of cannon of the enemy was dealing out death with every discharge of its hundred and fourty guns.

Jennie T urner in advance heard down below one of the officers shout;
"That Glandelinian battery must be taken.".

This brought on the cry"Remember Abbicann" all along the line of attack, and now the Ninth Cor s was seen sweeping into action."Forward men"was the signalled commands.One gallent charge and the day is ours."

The boy and girlscouts then waiting for their chances to signal in c ase any danger was night nigh saw a splendid battle.Away went immense waves of men in red and purple each bayonet glistening brightly despit e the fact that there was no sunshine.On and on over the trampled down dried grass,t he soldiers so c lose together that nothing could go between them------on and on, through the smoke and dust.The enemys fire was terrific beyond destruction, but most of it at first was too high, and almost swept the hill on which the boy and girlscouts were, and doing no harm as yet to the attacking christian line of the ninth corps.At such a sight Jennie Turner(indeed all of the childscouts) could fairly feel their hearts thump against their cross belts.

The boy and girlscout regiments had by this time dismounted from their horses and laid down flat behind many objects of protection while they waited for their own work to be performed for the nearest of the Glandelinian batteries had also opened upon them in deadly earnest.The enemys cannon fire had now become terribly destructice, and the long undulating flashes of artillery, the reports of shrapnell the banging of heavier shell and the whistling of grape and canister and machine gun bullets was follo wed by yells and shrieks of of agony from many thousands never to be forgotten forgotten.Men dropped by the score of Regiments, and so fierce and annihilatingwas the Glandelinian artillery fire added by long lines o of musketry and machine guns, that no matter how numerous was the christian soldiers, they couldn't even dare go onward, n and therefore the lines had staggered, wavered and began to recoil.

Jennie Turner saw a grave danger in this and ordered the nearest of the scouts to signal to some of the officers to prevent a retreat,and this brought the c ommands, by signal too"C lose up,Close up;Forward, and the men crowded forward again.

Now came the signalled order to fire,and the first line did so pouring forth a wave of wave of smoke cloud from their numerous rifles.Then they dropped upon their knees,and the second line fired over their heads.The rifles of hundreds also were pointed at Glandelinian gunners of t he nearest batteries , and the gunners of the nearest artillery tujb tumbled backwards in such numbers of fallen that for a good length of time there were none to take their places and the artillery therefore was silent.Then on swept the christian line yelling their battle cry"Remember Abbic-ann with a voice that not even the yelling of the fiercest Indians could do credit to . The artillery thus deprived of their gunners were within plain sight of t he assailants which of one regiment was led by Walter Starring, and now f arful fearful of the results of the attack, a full division of Mangaboo Glandelinian Inv Infantry was hurled forth to the front to stay the progress of the red and purple Abbicannian lines.Then it was a forest of bayonet s against a forest of bayonets with a clash and a c rash that was heard for more than three miles despite the general din of firing that tried to swallow it up.But the Abbicannians were on the run.They could not be stayed, the whole surge literally tore its way through the Glandelinian defensive lines at many points cutting it to pieces, and could not be stayed untill the batteries were gained and the guns turned upon the enemy.

The encounter with two Mangaboos nearly threw Walter Starring off his feet.As The Glandelinians were retreating, Starring suddenly saw before him, a tall stout Mangaboo soldier wit h a brownded browned or tanned and yet determined face.The bayonet of the Glandelinian soldier was thrust with a vicious desperate lunge straight for his heart, but with a sudden vigorous effort, and by his herculean stren th Walter easily knocked the weapon aside, brought him down wit h a blow over the shoulder with a sabre blow, and then again he lunged forth his sabre, and anot her Glandelinian assailant went down pierced through the side.Like a flash he was lost to view, as the first and then the second wave of attack trampled over his body, and Walter found himself confronted by three more foes, whic h he also brought down.

"The Glandelinian position is ours.Hurrah." This was indeed the c ry which rang over the field.The Glandelinian infantry though fighting desperately had been forced back inch by inch untill the Abbicannian soldiers now held the position.

Yet so fierce and tenacious was the Glandelinian resistance resistanced resistance that yt it even locked despite all this as if the day would remain their own.They rallied and made a most desperate counter attack and almost captured the battery batteries.But this was not to be.From some point beyond there burst a fresh could of Abyssinkilian and Domdobian and also Tripolongilian troops, and close behind them came some strong bodies of Angalinian reserves, and the christian onslaught was pressed with redoubled fury and viol nce violence, the christians yelling like as many demons.Christian artillery also came into place as if they jumped into sight from in tihe ground itself, deadly death and destruction at every discharge along a wide and extensive front cutting down whole droves of Glandelinians on the very apex of the hill as with a huge scythe.

"Those christien dogs are too many for us."was the cry and it was enough to put the Glandelinian troops on the retreat.. An effort was made to spike a re-captured battery, which had just been retaken, but so fierce was the christian advance that there was not time enough, a thousand having lost their lives in this vain momentary attempt, and in a twinkling the purple and the gray were fighting on the sides of the hill lower down.

D ring this momentary time Walter Starring looked around for some water, and found a pool c lose at hand.He knaltdown to get a drink, and to fill his canteen, whenc a cannon boomed forth loudly, and a solid shot plowed into the pool bespattering him with water and mud.He therefore gorgot all about beingthirty this thirsty but rolled over and retreated on a run. On the Glandelinian side there was now a call to su port another t orn up division in a different section of the bloody battlefield and once again many regiments of the Mangaboo and Scoodlier Glandelinians set off on the double quick, loading and firing as rapidly as they could as they ran.They fell in as fearful a number as if a plague was sweeping away a nation of men but the survivors pushing on were now in the vinicity of the river, and purple and gray were fighting savagely for the possession of an abandoned farm.

"We will go below"signalled general Spaulding, who had recieved orders to that effect from the general of the high st highest command."The Christian dogs have u pushed forward and sec ured a lodging on this bank behind the flood torn trees and we must drive them out."

The advance was through some flood swept swept lands close to the river.They met a fire that threatened th m then with annihilation but still the survivors wen t on wit h grim determination.Several hundred feet were passed, several hundred thousand had fallen in that short time, and the survivors were becoming discouraged and dis concerted when there ar us arose a wild yell from the right and from the left that would drown out the loudes t roar of a typhoon storm.The Glandelinians had fallen into a trap.

"Fire.C harge bayonets.Fall back."

These and half a dozen ot her orders ran out, but no one heard them/.The Christians were herming them in, n and it was nec essary for these Glandelinians to cut their way back to safty.A fierce hand to hand fightin g arose upon every side, extending for seven miles.In the meantime Rado liffe had c ome along with the Glandelinian soldiery just to see how the battle w s turning out but he had come tooclose to the attacking christian soldiery, and a clubbed musket aimed for a soldier close to him hit him alongside the head and he was knoc ked almost senseless/.

He staggered off to a thicket, pitched upon some dried grass, and knew no more/...!

When the young boyscout spy came to his senses, all seemed to be pitch dark around him.Besides his head ac hed as if it would split open and his ears were st ill sounding from the c oncussions of the battle which still roared at some distance away.He endeavored to sit up, but fell back com letely exhausted.The first sound which claimed his attent ion was that of many cannons thundering in reverbrating drumming rools.How dreadfully they thundered, as though such a thing as war was just fought to see how much ammunition could be wast ed.Then came the c ry of countless numbers of voices showing that somewhere anot her onslaught was b ing being made.He continued t o rest, and to listen, and thus gradually his headache became more and endurable.It was very sultry and this finally made him rouse himself.He believed it must be about two or three in the afternoon, for the smoke of the distant forest fires made the darkness.He listened to the sound of battle attentively and wondered who wins now.He also fanc ied he could hear the tramping of many horses, and the rumbling of wagons .It was no doubt the retreat of the enemy baggage wagons as it sounded in that direc tion.No doubt he believed the Glandelinian armies find ing the christians too numerous had begun its withdrawel to a better position.A part were already at Marshall Field C reek preparing to give the christians double fury of battle in that locality s especially it sounded that way in that direct ion.

"My mission in general Arlingtons crazy army is over so I must firs t get bac k t o the Princesses and thence to Vivian Wic key, via Big Girl Knool."he thought and arouse to his feet(down the street) For the moment from the vibrations of the terrific distant cannon fire he could scarcely stand, and for that time he wondered if he had been shot besides clubbed.Then he remembered the savage blow from the gun stock, and realized he was luckey it had not been from the musket butt.He put i his hand up to his head.There was a large and sore lump back of his h ear.

Which way should he turn.?It was a puzzling question.The enemy might be all around him and he had no desire to be taken prisoner for if he was and he was rec ognized he would face the fate of a child spy.He thought of the river, close at hand.The Christian army must be on or near that, perhaps five or t n ten miles below.He decided to follow the river, for want of a better path.He had at first decided to follow the sound of the artillery fire, but then was not sure of which side fired the guns and did not wish to take any chances. The task Radcliffe had cut out for himself was no a easy one.The swamp swThe Flood swept grounds were treacherous and soon he found himself up to his knees in muck and water.He could scarcely move, and coming to a slight elevation threw himself down panting for breath.He was near the river, and now he observed a large rowboat resting half in and half out of the water, the oars lying in the bottom of the boat.Instantly he decided to take the boat, and row or guide himsel d himself down the Abbieann River untill an assured place of safty was gained.A few steps forward, and he h d had just began to shove upon the bow of the craft, when a slight movement at the bottom c ased him to start.A man in red uniform lay there, his forehead tied up with a bandage. The man was an Abyssinkilian captian.

"Who is that!"asked the man in rather a weak voice."

"A boyscout."answered Radcliffe, and added quickly"Are you alone here, c aptian!"

"Yes worst luck.Where is my command.?I was struck by a glancing shell fragment and knocked out."

"I don't know where your command is ca t c aptian.Can you get up.Captian!This is a bad resting place."

"Can I get up.Why heavens an Abbieannian boyscout, and Radc liffe.I thought you were still wit hin the enemys lines.What does this mean.How come you here!"

"Keep still captian for our own safty."answered Radcliffe.Yes I am Radcliffe and I got hit on the head by a musket stock.We must be quiet as we do not desire to be made prisoners."

"What do you intend to do in this dangerous zone. "?

"Take this boat and row down stream."

"If you do go north, don't go south.The enemy is south."

"Good.I'll do that."

The Christian c aptian fell back, and Radcliffe shoved the boat into the stream.Radcliffe sou soon found rowing out of the question, and merely guided the craft as it drifted swiftly along the still flood swollen river.Half a mile or so had been covered, and Radcliffe was guiding the boat around a bend when thesounds of voic es in a thicket ahead reached his ears.To slow up was im possible and not knowing whether they were enemies or friends he therefore guided the craft to the opposit e shore from whence the voices came.

"Halt in that boat there halt."rang out the c ry. "Who goes there!" and Radc liffe saw the glint of a rifle barrel thrust through the leaves not twenty feet from him. Radcliffe was always as quick as a flash of lightning with his pistols and would have drawn to fire but these words stopped him!

"It's a little Glandelinian boyscout sure as you're born James."Plug him before he has a chanc e to get away.We boyscouts cannot let any of the enemy go down stream toward the christian lines."

Radcliffe felt he was in on e one of the most trying situations in his life.Had the picket been an enemy he could easily make short work of him.But it was an Angelinian boyscout picket who had drawn a bead upon him, and unless he answered promptly he would undoubtedly be shot and killed.

"Stop Glandelinian pig do you hear!"came the voice again.

Radcliffe put down i his oar, and found the river here less than a foot and a half deep.The blade was sun k into the mi mud and the headway of the craft c hec ked.

"We are friends."shouted the young boyscout."You do not need t o detain us!"

"Who are you."

"I am Radcliffe and I detailed myself to take a wounded Abyssinkilian captian to the chr istian lines below here."

"I don't believe it kid. Got the count er sign boyscout!"

"The sign of the Cross."And Radcliffe blessed himself.

That was the counter sign, and no Glandelinian would do that at any risk. That is why any christian could pass a line of pickets easily.

"That's all right boyscout.Pardon me for my mistake but we got to wate h the river.Pass on if you want to."

"Are we in danger from the rebels!"asked Radcliffe, as he pulled on the oar slowly.

"Ain't no Glandelinian devils inside of hald a mile I believe."answeree the answered the boy scout picket, and then the boat drifted onward, and Radc liffe hoped now to reach the christian lines.The captian i himself lay motionless with his eyes closed in too much pain to even think of h what might happen next.

Another half mile was covered without further interruption.

It was now beginning to grow lighter as som of the smoke overhead thinned out a little, and Radcliffe cast an anxious eye from shore to shore.Had the river at this point been deserted.It certainly did seem so.

Thinking it safe to do so Radcliffe went then for the western shore of the river(liver) and finding that his wounded soldier companion felt he c ould walk helped him ashoreThey both knew that to go further down the river would be very dangerous because of the current .Radcliffe fancied that they were closer to the christian lines but such was not a fact.Though now far from the en emys lines they were still further from the christian lines.They stopped to rest in a tangle of bushes.Was he now any better off than he had been before!"was the question e he asked himse f he himself.

"We ought to be nearer the christian lines."he muttered to himself."We ought to have stopped with the pickets and have them bring us there.I didn't even think of that, believing I suppose I can do everything myself..If only I c ould climb some hill, and then a tall tree I might---ha what is that."

A most peculiar but inticing odor as of cooking meat had reached the noses of both. Radc liffe sniffed it,and found the pleasant odor c oming much stronger.Then e he heard low voices.

"CAin't that crazy steak done yet Hank.!"

"Yes it is indeed Uncle Henry."

"Then let us eat it up before some of those Glandelin ian soldiers come to take it away from us."

"The pec potatoes are also done,Unc le Henry."

"That's good my nephew,that is very,very good.Come and eat hearty now, but I wish we had some boy and girlscouts of the c hristians who could share some of this."

A rattle of tin plates and a couple of knives followed. Crawling forward, Rad cliffe soon beheld a small tent on theedge of a clearing.In front of the tent a middle aged man, and a pretty looking boy of about eight years old or older were enjoying a feast of beefsteak, and baked pttttttoes potatoes..Making certain that no Glandelinians were around, Radcliffe advanced.At sight of the young boyse out the old manand the boy gave a start of pleasant surpri s e for it seemed their wish had come through, and they gladly devided their afternoon meal wit h Radc liffe and the wounded soldier.As he ate Radcliffe questioned the aged man, as to the position of the christian lines.

"The christian army is right over yonder Master Radcliffe"was the reply, and t he man pointed with his long bony hand."But Bless you my boy, general Arlingtons and Smit he Glandelinians are all around you on a retreat with millions and millions of soldiers ready to swallow you up."

"They won't swallow us up so easily"smiled Radcliffe.In an hour he was ready to go on and the aged man gave him minute directions as to the best trail to follow.

Better daylight had no come but the air was c lose and sultry.Now the cannon were booming more louder in the distance.The two trudged on and on.Soon Radcliffe stopped wondering where he was.He feared sure he had taken a wrong turn, and now found themselves in a thicket.They tried to ta e a cross cut, and then becmae lost, and thus the best part of the afternoon slipped by.They were lost in the flood district and between the dangerous battle lines.With such a jungle of tree and other debris about him that at some spaces he could not see twenty feet ahead and with mud and water up to his knees almost, they bot h stopped short, and a chill shot through Radcliffe.

"We are in for it."he murmured dismally.

"Why what is the matter!"asked his soldier companion.

"We must have taken the wrong road.How in the world are we to get out! "

It would not do to remain in one spot, they were sinking deeper and deeper in that flood made ozze ooze which stuck like so much glue.They staggered forward.From some other location now c ame new sounds of battle, as general Nero sent his c orps to the attack, wit h general Blain Night Linger Following.How bravely the enemy divisions resisted, no one could tell in a hundred volumes, but the enemy troops were being finally forced back along that sector also, and two of their best divisions had already been captured or destroyed.

But Radcliffe nor his companion thought nothing of these things, as slowly and painfully they continued on their way.The survey from a high rise of ground was very disappointing.They were in a sea of flood torn and swept wreckage mostly from houses and trees and other debris, and on every side the high windrows of wreckage floating in water and seas of floating trees cut off a furt her view. They were in the flood district.To go further that direction meant drowning.

Yet they had located the sound of battle and why they had not been going in t hat direction was bec ause they feared of being on the enemy side of the conflict and risking danger of being captured.But they felt they must go on or face starvation.

They had noted the location of the nearest high ground, and now struck out for this(give me a kiss hiss) leaping from one hammock of half floating wreckage to anot her, as best as they could.They progressed untill nearly four oclock when they reached firmgrrrrrd ground and a well defined road.They it was sure were between their own line and that of the enemy.But how should they move to join the christian army.The t rail might lead them direction into the enemys position.

"I don't care,--I'll take the risk if you will."the captian muttered at Radc liffes look."We can keep our eyes open and I guess we can run as fast as any of them when we have to."

Yetthair progress along the trail(not tail) was slow for fallen trees and all sorts of debris was plentiful.They soon came upon a highway leading northwes tward.The ground was cut up by many wheels showing that heavy artillery had passed that way but a short while before.Presently they came upon three Abbiecannian girlscouts.

Radcliffe recognized the three well.One amongst them was Susan Farrol.The other two were the Vivian Girls, Jennie and Angeline. What they were doing here he didn't know.

"Hello there comrades and friends."he shouted joyfully."We're lost."C an't some of you find me."!

"Radcliffe"Came from Angeline."Well of all things how---"!

Radcliffe told them the whole story.

"We're out scouting,"was the reply from Jennie. "

"C ome we'll l ad you to the camp"said Angeline.

With this trio of pretty girls Radcliffe,and the captian proc ceded upon their way feloing feeling much lighter at heart.

"I don't se e how I could thank you Princesses."said Radcliffe.

"Oh yes."said Angeline."You're misteken.It is us who should thank you.For you have done many things for us which we even didn't deserve.But come lets not waste time to talk about it.We don't desire to meet the enemy just now.We're unarmed. Somebody mysteriously stole our horses and our weapons were in the saddle holsters."

AthttttankA haversack filled with two days rations were pic ked up a few hundred yards further on, and although the food was stale and had belonged to some Glandelinian soldier who had either fallen or ran off,the quartet fell to with good will,and did not allow a mouthful to escape them.About quarter after o four the pickets on guard at one f of the abandoned railway stations were enc u encountered.Nobody had the pass word, but had the counter sign, and bec ause nevertheless the Vivian Girls were well known they got into the camp easily enough.

The battle so far upon the withdrawal of the enemy to the Abbicann River had not been particularly severe upon the Glandelinians under general Pattern.Out of a total of seven u hundred thousand men, only eight thous and had been killed, and twelve thousand dying or wounded.To be sure nearly every other man had been sc ratched--but in the fierce grimness of bloody and sagave war such trifles does not count.

The boy and girlscouts on the hill observed that now the fightin was unusually severe and general all along the line,the Glandelinians protec ting not only their own retreat, but also the passage of the vast stores moving from the territory of Little Abbiecann, across the railroads to the Abbiecann River.Then it was a little later on this occassion that the regiments of boy and girlscouts made that terrific and daring raid, and even ca tured a tran train of baggage and a munition wagons.Hotly persued by the Abbiecannish armies, the Glandelinians n not yet having been in the battle t ook a last and final stand on the high ground above the tracks of the Mic-Hollester and Pandor Railroad resulting in the bloodiest action of the battle(in the rattle) and one that Violet,and her sisters,and all the boy and vir girlscouts will never forget if they lived forever on the oith.

It was the intent ion of the Glandelinian leaders to force the main fighting simultaneously all along the line, but because of the vigorous action of the c hristian line this was absolutely impossible.Owing to the denseness of the c hristian t roops, their fierce firing, and display of forest of bayonets,and the destructive artillery ri fire some of the Glandelininn divisions were driven so far back as to cause them to be at the important moment to be a mile or more away from where they should have been and this produc ed a confusion which broke up all of the plans laid by the enemy generals for that section of the battle ground.Early in the morning till now both sides had been furiously engaged, artillery and infantry, but it was not untill five oclock in the afternoon that the real attack of the christians themselves began.From that time on, untill ten in the evening the battle wagged on with the most rel entless and savage ferocity, untill seeing they could not finally force the Glandelinians from their newly selected position, the chris tian army slacked up on the battle, and the Glandelinian army was allowed to retreat without further molestation.During the hour between four and five the boy and girlscout regiments of general Aronburgs army were resting on a small elevation within easy view of the Glandelinian position by the railroad.Here was a planted a strong battery.So far this bat tery had not yet been in action but now at four thirty it began t to belch forth at the advancing c hristians.Only a few broadsides we e fired and then the guns couldn't be depressed to reach the assailants, and it was speedily taken.

"The Glandelinians will have sure be work to hold that position."said Jennie Turner decidedly as she viewed the posi.ion through her field glasses."I found a note however that declared general Smith is goind to do his level best to break general Aronburgs going."

"Yes, but maybe it will be his own spine that we will break"put in Walter Starring."We have been fighting so much these three days, it seems now that we cannot do anything else.It seems as if we were born to fight now."

One boyscout had done something during this days battle that nobody ever knew of.That was Jerry Rowe.Two hours n before Jerry had taken up his gun and started on a run for the river, capturing single handed two Glandelin ian spies, who had been skulking among the wagons, with the purpose no doubt to set the whole on fire, for one wagon was burning when o he caught them.

"Attention "came the cry."Look to your guns boys, and see if they are well loaded now and in good condition.There will be no play this afternoon.The general expect every man to do his duty and drive the foe from his new position if possible."

"We will.We will.Remember Abbieann.Down with Glandelinia.Let us drive them clear back into Glandelinia where they belong."

"Hurrah for general Aronburg."

Very short minutes went by, n and again the Glandelinian battery o pened up opened up, as a long thick line of men in purple were seen by the Glandelinian ar tillery men coming forward at the double quic k.The broadsides did good execution beyon d measure, but the line came on through the wreck and ruin left by the floods over swept trees, and debris of groun d and houses, untill it had crossed the railroads tracks and was advancing straight up the high and long rise of ground.

"everybody attention.Charge bayonets. oForward came the order.

The battery had blazed away agi again and again right into the faces of the men in purple, who were yelling defiantly at the t op of their voices"Remember Abbieann."

But leavingt heir scores of platoons of dead and dying behind they strove to reach the cannons and drive the Glandelinians back.But long lines of Glandelinians swung out to meet them as if on drill.The noise of their innumerable rifle shots was terrific, as line after line swung into position, fired, and wheeled away to make room for the next.The d s destruction of life was fearful but the men in purple did nor falter but rushed up to the very muzzles of the guns.And to make it worse for the enemy reinforcements were seen coming a large wave of Abyssinkilian c avarly, with fo colors flying and the trumpeters blaring wildly.The cavarly c ame forward at breakneck speed, the wave of horses snorting and rancing as they smelt the smoke and the burned powder-- on and on untilll the foot soldiers of the enemy had to recoil swiftly to shelter to avoid being sabred or trodden upon.The Gargoylian C urdes or "The lors" led t he van, and Jennie Turner watching the battle saw general Anderson in the fore of the National Cavarly with sabre waving over his head.The general was yelling, and Jennie almost imagined she heard his words, but that was impossible in the unearthly racket upon every side.The battle was raging more severely now and even sunset would not see it ended.The christian cavarly swept away the Gargoylian curdes.

"Close up"

It was an order to the glandelinian infantry, and they again closed up around the battery ready to defend every gun to the last, and it bec ame the fiercest hand to hand fi ght ever seen.Still the Glandelinian soldiers could not chec k the christi n c hristian advance,the christian cavarly c ame up untill the leading wave of horsemen c onfronted that li ne of l glist ening bayon ets.They were bayonoted by hundreds per second but they were not checked, the cavarly broke the line and rushed through. The battery was lost, and the Glandelinian soldiers falling in over inc reasing numbers scattered in every direc tion hoping for the cover of the sea of artillery smoke beyond, most of them flying to the woods on the north.The gunners lay dead at the wheels of their pieces fai faithful to the last .However the Glandelinians reinforced and rallied and recaptured t heir battery after making one of the most daring charges of the battle.But the vict ory was a short lived one.word had been sent how the christian troops were being pressed, and a body of Domdobians and Abyssinkil ians were hurried across the fields to the sup ort of the attac ing lines.Wit h a ringing cheer that could have been heard for miles they burst upon the enemy, and the c ounter attacking Glandelinians were shot down in suc h fearful numbers, that the Glandelinian leaders began to thic think the Heavens had burst and was destroying t heir troops.The christian fire was terrible and anihilating for fair, and the order was given to retreat,and the Glandelinians scattered, the retreat bec oming general all along the line. Walter Starring had been then in the t hickest of the fighting but now hatless, saberless and shot through the left arm he still nevertheless followd after the on u enrushing c iristian troops.It had been a darin g and desperate c hristian charge, and a very successful one, for the battery and the enemy position was in the possession of the christian troops .Walter panted for breath, and wiped the sweat and dirth from his face.

"Well if it isn't walter Starring."

"Gertrude Angeline.By all that is wonderful.I thought you was way down at Vivian Wickey, and wounded.Where in the world did you c ome from."

"I come from Vivian Wic key, and got here just a few m inutes ago.I didn't even know a battle was raging here, unt ill I heard all the noise.I saw the Glandelinians driven into t his shattered woods by your c avarly--or some cavarly christian cavarly tha that was with your."How did you get here.The christians are not on the retreat I hope."(dope) How did you get here."

"I a was following the christian reserves, a and I followed the enemy all this distance and they had to run for it or be c ut down to a man.Oh b ut it is a most fearful day for both sides.I wish this dreadful war was over Gertrude."

"You don't wish it any more than I do Walter.It's not all glory is it."

"Not at all.But listen.I heard lots of troops coming."

"If they're Glandelinians we're in for it.I am not armed."

"Nor I----listen they seem to be passingt o our left.We had better beat it."

"You are badly wounded and so is your horse."

"So are you wounded.Your cheek is covered with blood."

"That is only a scratch Walter.I got it from a piece of lumber flung at me by the explosion of spra shrapnell.But one of the horses of the enemy stepped on my foot(de boot) and that was not so nice.Hello what in the world is the meaning of that!"

The conversation was broken off, and both stared through the thic kets.A strange dense cloud of heavy s oke was rolling their way.Walters horse sniffed it and began to ciecle about uneasily.

"Gertrud e Gertrude I think(poty Dink)""

"The woods here are on fire.Maybe the forest fire is coming up t his way."

"I believe y u are right---and see the fire is behind us too."

They swung around.It was true.Either it was the big fire coming to the woods up here or else another one had been set by the enemy to try and drive off the christians, and now the dry brush and trees were burning fiercely like so much tinder. From here and there in the distance came the distn distant battle cry from count less numbers.

"It looks as if we're hemmed in Walter.What shall we do!"

"Do!Get out as fast as we c an.Come there seems to be a wide clear s pace to our left."

They hurried off.The wind too was blowing awfully harf, carrying the burning m embers close to them both.Walters hors e snorted in alarm and could scarcely b cont rolled. As Walter therefore passed under a low branc hed tree,the animal gave a sudden bound and threw his young master backwards.The next instant he was out of s ight.Gertrude ran forward."alter lay where h he had fallen, motionless and with his eyes clothed tt c losed.

His head had struck a stone andwho was senseless.

"Walter, Walter"cried Gertrudev pleadingly,but there was no response.The young chief of girlscout spies glanced back anxiously.The fire was advancing with the most frightful rapidity and though the main branc of it was over a s mile away its heat was so terrific that she could feel the burning sensation through her clothes as if the "sun" was trying to give her z a sun uvsunburn. She knew she must run with all her might if she would save herself from the devouring element . But could she leav e Walter, her friend, and yet like a loving brother to her.No never.She would die with him in the flames before she would do it.And besides what he had gone through t hrough the war for her.Though a little girl of ten or eleven she was very strong nevertheless and to c arry him on her own bac k was no burden whatever.You see readers, the hardships boy and girlscouts goes through makes them almost equally men strong despi te their ages.She caught up the motion less form and slung him over her shoulder.The burden was however a heavy on e for Walter Starring was more of a man than a boy despit e his young age and five feet tall, but she struggled on, bravely, desperately,and determinedly.But now she could not go on much further as the smoke was threatening to smot her her, an d every nerve had been strained to its utmost.The heat too was a terrific torment to her.Even so fast was the cong conflingration that trees were beginning to blaze above her very head, and flaming embers fell abouid her.She stumbled rather than ran a few steps more.Worse,by the smell they were trees with Tur e Tur e Turpentine trees as this was a section of the so called Red Riding Hood woods.Fu fortunately she came upon a wide strat ch of the still remaining flood where for a good distance out though wreckage floated it was shallow.she plunged into the water and went as far as the dept h allowed and allowed the clot hing of herself and her com anion to be soaked through,and through...OO('

She also threw some of the water into Walters face.

"Gertrude---what---what---in---the---world---happened?"and Walters eyes opened widly.

"Your hos horse threw you, and ran off Walter.I c arried you hthat here.We are not yet safe as the fire may make this part of the water too hot for us soon.It's too dangerous to risk it out too far in all this water."

"You carried me here Gertrude!How good of you.And the fire is behind!"

By a super human human effort, Walter Started un.

"We must go farther."

"Yes if you can walk or run, give me your hand.See there is a road, and beyond is a wide clearing.We can make it in time.Come."

On they went along the wal waters edge, side by side, Gertrude supporting Walter who was stillll dizzy.The clearing reached,that came upon another road, and beyond was a large stretch of open ground(got the hound pound) where a whole division of christian soldiers,, were battling fiercely,and bravely against a shattered line of gray.Here both came to a halt, and gazed into each others eyes.

"We must part Gertrude for the time being.Good bye."

"Good bye Walter, and I'll never forget you.I must hurry and find Violet and her sisters and tell them of the situation I heard at Big Girl Knool.They must come at once."May God and His Blessed Mot her spare your life."

"And may He spare your also."

They shook hands and turned in opposite direc tions.It was the last the two friends saw of each other till after the Frightful Carnage at Big Girlknool.

The memorable day of the battle of Abbieann was drawing to a c lose when Walter found his Regiment or what was left of it, for the attack upon the enemy across that railroad had cost hundreds of christian regiments dear.Brave general Callings on the christian side was dead, and so were ten other generals, and sixteen of them them were wounded.But cut up as Walters company or regiment was it was joined to the remnants of several others, and sent to the aid of the cen ter of the line where the battle was raging furiously. The Glandelinians had not yet been t otally driven back.

But at this time the evening found Violet,and her sisters, Walter Starring, Jennie Turner Angelina Richoe,and Susan Farrel at Abbieann Landing, ready to return tward Big Girl Knool by water, as a mysterious telegraph had been sent them by Penrod at Vivian Wic key telling of the menance of the enemy there,and that the generals depended on them for help.From this point however Walter Starrin g had to remain in general Aronburgs army bec ause of his wounds.His horse had again turned up and the soldier and horse soon found t hemselves safe in the rear of the chistian lines.Need any one say anything of the warm gergreeting Gertrude Angelina recieved from Violet,and her sisters,and all those who knew her,when she appeared.She then told them all and said;

"Now that you know it, for your count rys sake you must c ome there.We have not done enough for the cause.Penrod thinks the scouts there can remain at Vivian Wic key unt ill you send for them later, but you must be at Big Girl Knool.The christian army is in grave danger."

Violet, who had the messages from elsewhere, studied them, and then she and her sisters put in a full evening till dark studying maps of that territory.

Then Violet said-

"General Aronburg must bring his army too.We will go on ahead for some distance by boat, and rail if possible and get there quick."

Then she sent a message to general Mr Moro Vivianana at Big Girl Knool;

"We are coming as fast as distanc e allow.If nec essary rat rent to little Girl Knool, n and extend your lines tward Kittens Ric hents and make a stand. Watch Manley and don't let him move t oo fast.

The Vivian Girls."

However Violet and her sisters knew full well that they would not be able t o reac h Big Girl Knool because a terrible battle had raged at Marishoochanie and t heir father Emperor Vivian, who for some reason or other was called general Vivian had been defeated.Indeed as this was really the month of August as a fact and many believed it was October, Violet,and her sisters were to see many bloody and horrible days before they were to see the t own of Big Girlknool.Enemy armies were threatening Randall, Maximillian, Rade liffe, and many other plac es, and t his dreadful fray that had raged at Marischanichioe showed plain y that some danger was threatening, for violet and her sisters rec ieved a letter from their paren ts by telegraph on the following morning after the battle of Abbieann which ran as follows;

"Dear daughters.Come at once. I have to remain here at t his town where I was not able to drive the Glandelinian armies bac k.Vivian Wic key is not near captured either, and your boy and girlscout regiments are in great worry bec ause you have remained in the territory of Abbieann so long, since a great en gagemen t has been reported to have raged there.I had wished to sent some of your boy and girlscouts to Evangeline C randa where the christians are raging a vigorous vigorious and fierc e seige, but they do not like to go anywhere without your consent.They stated to me that Wic key Dannin s is a failure, an d that the en emy are still in possession of the Santa Fe Works.The situation seems to dreadful for our own country and our man and helpful leader called by nickname the Mat ions Pope bec ause of his goodness believes Glandelinia is t oo strong to be whipped unless Abbieannia State up north helps us or we get outside help.But whatever you do, please just now drop the Abbieann situation and come at once.

Your Loving Father,

Called General Vivian.

At the bloody battle of Marischoochanioe general vivian had met the enemy in a terrific and titanic struggle, and after having pressed the enemy back for about nearly thirty miles, and almost winning the battle had been routed clear back all the way to their works, and it had taken about two days almost to rally the columns that were so panic stricken, while general Vivian for those two days had slaughtered the persuers with his guns and fresh divisions of infantry and kept the assailants at bay untill all the troops were rallied.Then seeing it useless to drive general vivians forces from its impregnable positions the enemy had desisted in their three days desperate assault in which over twenty five thousand charges had been made by the Glandelinians alone.

Severe and crushing as his repulse was general vivian did not withdraw his armies and did not desire to do so as long as the other christian armies were hemming in the enemy at at Fort Mowbery and Aurand-de-bondies. Bonbon a greater fortification of Evangeline Cranda was also attacked and shelled by the christians and general vivian only hoped that the christians under those commanders would soon bring about the fall of those places .The Dallie fortifications besieged by the Angelinians under general Boulton was also under heavy fire.

Really to state Evangeline Cranda was the most extensive and most extraordinary seige of the war. For the space of fourty eight miles battles had raged in quick succession, and within that same space of distance since the great seige of Mc-Whirther commenced not a single moment of the day or night was passing without the bombarding of the fortifications being continued, either by land or sea.Sea bombardments were peri odical but the christian besiegers were bombarding the fortifications incessantly and all the horrors in France and any other country of war Stricken Europe was only a show, a mere nothing compared to the bloodcurdling horror of Evangeline Cranda.During the whole seige up to this time it was estimated that 100,000,000 shells had been exploding furiously among the fortifications of Mc-Whirther and Evangeline Cranda, and still the fortifications had held out and despite desperate battles still was holding, and with the disasterous repulse of general vivians men at the last battle hoped still to raise the seige and cause the world to know that Chiristianity could never crush the glandelinian cause. So general vivian resumed the seige and only patiently awaited for the revrival of his brother Hanson so that the seige could be strengthened.

Violet and her sisters had arived at general Vivians army by rail without any mishap, and had come in time to see much of the awful battles near Marischoochanie and its horros horrors.

CHAPTER FIVE.
THE ADVENTURES OF VIOLETTAND HER SISTERS BEFORE THE BATTLES OF AURANDEPONDIA AND MARSHMALLOW.
SERIES OF UNUSUAL AND ASTONISHING ADVENTURES.

F r to the north(not snort) walled in on all sides by the rint or formations of some of the Vivian Wickey fortifications of Aurandelonia lay one of the strongest encamp ments of the Glandelinian armies.New Vivian Wickey itself, this mys terious and big city q about which we r read and hear of so often, was a large oblong c it y, divided into numbers of sections by the deltas of the Norma Run River running through it, with Mic-Whirther Janet Section in the exact center.The whole city was as the reader may remember in possession of thev larg st and most stubborn Glandelinian army ever known on record(if they did break records by the fury of their resistanc e against the tenacious seige), and was governed by general Francis Purgatorian of great milit ary bearing and power.Whole While all sections of.Vivian Wickey, were under the military l a leadership of this great and dangerous Glandelinian general, each because of the bigness and seperate portions of its armies had its own spec ial c hi f general.For instance the northern section of Vivian Wickey c alled Julio Caldic was under the leadership of general Henry Tattypoo, the Norma C atherine section by general Qun Quincy Glinda, and the other main section of Aronburg junction was under the control of general Nicholas Chopper, and it was said that he was one of the most savage and cruel Glandelinian generals ever known.The other remaining sections of Vivian Wic key, Santa Fe and Evangelinia Crania was under the leadership of seven generals of whom nothing much has been heard since the dreadful seuge seige began.But be that as it may it was in the Lucillie Territory of wortifications that t h w the main and strongest of the Glandelinian armies lay and which prevented the mighti st christian-besiegers from encroaching too close to them.The wonders and queer stories of the Oz books could not beat the mysteries of Vivian Wickey or tell of the wonders that occured there during violent st battles.The Lucillie Rickson fortifications, were extensive, and high, but formed so that they looked like immense penetentari s than fortific ations, but were procted by strong walls and powerful redoubts the like of which had never been seen,and which seemed impossible for the stfo strongest armies to even approach..On Christian military maps Vivian Wickey is marked by a large blue circle, but so strong in defense and so impenetrable are the paths tward the fortifications because of the pic kets on dur duty, few travelers not even in the army have ever glimpsed the fortifications, or the works that protect them on the outs irts outskirts.The Glandelinians don't allow even Foriigeners into vivian Wickey, and if they do get in, and the t hey are not allowed to go out under any conditions.Exc ept for the dreadful conflicts that raged along this inc redibly big line of seige, and counter seige, and resistance, and of the terrific hellish artillery and shell storms that rage almost endlessly at one point or another, no one would dare think of visiting Vivian Wic key at all.Yet in the whole curious sections of the battlefields of Vivian Wic key there are no stretches of fortific ations more int eresting or terrifying than those of the Lucillie Rickson format ions.There are five of the fortifications, each equally as large and as high, and teeming with big long range guns of every make, and outer works honeycombed with rifle pits and pit falls and the like.Instead of big guns the outer works are st rewn or teem with long range machine guns, but more numerous than any other of these guns are the "rifled parrot"guns that keep the most monsterous attacking columns of christians at bay, and from which general Rickson who gave the fortificatione the name, has fashioned his capitol city of strong fortifications .

The garrisons of these Lucillie Rickson Foritifications alone, numbered fifty one million, one hundred and seven thousand, and were t he fiercest kind of fighting Glandelinian soldiers that could ever be imagined.Before the dreadful seige when they first captured Vivian Wickey so easily,the Glandelinians in possession, were the happiest and bravest sort of soldi rs here in the world,and they had delighted in the wholesale massac res of children and women too so that the christian pop ulation of Vivinn Wic key had been litera ly been wiped out in a year, and hard suffering laboring child slaves being now in their places.but that was before Emperor Vivian, sent mos monsterous armies to beciege all sect ions of Vivien Wickey, and to guard all ap proaches to Vivian Wic key.since then though they have so long resisted gallantly and bravely and have sec retly recieved supplies through underground tunnels visr to C alvorine, the Glandelinian generals and their armies h have been virtual risoners within Vivian Wickey,and the fortifications.

The great flock of ecitions at Jennie Vivian Town on Sunbeam C reek in whic h the Glandelinians had first been in possession have been destroyed by the monsterous christian attacks during the past battles of Delight's Junction or Sunbeam C reek, and only one a in a while does a Glandelinian army ever dare to try to make some sort of an attempt to re l replace them.The loss of this position was one of the greatest griefs this Glandelinian general had suffered and had he not been a brave general he might have surrendered his army and the city long before now.One no doubt would wonder that so unfortunate a Glandelinian general, Purgatorian could endure life at all, for Vivian Wickkey to him and his armies with all its privations, the horrors of cold winters,and hot summers , the steady christian shell fire, making it appear like the steady worlds end was an infernal region.But general Purgatorian was so desperate, stubborn and determined, and so naturally overconfident, that even in the face of all his misfortunes, he was calm and uncomplaining and often had had whole days at a time when he forgot to be alarmed and disconcerted. Despite the rigorous seige his armies had everything necessery for as much comfort as possible, and therefore his Glandelinian soldiers were light hearted and brave, and always obedient to the desires of their generals.Too the resolve of every christian effort would lift the heaviest heart.To further lighten the sorrows and fears of this great enemy general, there was an army of child slaves working day and night by shiftn/.

Nowhere in any Glandelinian possession were there such great number of child slavery who hoped for freedom in vain.Then too general Purgatorian was fortunate to have at his headquarters famous spies, militery police and so on who could watch out for and detect every plan of the besieging christian generals.

About a week or so after the great battle of Varieschoessen i o, general Purgatorian looking out of one of the windows of a fortitic fortifications, was gazing dreamily off toward the distant christian seige fortifications.He was thinking of the old happy days, when war was a thing unknown, and only half listening to the drum drum of firing some far distance off to the south.At his chief side was one of his chief advisers.

"Has your Excellency ever considered,"said one of his advisers-s peaking with difficulty as he had a bad cold in the head--has your Excellency ever considered how many points of our positions have been neglected neglected.With a little training we could teach all the child slaves here to build and form such strong positions everywhere else that even the whole Athiennian nation could not so much as approach us.Take the Lucillia Rickson Fortification for instance--"

General Purgatorian passed his hand uneasily over his face, and one of the other officers looked up from a map he was studying and began to mutter crossly under his breath."Take the Lucillia Rickson Fortifications for the change."continued the adviser persuasively"with all these child slaves we could strengthen them well and make them such fortifications that even the fiercest christian shell fire could not do the slightest harm."

General Purgatorian with a slight wink at one of his under generals,, had just stepped to one of the bigger windows, when a shuddering explosion, which sounded upon the ground outside of the fortress, but which was absolutely in the sky, shook the whole place as if there had been a dreadful earthquake.It was the well known "Gang-gang-shells. The chandeliers fell, and the remaining one rattled like a coat coat, ornaments suddenly left their accustomed places, and flew through the air,chairs either jumped into corners, and a carpet shook off three tables and a dresser,and all chairs on it, and rolled up so rapidly it caught one of the generals unawares,reared stiffly on end, and stood in a corner.It seemed unbelievable, but it has been proved in many cases, where the forceful viberations of explosions have done things to make a person believe the house was possessed by evil spirits.The general and his staff had been thrown to the floor by the concussion, and one of them recieved a perfect shower of ceiling plaster and a ceiling rafter, and was inmured seriously/..A clock had fallen down and hit another of the generals on the head.

"The christian dogs are firing on us again with those dreaded Gang-gang-shells"quavered general Johns rushing recklessly over to one of the wide apertures in the fortifications."Great guns and little fishs what will happen next!"

As if to answer the old generals question, the fortifications rocked more violently than ever before a dreadful roar of hundreds of great cannons, and everything thudded and resounded in echoes of terrifying din from distent or near exploding of many high explosive shells of different calibres.The waters of the great Norman Run River some distance off began to toss and bubble, and presently in the distance to the south rose a frightful yellow cloud suddenly turning blue and black and there came a detonation as if a vol volcano had exploded.The cloud before disolving seemed to take on a queer and sinister monster shape, with fire seeming to shoot from its eyes, and red smoke from its mouth.As many of those who witnessed the scene clutched at supporting objects to keep from falling, another great cloud somewhere was seen to rise upward as if from the crater of a gigantic volcano.It twisted andcurled and spiraled forming itself finally into a long black wreath, coming closer over head and hanging for a time like a dark threat of doom.

"If we could capture or capture those daring Vivian Girls, we could hold them and threaten to destroy them utterly unless the besiegers drew off."declared one of the generals."

At that same instant general Hanconin Rickson came hurring into the room.

"Every one of you are literall dunces."shrieked general Rickson, shaking his long finger under the noses of one of the generals."Why do you all stand there idle, when this whole section of the Rickson Fortifications are in danger."General Purgatorian is in danger, every one is in danger, and one of the distent positions is being attacked so fiercely by the christian dogs, that it is being in danger of being destroyed utterly.Utterly.Utterly.Utterly."

Pacing around in a frenzied circle, Rickson began to tear out [illegible] his hair and cast it upon the floor.His loud out cries aroused the chief general. He unsteadily made his way to the upper aperture.The black cloud was growing bigger.After listening to the advice of his generals he said mournfully:

"Where are any of my agents or spies to find the Vivian Girls, and to condemn them to such a fate if the besiegers will not desist."

"Here come one of our girlscouts Jane Holin"panted general Brenner, ducking his head as a small fragment of some explosion thrown debris came sailing through the window and struck the opposite wall with a bang."Each of the Glandelinian girlscouts and boys too took turns on some sort of military or guard duty, and the last to be on such duty had been Hollis and now she was off."Not caring to go too far into the enemys lines the Angelinian soldiers had never so far molested any of the Glandelinian boy and girlscouts, as the Glandelinian glandelinians tried to do to theirs .

So far too all of the christian gunners had satisfied themselves with attacks upon the frontier of the fortifications, preventing any of the mean enemy soldiers from entering their lines, and shaking the whole of Vivian Wickey up with a most terrific cannonade, when ever they wished to amuse themselves at the sad expense of the enemy . The situation of Vivian Wickey these days with the increasing of the numbers of christian besiegers was now all the more alarming. While general Purgatorian continued to groan, and all other generals appeared very much worried, Colonel Maraden hurried anxiously over to the girlscout.

"My child stuttered the colonel, touching her gently on the arm"What has happened are you hurt.

"The enemy is making an awful assault upon our works somewhere."somewhere she answered, wiping her eyes on her handkerchief for thick powder smoke had made her eyes full of tears.

"A strategic ious and dangerous thing for us."fumed general Ric keen:"what portion of the wor s works may I ask."

"A reporter said its ranging somewhere near Aurandebonis.Those Vivian Girls are responsible they saw for they are Princesses you know and command christian armies wherever they go and yet do anything the generals ask.I found an old account of them in some papers that some general had secured some time ago, and I know what they must be too."The girl paused to wipe her eyes as they still smarted from the smoke."I believe the Christian dogs will bombard us next."

"Let them try it."r roared general Ric keen stamping furiously upand down.

"Those devilish mischievious wenches with their dreaded boy and girlscout recipients and patrols have ruined us all or will.Nothing can save us now."

"In to emphasize his gloomy prediction, the fortifications again began to tremble violently as if an earthquake was coming on.It was caused by a distent but tremendous cannonade in the direction of Aurandebondin. General Purgatorian looked steadily out of one of the windows.

"I must think what can be done."muttered general Purgatorian in a faint voice.

"Think if you can"sniffed general Rickson also looking out the window."Can to think the capture of violet ,and her sisters or their coming into these works as prisoners?Can you think of a way to bring an end of this seige ,event"

"Hold your tongue"said general Purgatorian."I'm doing this business not you. If you were in my place you'd be the first to surrender.I'll never do it."

"Can your excellency forget ten the great inactive guns on our higher works?"

Swinging backward and forward on the pole he was holding onto, as the fortifications continued to rock to and fro, general Toddie paced inquiringly at the general.

"The bigger guns."stuttered general Purgatorian."No one can yet man those guns as the besiegers are too near and they would only hurl shells ineffectually to their rear.That is for blowing up the christian seige works if possible, and those guns are to be used in case of extreme danger."

"What do you call this?"demanded general Rickson indif indignantly."Are we to hurl our troops into a bloody battle for nothing."

"I told you to hold your tongue."said Purgatorian more sternly/"Don't let me have to tell you again.Where's general Philindor.Where is he. Send for him.I have a plan I believe."

Glad to escape from the confusion, and keeping her feet with great difficulty, Holin ran off to search for that particular general.By the time she reached his position, the ground had stopped quivering,and the counting of cannon in the distance having slacked down.Breathlessly Holin hastened to the headquarters of the general, where the general was busy.At the first concussion he had been thrown face downward on the floor by the vibration/.

Put no accustomed was general Philiador to the tempers of the christian artillery storms and hurricanes of exploding shells and the like,that he thought nothing of the terrible "battle quakes" that rocked the grounds, and the positions from time to time.When the roar of distant cannonading, and the shaking had ceased, general Philiador had resumed his work, and was pouring over a map when the girlscout was admitted into his presence by the sentry at the door. As quickly as she could,Haida told him of what was going on,.Then a he dismissed her and raced for general Purgatorians headquarters .When he c m came in general Rickson was feverishing thumbing over an old geography full of maps, and the other generals were conversing in subdued whispers.

"The only one who usually can help us, and who has several times done so is General Manley and the others under him:"mused general Purgatorian, as general Philiador stood at attention before him.

"Let me go to him."begged this general eagerly."Surely he will be able to find some way to destroy the besieging armies, before the christian dogs capture or destroy us.And certainly for what we have done in Vivian Wickey we won't recieve any quarterons big as our armies are."

"No,no: it is too dangerous.and besides you c annot get through anywhere.If you c ould slip past the christian sentries all right, but the boy and girlscout troup frequently go out on patrols,and no Glandelinian squadron can cope with them even though they're little brats.Besides with the chris tian nickels on the watch, and all these little brats too there's no way to cross the river.We must think of something else."

Taking off his hat, general Purgatorian g gazed sadly off into the distance.long long ago word had been brought in by the Glandelinians called "Blue Gulls" of the capture by the Glandelinians under Wylatza of th e city of Womld, and whic h army was now in possession and holding the town as a military base forwith to make preparations to besiege Angelinia Agathin as soon as more comes to his help. Great had been the rejoicin g within all the fortifications at Vivian Wickey and how hopefully general Purgatorian had waited for Manley therefore to be relieved of his command so he could take command of ar ies closer to Vivian Wickey, and advance to deliver him nd and his armies from the "cruel"clutches of Mansions besiegers.But time had passed, and nothing had happened.Much of the mischief done by the christians nearest to south Vivian Wickey had been remedied by Manley, but Manley had often been frustrated by the Vivian leaders and other generals in the terrific batt les of the past, and so thus far Manley had not been able to do anything to help him, i even if he would desire to do so.But general Purgatorian always felt that some day eneral Manley would rec ieve command of bigger armies, and come to his rescue.It was hoped so more ardently for Manley was in possession of Glindia and Tattypoo towns and said to be slowly advancing the greater portion of his army tward Big Girl Knool." As he cont inued to gaze unswervingly straight ahead, as general Rickson continue d to mutter, and others to converse in whispers, general Philiador grew more and more c oncerned about the situation.Finally he left the headquarters and returnin g to his own headquarters, sat down gloomily in his own chair.

"If I could just find a fin way to cross the river without interference from those christian child scouts, or the Vivian Girls."muttered the general."Then I could travel and reach general Manleys army.This Glandelinian general though fierce against christians was braver than usual, and also his wife and children where always with him.As his own wife and children were about him he told them of the situation at Vivian Wickey, and of the concentration of many christian guns discovered whic h if they let go with powerful e shells would destroy the outer positions.His wife listened with great concern, and then dec ided to do something to help him. Comforted in spite of himself but resolved to say nothing at all to general Purgatorian or his aids, general Philiador went back to his own commands.

During the time this had occured it had been or at ill was night time late in August, and still general Purgatorian, and his staff generals h had thought of no plan to wreck the plans of the christian generals.In t he generals headquarters general Ric keen and Purgatorian pored over the maps of all the territories surrounding Vivian Wickey, and all the land fortifications trying to devise some way out of the dreadful difficulties, but as the rivers rivers of the seige would allow no one to leave even within one hundred feet outside of the fortifications without facing certain death from shell fire or bullet storms, how were they to try to send any one out to capture the Vivian girls, if even such a thing in the face of the many thousands of Abbiannian child scouts were a possibility. And these children soldiers were becoming an ever increasing menace to all the Glandelinian generals everywhere.

"And if we did capture these P Vivian Girl Princesses"sighed general Purcatorian wearily"We could never dare do them any harm, because if we did it would be still worse for us, and those scouts would get us even within our own confines.I'm afraid we cannot capture them to you save our positions from assault."

"Then we must surrender the whole territory or parish,I suppose."rubbing his noses high up on his wrinkled forehead general Drumdrum looked ruminally at general Purgatorian"It might be perdition for all of us if we're all killed for what we did and allowed to be done here to hundreds of thousands of children"observed the general yet trying to look on the cheerful side of things."

"Well we still have plenty of ammunition, provisions and st rong bodies of troops." mumbled general Purgatorian unhappily."Maybe something will turn up."

"Nothing will ever turn up here but your Excellency's nose!"sniffed general Rickson to himself, and who had been listen listening to the conversation with growing pains and impatience"You may stay here and fight and be destroyed by those christian dogs if you like, but I, I shall think of something better.I'll frustrate t h the besiegers myself and you can go to---"

Folding his poncho haughtily about him, general Ric keen swept from the council room.In his own room he swung the casements used to cover window apertures wide, and leaning both elbows on the sill, sa stared moodily out into the night, and at the red glare brightening the skies from many big fires, and watched glu gloomily the lightning like stab of many burn bursting shells in the far distance .

Surely it's better to destroy even those pinky little Vivian Girls, than to see ourselves destroyed, and even ain't they our enemies"reflected general Rickson. "I always believed the way to solve a problem is to begin at the beginning and go on to the conc lusion.General Purgatorian desires the ca ture of those Vivian brats, and they he shall have at all costs.Now where am I to find a way to get there!"!

Striding to the backcase he pulled out a sort of history of the Vivian Girls and their doings once written by general Manley, a and which he opened almost lost at instantly to the pict ures of seven beautiful little girls sitting on a bench under a tree.

"The Seven Princesses of Abbiannia"muttered the general, reading then the names under the picture."These little girls are loved and honored by the entire nation of Abbiannia, and woe betides them to harm them in any way."

General Rickson paused thoughtfully after reading t his sentence, then tearing out the page carefully, stuffed the picture into his inside coat pocket.

"They ought to be easy to capture"he remarked with a little shrug of his shoulders" and all that I have to do now is to try and get into the christian lines."

Standing before a huge map of the Vivian Wickey territory,that covered one side of the wall,the general trac ed with his finger, a line between the Lucillia Rickson Fortifications and the christian positions across the fatal and bloody Nerve Run River.Not a great distance to be sure, but because of the christian scout scouts and patrols,and also patrols of boy and girlscouts it was a very dangerous journey and a most difficultbusiness.Even strangers would have to know the counter sign and have the pass word to even get near a sentry.sinking into an easy chair, he began tugging at his whiskers, and soon a splendidly perfect plan popped into his head/

"I can get in probably disguised as an escaping christian spy."puffed Rickson delightedly."

Jerking out his book book on the descriptions of various disguises that christians are usually wear, the general turned to the proper page. Soon he found a good one to suit him. "

"Well"he mused"If general Purgatorian is too stupid to do anything myself himself I myself shall do what I can at any cost to save our positions from capture or destruction."

General Purgatorian as it happened was at that very moment thinking of sending some of his most clever sec ret service men into the christian lines.

"If nothing turns up to morrow"mused the general, blowing out the tall candle beside his bed."I shall command general Philiador to go forth on the mission he desired, and take the secret service men with him.I and all the troops have gallently held Vivian Wickey for a long, long time, and do not want any disaster to happen now.It's general Manleys own fault for these massacres of children here anyway and it should be up to him therefore to help me drive the avenging christ ian armies away.I will send agents to him too and try and have him made to do something."

Comforted by the thought that any one of the Manleys would come to his aid if warned of Vivian Wickeys grave danger, and that through them Vivian Wic key would escape so hard a fate,general Purgatorian sank his dehhh head down on his pillow but nevertheless he lay tossing the whole night and could not sleep. H. would not have been able to even secure a moment ry wink of sleep had he seen the two figures that presently stepped out of his headquarters.

He passed near the East orn Grand works into the int renchments, the other from the generals own room, and after gazing all around to see that he was not observed, hastened down to the river shore.In the moonlight trying to obtain a through the battle smoke haze the fortifications beyond floated like a city of dreams in a strange gray mist.Looking over his shoulders at the glinting cannons general Philiador wondered if he should ever have the nerve courage to leave this secure spot and even so much as approach the dangerous christian positions.Then catch ing a glimpse of one of those horrid eruptions caused by exploding gang gang shells in the distance, and the cloud rising suddenly in the distance amidst a fl s flash like lightning, the general shuddered as he heard its reverbrating thundor, and gathering his gray uniform cloak about him hurried down to where his horse was in waiting for him.He wondered if his wife had kept her promise, and looked anxiously up and down the river shore.There was no one in sight but the pickets and a picket officer occasionally riding up and down, and dejectedly he was about to return to his own headquarters, when a low whistle from a near by tree came to him.As riding tward the tree,the Glandelinian general stopped in perfect astonishment.Seated upon a horse and regarding him with bright interest was one of the highest and most clever of Glandelinian military detectives.

"you wish to try and enter the christian lines and thence get to Manley far offf"asked the detective quietly.

"Yes."

"Follow me then.I will direct you wherever ne forth you wish to go."

With assent ly a nod(round) the two officials rode away.

In the meantime general Rickaen standing underne shell wrecked tree saw a great glow cloud aroun the moon.Then there came a crash as of the world coming to an end in that direction, and brushing his hands uneasily over his eyes he looked again but the cloud had sailed onward.Concluding that the shell explosion had been too far off to do any harm,the general drew a deep breath, and leaning forward listened to other sounds he heard.Then mounting to the top of the tree he looked around fo with his glasses.Now general Rickaen hardly knew what to expect, but the thing that did happen exceeded his wildest imagination.Christian pickets on the ot her far side of the river no doubt by the air or aid of a star shell saw him in the tree, and there was a p r perfect fusillade of shots fired in the generals direction.

Somewhat scared, he quickly dismounted from the tree, sh ilding his body from the hail of bullets as he did so.If his heart would have leaped into his boots he was not worse frightened.He then crouched motionless and almost helpless.Then recovering a little as the sound of shots died out he motioned his line and said weakly;

"I'm going to disguise myself and go into the christian lines.It was not long before he was disguised as a christian spy and on his way.But the problem was to get in.No glandelinian under any condition will even if he know how make the sign of the Cross, and that is the main c hristian counter sign which if no one will or knows how to make, cannot even get in with the password, or a pass.

Within the christian lines facing the enemy works at Aurandelandia especially of those of the ever meaning christian boy and girlscout regiments, who if they see one starting can easily stop a child massacre themselves and without help, was a Glandelinian soldier dressed as a tailor, and there was no sound except the distant noise of commanding, and the occasional roar of of some explosions.The man was called Dan on the Han by those who might have known him and to avoid being discovered he bought old clothes, which he had rea lly needed and pressed again as he really in fact was a tailr tailor.But this day he was to strive to see if he could discover whether any of the Vivian Girls were within these ranks of boy and girlscouts, and he was hurriedly stitching up a rent in a sort of blue dress suit that some boyscout had sold him that very morning.It was worn and shabby of course but surveying himself in the mirror mirror, he felt that he looked as good as he possibly could and that either the soldiery or the child scouts could not detect his purpose here.Well pleased with his appearance he n dded to his nodded to his reflection and taking down a second hand high hat from his shelf let himself out into the murky dawn.It was a warm morning in so late the year , and coming to the end of the Comap Company street Dan struck out across a small clearing, whistling a f softly to himself.He would have preferred his pipe but he couldn't am ke smoke, as no man no matter who he is is allowed to smoke within any boy or girlscout camp unless it be in honor of some grand occasion, and then could only do so in the open center of the company street. But he saw no one around, and therefore he took out one of his cigars, and placing one between his teeth; he fumbled in i his pockets for the box of matches h had surely placed there before starting.As he lit it and threw the match down to the ground he noticed in the dusk a strange small book that from its cover looked to be one of the Catholic prayer books carried by the soldier children.

"What's this!"exclaimed Danny in surprise, and picking it up he hurried glanc ing over its pages.It was c not a prayer book as he had thought, and too it was filled with closely written paragraphs, in a strangely but well written hand.As It was of foriegn longue language he could'nt read it.He at nattled his specs ka more firmly, and tried to read a whole paragraph aloud, maintaining his line between the long hard sentences, and keepin his cheoir c igar in place in i his mouth with the greatest difficulty.

"Well did any one ever see or hear the liker of this."The chuckled Danny winking up at one of the trees standing close to his feet."What do you think of it yourself Mr Tree."QOAf.

winking u at one of the trees standing close at his feet."W t do you think of it yourself Mr Tre e."

"I hardly know."came the voice of some girl behind his back."I hardly know. But I've been shadowing you everywhere .Just guess what you have in that book you just picked up."

"Goodness Gracious."

"And you know you are not allowed to smoke in this camp."

The cigar fell from Daniels lips,the high hat from his head, and hurling the leather book into a clump of busi bushes,he gave the girlscout one good look, gasped"It's that dangerous Angelinia Aronburg",I thought she was still in a hos pital""and then turned and fled as if for his life, bumping into trees and benches and overturning the benches, and running in the opposite direction from where he had intended to go.Gertrude Angelina for it surely was she, had been suspicious of him ever since she saw him in camp and she ordered a persuit immediately remounting her horse and preparing to lead the way.

"Confound those girlscouts but they're dangerous.If I only had a gun." murmured the Glandelinian spy determinedly."I must have g a rifle.I don't see why anyhow my chief always sends me to do this.I don't mind spying on christian dog soldiers that's difficult enough to be sure, but to spy into the affairs of these soldier children, why it's like prying into the business of the devil.I must have a gun, a pistol or a rifle.What' I have suffered all these days.Ah-h-h.""

"Catching sight of some refugee child hurrying down one of the cinder paths with a rifle she was carr ing to one part of the camp, and he called loudly to her to stop.

"Stop stop, little girl.Stop I say.I need that gun."

For some seconds or so it seemed as if the little girl might have been deaf or refused to pay any attention to him, but when looking over her shoulder, she saw a blue c, clothed man running swiftly after her, waving both arms,and shoutng and swearing,, she ran faster, jumped over a hedge and fell face down among some high grass and half dead flowers/. He kicked her aside, and pulled the rifle from her hand, threatening to strike her with the butt if she yelled or cried. Then climbing over the hedge with a little grunt of satisfaction, and carrying it military style, he stew stepped carelessly ov er the little girl and cont inued cautiously down the cinder path.

"I've always wanted to see what these crazy christian dog child scouts look like."mused the Glandelinian agent, striding along cautiously"And now I am, but they're onto me now.But I wonder why I never dared to do this before.It didn't seem so hard to get away from her,adn and they say she is so dangerous."

"Why indeed was he able to run away a quickly.?"

Simply because she had not xpected such a movement on his part.The words in the little black book too must have held some strange and mysterious informat ion, but he never dreamed that the chief leader of all the girl an d boyscouts had powerful influence with all the armies like the Vivian Girls, and could cause his capture in a very short time.And ashe strode cautiously across the little encampment part, hatless, and the rifle clasped tight y in i his hand, boy and girlscouts who had come there for a quiet game of marbles before starting their military duties when the call came, stared in perfect astonishment, and then suddenly broke up their game and ran after him hollering for him to stop but he ran so fast that they bein being on foot couldn't catch him.A perfect storm of bullets flew dangerously about him and yet it was a miracle he wasn't hit. "

Those boy and girlscouts of the christian dogs are sure acting mightily severe."Grumbled the spy crossly."What's the matter with them anyway.They must have been put wise to me or somethinr."

Seeing no one around he sat down upon a small park bench to puzzle it all out,but not far away there came an eruption as if the bowels of the earth was being disgorged and the bench from the shock crumbled like a match from under him.A soldier who had been asleep on and off duty on the other hand, wakened by the noise and the terrible tumble took one glance at the smoke clouds, then rolled into a clump of shrubbery, where he lay tra trembling so violently l aves fell in showers to the ground. By the time the Glandelinian spy agent had struggled to his feet, a great crowd of boy and girlscouts had gathered.They were advancing tward him menacingly waving their rifles, shaking their heads, and looked so ferocious,that the Glandelinian soldier began to feel frightened himself.

Turning his back upon them and pretending he was unconcerned, he walked out of the square, and straight into the middle of a busy part of the camp.Here he stopped to gaze at strange fiery signals high up in the sky tward the east,when a dreadful concussion almost knocked the rifle from his hand, and a series of shouts almost raised his hair straight up on end.

A number were advancing threateningly upon him, and a shot from one had struck the butt of his rifle."But one good look at the Glandelinian spy was enough.A mounted boyscout officer leaning down seized the spy by the arm, and then reined back his horse and blew a shrill blast on his whistle.In less than a minute the whole Company street was a seething mass of men soldiers,and boy and girlscouts, all striving for the glimpse of a man who had dared to spy on them, and who had succeeded in getting away so far.Alarmed and disgusted, and protecting himself as well as he could by brandinging the long rifle, the spy decided to make good his escape.There was a huge embankment descending down to a very deep shell hole some distance ahead and if he could only throw himself down that and get up on the other side he might make his escape.It was hard to understand how a shell had ever torn such a terrific hole in the earth, but to them assembled there the yawning cavity was not in view.Seeing an opening, he knocked down about half a dozen of the boy and girls, and almost brained a soldier with the rifle butt , and then ran for dear dear life, and the crowd commenced to run after him---faster and faster,and faster..Another distant explosion of a gang shell shook the tents on both sides of the company street, but he kept his feet and dodging as best as he could the sticks stones and other objects of his persuiers,, the bewildered man ran on.Then rifle shots began to follow after him and pistols began to pop and roar in a fussilade, but being very large and almost perfectly tireless he had outdistanced their rifle and pistol range.

Seeing he had out distanced his persuers he stopped in the middle of a broad green field.

"What now!"groaned the man dismally, cuddlutching his rifle."Why in the name of Cre Creation wasn't I born a bird!Why oh why did I ever leave the Glandelinian camps."

For a few moments he stood perfectly still.Then closing his umbrella, he pulled one leg then the other out of the mud he had stepped into, and took a few steps to shake the grit from his trousers.

"At first they were not suspicious of me and now they are.I was there in the boy and girlscout camp, and now I ashore, persued by them like a mouse by a cat!"what next!"he muttered uneasily.As he gazed about with uncertainty, he noticed a blue figure almost clothed like himself but somewhat taller and stouter, riding his horse at a trot along a strange yellow brick highway that ran through the center of the fields and woods to the far distance.He had never in his whole career seen any man like this, riding a strangely clothed horse, and as the rider drew nearer he grasped his rifle firmly, and made ready to fight or run whichever it was best to do.It was the appearance as of a live Oz like scarec row on horseback.

As he came opposite he halted the horse with a loud "Woeh" and took off his hat."

"Good day sir" said the scarecrow like man politely."

The spy made an unsuccessful effort to bow himself.

"I suppose you mean good morning."he remarked stiftly.

"Have it your own way."sailed the "scarecrow"with a care free wave"and speaking of ways where are you going!"

"I am not going now I'm coming first."announced the spy sulkily.The experiences of the first few minutes had made him suspicious of everybody being a "christian dog"lookin g for him."The "Scarecrow" considered his answer for a few seconds in silence then c stepping closer inquired earnestly;

"Tell me are you a christian dog in disguise!"

"Are you!""

At this quick and unexpected turn of his question, the "Scarecrow" threw back his head and laughed heartily.

"I don't t dare to tell, en neither why I'm so disguised unless I know you more" he admitted merrily"But I do know I'm on some important mission, and its great fun to go spying around."

"Is it!" The spy ,looked dubiously into the "scarecrows"Cheerful countenance. "I'm n t sure I like it when I'm detailed to spy on a lot of posky boy and girlscouts." he sighed shakin his head doubtfully.

"Oh but you'll get used to it."

Clapping on his big hat the horseman regarded his companion attentively."You are the only man I ever se n seen sir if you're really a Glandelinian who dared enter a child scout camp of these christian dogs."He observed at last."How did you happen to get in there in the first place.".!

Therewas something so jolly and yet Glandelinian about this gaudy, clever horseman that the Glandelinian spy began to feel less afraid and worried.

"First"he began slowly"I did this on a bet with my fellow men.For many days it had been argued amongst us that there was no soldier who would dare enter the camp of these dangerous child scouts of the christians.During such an argument I heard and saw all that went on about me.And what I saw and heard was interesting enough.I watched the child scouts of these christian dogs from a great distance, listened to what I could hear about them on certain evenings when my superior officers spoke of them, and then with my telescope observed the strange habits of the christian boy and girlscouts who walked or rode about under trees and the like very close to my place of observation.If I had not dared to make that bit I believe I would not have done this and therefore would have been happy."

"You must be perfectly happy now"put in the horseman slowly"For I see you have succeeded in escapin them."

The spy shook his head impatiently at the interruption.

"Once every month I had observed"he continued pompously"I would observe a crowd of boy and girlscouts come and hang wreaths about the necks or bodies of child scouts who had done an unusally daring dead, and in long tedious speeches which I could not understand no doubt doube referred them as a great hero.Do you know how much heroism they haveshowed.?"he inquired curiously.

"Well"answered the horseman cautiously."They probably have outwitted some of our highest generals.What was the name of the highest leader of those christian child scouts anyway?Do you know!"

"I never knew untill just yesterday."replied the spy."I believe now she is that dreaded Angelinia Aronburg the noice of the dangerous christian general Concen tinian Aronburge."

"But is your name.?""""

"Ben Turpinia."

"Then I shall call you Ben."decided the horseman cheerfully."I thought that girlscout leader was wounded."

"She was but she's well now."

"Do you know anything about that Mildred Manning who was wounded in the back by one of our sharpshooters.I heard she died?"

"The spy shook his head."

"Yes if she died then I saw her ghost yesterday"he admitted."She almost caught me this morning.She was the leader of my persuers.I didn't know any one shot her" he admitted gloomily."

"Oh never mind that"said the "Scarecrow"dismounting from his horse and sitting down on a near by fallen log(get the hog("You are a speaking likeness of one of our famous spies, but how did you come to escape?It is said it's impossible to get away from them."

"I was coming to that"exclaimed Danny quickly and in short excited sentences he told how he had picked up a small book in the middle of the company street," and then he proceeded to relate his terrifying experiences, and his final escape from their encampments."It's very queer"he finished in a depressed voice."It was not really because of that confounded book.They didn't try to catch me I believe they forcibly evicted me for smoking in their camp.Smoking isn't allowed."

The horseman shook his head.

"There's no accounting for Abbieannian child scouts."he explained solemnly"But now that you are outside of their camp, as long as you remain out, things will be be different.Anybody can be among the Glandelinian camps especially when you're a real Glandelinian.They even wanted me to spy on the child scouts and I refused!"

"Is it really as dangerous as it is talked about?"asked Danny, eyeing the horseman with new interest.

"Indeed not.If you're careful it can be done."exclined the horseman loftily.

"But it is dangerous if you are not careful.They are a powerful body of girls and boy soldiers under the beneficent rule or leadership of the Vivien Girl Princesses"he waved haughtily to the left"and there lies their main camp supervised under Schofield Penrod, Angeline Richee, Mary Stenci, and others.If you wish I will take you to that part of the christian camp and if you act wise they'll never suspect.I carry Catholic Religious articles some of which I'll give you and that will admit you.If we can't get in without giving that ht hated countersign we can sneak in somewhere when its dark.But what would you like to be now since you started upon this spying career!"he asked curiously.

"Well"said Danny after a moments thought."I should like to be a real professional spy.Do you think I could ever be a real real professional spy, my Scarecrow fellow!"

"I don't see why not."he decided brightly.The way to be a real spy is to be careful in everything that you happen to do.Don't do anything to cause detection. Just begin acting like a real cautious spy would Danny my boy, and the first thing you know you'll be one.But for any cause don't smoke in their camp."

"Is that what you did?"

Danny looked doubtfully at this strange spy.The "Scarecrow nodded modestly and taking Danny's elbow, started down the yellow brick highway."Watch around carefully now, when you're mounted on my horse, for we are to enter the christian lines if possible."

"It's hard for a man to act as cautious as a spy when he has not been a real experienced one but I'll do the best I can."sighed the spy in a resigned voice.

"How do you happen to be a spy yourself?"he inquired nervously.

"That"said the horsemen airily"That is a long, long story.You see-----"

"I s ee a column of Burrough boy and girlscouts approaching on a full gallop"interrupted Danny, waving his rifle wildly."Let's urge the horse at full gallop.I believe they suspect us and are coming for us."

"Pray do not concern yourself"begged his companion earnestly"and try to act like a real spy person can't you."The scarecrow like fellow took off his hat and glanced in the direction Danny indicated.

"W-ll queried Danny nervously?"What would a real spy do now?"

"He would get this-hors e going full s' speed. "chocked the orig original spy in a hoarse shout."and he urged the horse to go at his fullest gallop.

Socfast did the horse go on the gallop that it seemed as if they fairly flew t hrough the air.And so intent were they both on getting away from the swiftly advancing squadron of bo y and girlscouts who were now firing at them they never saw the Glandelinian boyscout untill they had nearly ridden her down.

"Whoa"cried the "Sxarecrow rec ognizing her at once."We have almost ridden her down."

But the little christian dogs."quavered Danny as the horse came to a reluctant halt,and glancing fearfully over his shoulder tward the rear.

With an impatient exclamanation the other soldier dismounted from his horse, and hurried over to the Glandelinian girlscout .

"Fancy al ost running you down like this."he puffed ruefully.

"Yes fancy it indeed."gasped the girlscout."I don't fancy it at all.why don't the two of you look where you are goin g."she frowned angrily at the two men, and then catching a glimpse of the advancing Abbieannian girl and boyscouts jumped to her feet in real alarm.

"-ho are those coming yonder?"she asked in a most frightened whisper..

"They're the christian child scouts known as Burroughs."y companion e my companion here had been spying on them and no doubt they're after him."explained the "Scarec row hastily."Danny old fellow.This is Jane Starring, the sister of our great boyscout Gerald Starring.she lives with her brother."

"ut the christian child scouts."panted Danny, nodding absently to Jane.

"You see my dear Danny and I were escaping from the Abbieannian child scouts, when we almost ran you down." apologized the "Scarecrow"man with an anxious glance upward. and then to the rear.

"I don't see any child scouts approaching tward us now." Jane looked to the rear and after they had all gazed intently for several minutes they had to admit that little Miss Starring was right. There was not even the sight of a single person anywhere.

"ut those columns of girl and boyscouts are very tricky, and they're most fearful to encounter."the spy himself assured her.Jane gae gave a little sniff and while she did not exactly say so both spies felt that she did not believe the christian girl and boyscouts were as fierce as they were said to be/.

"I was hoping for a chance to see you."continued the man disc disguised as a scarecrow in a slightly embrassed voice."How fortunate that we met this way, now we three can go into the christian lines tot together.Jane looking down at her skinned knee and feeling the lump on er her forehead which she had received sometime before when escaping from christ ian boy scouts, could not help thinking it had been so fortunate for her, but being a reallly sweet tempered little girl desnite being a Glandelinian, she said nothing further but remounted her own horse,, and rode along quietly between these two singular looking gentlemen.. The man who was disguised as a scarecrow she had kn wn for nearly a whole year,,, but she kept stealing strange inquisit ive glances as his stran e companion.Seeing her evident interest, the "scarecrow told her all about Danny's stran e adventure, and how he managed to escape from the encampment of the boy and girlscouts of the Nationals.

"Do you thin k I can ever reallly be a professional spy!"asked Danny wistfully as the scarecrow finished his story."Now as you see my experience was because I did not kn w how to carry myself in the camps when they were after me.I l also forgot myself and smoked which no w one is allowed to do.But I wish to be like other great spies of our gracious Glandelinian army, to also hinder the Vivian Girls from bringing the news of their discovery of the Abbieann disaster and the like to the christian armies further b yond."

It was hard to imagine this pop pompous looking soldier trying to interfer with the really most dangerous of all the christian chief girlscouts, violet,and her sisters, But Jane had seen stranger things than this happen durin durin her time in the Glandelinian army so stifling her misgivings, smiled at him kindly.

"You will have to be a little careful about monkeying with those Vivian Girl Princesses"she cautioned gently"Not to give yourself away to any one, or to let even the shrewd foxy Vivian Girls detect you in the slightest degre e, or-----"""""

"He,he"roared the man who appeared like a scarecrow."I should say you had better be careful."One mishap from your carelessness, or if any one discovered you, you'd be facing a firing squad in a hurry.And because most of us Glandelinians have massacred child slaves and other christian children in those horrible ways you yourself have seen all child scouts are as merciless to us as wolves are to their prey."

At this the inexperienced spy looked so downcast, that the Glandelinian girlscout really felt very sorry for him.

"I guess any sort of a Glandelinian or woman spy is not much of any use."he sighed looking sadly at the lit tle girl.

"But then you can do anything if you're terribly strong."Jane reminded him cheerfully ""nd you can bring good results for our big armies in a battle.And besides after a while when you're quite used to being a spy I wouldn't mind going on many spying trips with you."finished Jane in a little burst of genericusity.

W"Wouldn't you?"sto pping stock still, Danny began to how."My dear"exclaimed the spy gratefully, and bending so low he almost lost his balance"Those are the kindest words I have ever heard since I became a spy."

Jane pleased and delighted at such appreciation curtsied back.

"Hurrah.Hurrah."shouted the spy disguised as a scarecrow. and tossing his hat into the air."You are acting more wiser every minute..... Do you know it reminds me of my first spying expedition into the christian armies.I was always the accomplished person you see before you, because I'm not really a Glandelinian but a foriegner and have spied for other nations besides Glandelinia.but I've done more for Glandelinia than any other.I am a very successful spy"he confided mysteriously.

For a long long, time (get your dime) Danny had been trying to puzzle out, just whatkind of a person this man made up as a "scarecrow reallly was.Never in his whole exp rience during the war had he seen any one so curiously disguised, so steady, powerfully built, and yet so gay and such a good horse back rider. He listened attentively therefore as the professional spy(pie) began to tell his story to hi s new found friend and companion.

"I am just now disguised as a scarecrow because I hoped to discover some information by posing as one within one of those cornfields within the christian lines" he began impressively, and it must be admitted he was as fond of talking about talking about himself as most of the other spies ever known.Jane who had heard the story only once also listened attentively.

"I'm a professional s t spy"he began impressively.I won't tell who I am as something might give me away, but I intended to come here to the christian lines, and to enter any section I can disguised as a sort of Scarecrow.The mask I have on and ers like a head of a scarecrow with the features neatly painted on.This blue suit, and those black boots, and blue cotton gloves belonged to the farmer from whom I stole them from, also this hat.Having assembled myself in this more or less careless fashion, I decided to enter the christian lines, but found the christian scout patrols, of both child scouts, and cavarly soldiers too numerous to take a chance during the daytime.For a long th time this morning I hun g aroundnot knowing how I could ever succeed in entering the enemys lines.Then two hours before this along came the well known Dorothy Gale, a little girlscout official about the same size of little Jane here.She had quite a squadron of girl and boyscouts with her, those fierce Vivianites.Well to make a long story short, I think it was what the Christian dogs call a miracle that I was not captured."

"Well how did you escape!"d did she see you?"

"Yes indeed she did.She and her followers persued me hard for miles.I fled across fields, leaped high fences to twart them and swam a stream but they were after me close to my very heels.but while I was so desperately persued I realized that I could never allow my self to be captured so I di decided to head for a quick sand bed which they knew not i nothing about , got across the bridge over it, and break it down before they got there."

"Well did you."

Danny looked curiously at the "Scarecrow.

"No I didn't succeed.They were on the bridge the same time I reached the other end.I decided to sell my life dearly and whipped out my pistol, shooting down the horse of the leader.It fell in the middle of the bridge and that checked my persuers.I would have shot down the girl herself, but I had to suddenly dart behind a thick tree as fifty of them opened fire on me.I have heard that all those boy and girlscouts of the various christian armies are the finest in all the country, and their doings is almost like magic, and wherever they may be around a massacre of children by us is stopped in a hurry, and their vengeance will be terrible.Once a Glandelinian was captured who alone had been "gutting two little girls, and the girlscouts themselves hung him from the branch of a tree,and built a very hot but slow coal fire underneath him. His screeches and screams could be heard a mile.Not only are those christian boy and girlscouts dangerous but they for the Vivian Girls and others have always solved may problems of state, and have as their highest chieftian next to the Princesses, Angelinia Aronburg.I' terribly scared of that girlscout cautian.She can frustrate us Glandelinians in anything we do, can't she Jane?"

The Glandelinian girlscout nodded plo politely, and Danny much impressed and some what scared, watched the "Scarecrow" put on his hat. I have an assistant much smaller than myself who is called "Jeff s by my friends while I'm called "Butt.We are

"Did the girlscouts finally ca ture you" "asked Danny, as the "scarecrow"stopped to looked around as he thought he heard the sound of swiftly galloping horses.

"Certainly not"answered the spy"But I know they're still scouti scouring the country for me.We have to look out. But the most dangerous though is that Jennie Francis Turner my main girlscout arch enemy.she is alwa s with the Vivian Girls, and so is Angelinia Aronburg, B etsy and Trot Anderson too."

"Does there be a boy leader there too called Penrod?"questioned Danny eagerly"And do you think we could spy on his gan g."

"Of course, but if I were you I should stay away from any of those boy and girlscout camps.There are lots of the child scouts who in watchfulness and shr wd shrewdness puts an owl to shame.Think of the disadvantages of meer meeting with that savage little christian devil Angelinia Riches."Tapping Danny lightly on the shoulder he continued"First of all no one can succeed in spying on them.why they have all the advantages their own way without any inconviencences.Isn't that true Jane? "

Jane smiled and made a gesture that might have been yes or no.It would have taken a most wiser person than Jane to settle a question like that.She knew very little about christian boy and girlscouts.she would soon know though. They were drawing nearer to the main soldier section of the christian encampments every moment now.The air was hot and smoky, and there was the l noise of loud firing somewhere far away.On each side of the road but far to the front loomed ornamous purple painted barracks. The seige works were seen in front.

"Well"laughed Jane, dancing along through a pleasant little wood"We'll soon be close to the christian lines, and then---and then---;

"Then what?"wheezed the "a scarecrow" stopping to swing on a ,low branch. "Why then we'll be able to learn something about that "Abbieann discover" of the Vivian Girls"exclaimed Jane."Didn't they discover what caused the destruction of Abbieann. eWe'l if we can frustrate their plans everything will be all right."

Danny was not sure at all what had happened at Abbieann, he had heard very little if nothing at all about it, but so long as Jane knew what it was he knew everything would be all right."We will have to be careful around here."continued the little girl with a warning look---"and and---"

" STOP, the three of you do you hear roared an imperious voice almost in their very ears."Now then the three of you are under arrest .Will you come along without resistance or must I shoot you down."?

At this sudden chorrid interruption, Danny and the "scarecrow" looked in the direction of the sound in perfect astonishment.

"Abyssinkilian cavarly troopers."faltered Jane.

"Urge the horses on." Those awful Christian dogs."panted the "Scarecrow trying to urge his horse forward.

"Retreat if you want to"rumb ed the other stopping short."but I shall stay here and fight.Get away from here you wild christian dogs.Leave little Jane alone you dity hellhounds"and brandishing his rifle threatdn threateningly he urged his horse between the little girls and the column of Abyssinkilian troopers who were closeing in around them.But it was of no use to resist.They were all armed with long ugly looking sawres,and lances, and one of the officers of the Abyssin kilians almost had the features of the "famous Wizard of Oz."

"You resist, and not one of you three will be alive"he cried as all the soldiers drew their sabres."You're under arrest.Boy and girlscouts are looking for you everywhere.Especially that "SCARECROW".

There was no use for argument.They were caught and they n knew it.

"On to the camp"he commanded to his horsemen, as fourteen arrayed themselves on a each side of the prisoners.

It had taken these soldiers about three hours,or nearly that long to s atent search, for these prisoners after the inexperienced spy had escaped from the child scout camp.It took scarcely fifteen minutes to bring them in, so that it was a little after ten oclock in the morning, when the troopers and their prisoners reached the main outskirts of the christian seige camps.Not a word had been spoken by anyone during the entire horseback ride toward camp.Jane at being captured at started to scream,but one of her ca captors had almost chocked her and therefore she for her own good remained quiet.Danny was too startled to say anything.But as the leader of the cavarly troop gave the order by signal to slow down,Jane with a long sigh glanced around the encampments through which she was being led.The encampments were as huge as some monsterous city, and at the sight of it, Jane would have gave a little sigh or gasp of relief and pleasure had she not been a prisoner.But frightenedthough she was,Janes heart nevertheless began to beat with excitement and curiousity. Surely nothing so very dreadful could happen to her from the christian soldiery in a place like this, though there was no telling what would be done to the two spies.But th though they saluted many ho officers the cavarly troops did not stop, and riding on through the beautiful encampment carried them to the extreme end of the christian lines.

Here the encampments of the chrsitians were seperated by ornamous christian seige positions, earthworks, fortifications, and great lines of always t hundering artillery for the christian batteries were never silent,and the noise was like an ever erupting volcano so near.One great battery of the Orizon position were pounding and roaring between two high crossroads and ever walled up in black and white smoke.They shook the ground with their din.Between the two batteries, and within sight of another huge encampment, the officer who appeared in features like the famous "Wizard of Oz" halted his column.The spies were now speechless with indignation.

"You"said the christian cavarly officer"You two men are suspected to have been spies roaming through the encampments of the Vivianites.They've scou red the country for you and even "iss Angelinia Aronburg had sent me and my troop out after you.I'm bringing you back to their camps."He shook his finger in Janes face."You girlscout of the enemy may not have been complicated in what these men done but you were with them anyhow.You may escape the pa penalty of being a spy but you'll be a prisoner of war just the same."

As Jane blinking her eyes between shock,and consternation tried to understand what it was all about, there came the snort of a number of horses, and the galloping of a number of horses at that,and the cries of girls and boys, and in tward this second camp came riding a squadron of boy and girls headed by what the other spy said, by Captian Dorothy Mildred Gale".

"Here's your prisoners Miss Glae said the colonel saluting."I overtook them by the Turnpike near St Johns Crossronds. The girl was with them, but I know not why or what she was doing.But's she's a Glandelinian girlscout just the same."

"I don't know not i nothing about those two"she said indicating the "Se arecrow, and Jane, but it's he I wanted"sh e indicated tward Danny."He caused a commotion in camp and that is why he's wanted.But I'll hold the other two too for investigation?"

At sight of these girl and boyscouts, who looked fierce enough to them,Danny nearly lost his balance.As for Jane and the man disguised as a Scarecrow, they could not do anything. The prisoners were put in close custody and then said Dorothy Gale:

"I will make it hot for those Glandelinians never fear.It's their fault that I and my followers had a horrified exi experience in trying to chase after them.Maybe they did it, and maybe they didn't, but Heaven Bless us we ran plump into a sort of forest fire.We had then urged our horses in fullspeed in the only direction open to us--straight into the clearing of the woods.We dashed through just as a long tongue of flame shot b from the nearest trees.The flames were so close and the smoke so heavy,that the smoke blackened our very faces."

"I thought that s no one could be albe to start fires here without being caught at it."said Mildred Maxwell.

"Well maybe this fire was started by shells."said Dorothy."But when we were pwersued by the fire, my sister Anne said"Oh Hurry,here it comes." At another time so splendid was the scene and so high and bright the flames that we might have paused to admire the great conflagration, but when the roaring inferno at our very heels, we scarcely glanced at the rapidly approachin fire raigng from right and left.We came upon a brook, and tried to cross it, but it was no easy matter for the horses galloping over the rocks and boulders in the water.The flames lighted up the whole sc ene m and made the night of our early morning as bright as day.The fire literel y roared and swirled behind us filling the air with so much smoke as if it was the end of the world. My sister was scared, and said over and over again"If we're overwhelmed we'll be only ash heaps."Her horse leaped wildly from boulder to rock, and once stumbled.

"Some of the others then cried out "What shall we do now,for we were forced to stop in dismay, for we had come to a part of the forest where the trees were too thick to get through,and where even though we could do so, the horses would have b to be left behind."y sister glanced around desperately, but finally she gave a command of"Quick ladies go through this narrow clearing.There was just time for all us us to get some distance through the woods down that clearing, before the fire camps came almost upon us. "y sister then wondered where we were to go now.The t rees even before us were sizzling and burning like a display of a world of fireworks, and it seemed as if we were in danger of being burned to a crisp.I tried to wave the cloud of smoke from before my eyes, and peered anxiously forward as we proceeded on full speed.

"what do we need to do now"my sister had asked anxiously for the fire was in danger of really overtaking us.We tried to find better means of escape, and we were disgusted at the thought that such a thing could happen because we had been out searching for an escaped Glandelinian, but we were all experienced in the ways of outwitting forest fires."

"But do you think the spy had anything to do with the fire?"

"I'll find out."

"What are you going to do with the girlscout prisoner.It is not necessary to hurt her is it?"

"Hard to tell what we will do if she's a spy. The Glandelinians did not care what they do to the "Vivian Girls"agreed Dorothy Gale readily enough."If she tell me if she tells me all she knows about the fire, or tells the truth and she is not a spy we won't hurt i her.That's fair enough isn't it."

With an angry grunt her officers agreed to her saying.

"But let me go on with our experience and how we escaped. My sister suggested that there may be another way out.My other friends for a moment were resigned to whatever fate may overtake them, but one of our boys thought of a way of escape, and believed the trail led to another clearing.We decided to go on, and urged our now terrified horses forward.We went onward as fast as the horses dared to go f but for a time without success.Then we struck a wide stream.It was a creek but it was wide.

"I wonder what's beyond that."my sister said.One of my scouts decided to cross and take a look,and before any of us could stop him he rode across the river and then disappeared."any of our followered wailed"he's gone.We were terrie terrified and upset for we had gronw very s fond of our boy friend.As we discussed in anxious tones what they had better do,the dripping face of the boyscout appeared in view on the other shore of the stream."Come on"he spluttered excitedly to us."Run your horses across,and we'll reach a very la large clearing that saves us from the fire."We then went across .One of the boys said as we just reached the opposite shore"let's hurry for the clearing."The fire is coming.I see its glare,and hear its hissin g roar.Before the last of us reached the other side of the stream, the fire came walling up allalong that shore of the creek.We had gotten across in the nick of time.A great number of flaming trees fell into the water, and steam came rolling in on ot hot clouds tward all of us. "Many of us cried "faster and faster, and with the stifling stream and smoke curling around our heads, we urged our horses on as never before, all the way down the trail, and rushed headlong into a lr large clearing, that opened out between two huge pine trees.T myself realizing that my followers could never outdistance those flames if those two trees caught fire, dismounted and placed three of my grenades at the base of the two big trees, and set the fuses.with a noise that shook the entire forest, the trees fell before the blat blasts."y friends said afterwards that they could not help admiring my courage.While the trees fell T then remounted my horse, and before the conflagration crossed the creek rode after my colorades.They had almost reached the clearing, before the fire appeared behind me in a sheet of rolling roaring flame.Five times as furious as before,the fire came burning on like an express train.Not of us dared to look back, and even now we all felt sure the c e c'earin clearing could not save us.without plan or hope we all dashed on till an ear splitting roar brought us to a stop.

"You look"begged my sister covering her eys with both hands.Expec ing annost almost anything,I looked around and gave a great shout of relief. The fire had burned through so many trees at once thatthey fell, makin g the clearing larger and dividin the fire so that it changed its course.

"It's going the other way"cried one of my boys, and so it was a few hundred yards to my left .smokin and roaring, and sending forth a hurricane of flame and noise the conflagration a hed changed its course and was going northward.so fast had our horses been going for they were as terrified as we, that we had so arc ely noticed the thinning of the number of trees before us,and so fast had the flames burned forward that the very fury of the conflagration had caused it to change course. We then easily found ourselves out of the rest of the woods, and returned to camp just in time to encountar the t foop with the prisoners.If any of them had anything to do w ith that fire whi why I'll---"

"It was a narrow escape for you nevertheless"said Mildred "But I'll question these prisoners n w now.Come Dorothy and we'll see what they have to say."

They stood in front of the prison tent.

"where is that girlscout prisoner!"asked Mildred as the two prisoners were brought out.

"What do you want with the girl !"one of the prisoners asked suspiciously.

"I want to question o her about a fire."answered Mildred promptly.

Danny was about to snap his fingers in Mildreds face, when Jane who was standing behind him tapped him smarply on the ankles.

"Don't make her an ry an gry."whispered the little girl."The christian girlscouts are dangerous and merciless.Maybe if we tried something for a time and kept them cool we could find a way to escape."

Disguis disgusted at the thought of Jane even looking at such creatures as "Little christian dog brats" Danny nevertheless realized that she was more experienc ed in the ways and doings of christian girl and boyscouts than he was.Stifling an impulse to take the c an chance of jumping on Mildreds head, Danny called grifly ;

"Will you promise not to hurt her."

"Not at first."agreed Mildred in a curly sneering tone."You Gln Glandelinians do more than uhurt our own kind of kids.Not till she tells me all she knows about that forest fire near here.That's fair enough to you Glandelinians isn't it."

With an angry grunt Danny stepped aside, and Jane came into view.

"Remember now no n nonsense"quavered the soldier disguised as a scarecrow.

"Don't talk back to me"sniffed Mildred.

"What shall I do first!"asked Jane lowing timidly to "ildred."!!:'

"I want you know if you know who started that f rest fire out there on the turnpike"demanded Mildred.

"I'm not going to stand for this!"demanded Danny in a furious whisper to the man disguised as a Scarecrow.

"Huh Huh we got to stand for it, as there's no escape for us yet."warned the soldier."We didn't start the fire so way worry."(In fact they didn't)

In the meantime Violet,and her sisters had been striving to return to the christian lines but they had become almost lost.They had been out on a scouting tour with a party of Calverinian cavarly soldiers, which had been cut up in losses in their efforts to fight their way through the forest fire which had also surivie surprised them.

It was impossible however for them to go onward for they were hemmed in in a big clearing, and the fact that they were keeping themselves half submerged in a sort of lake prevented the heat from singing them.

"Well we certainly can't go back."sighed Jennie Vivian, sitting with a weary motion deeper into the water and muck."So we'll just have to stay here I think till the fire burns its lf itself out.This is a swell August month for us."

"but we can't stay here forever Princess"observed a boyscout cl called Benny and looking carefully around."And as we're all so carefully disguised as Glandelinians and have lost our passes will the christian guards admit us if we return or--"

"You talk as if there's a great deal of water on your brain"complained Catherine Vivian."We have ourselves, I and my sisters in tighter fixes than this and got through.If the rest of you will be quiet,I'll endeavor to think."

Benny looked on rather nervously as Jennie squeezed some of the water from her flimzy purole uniform coat(not the goat)

"I'd like to wring the neck of the Glandelinians which made this fire."said one of the soldiers calmly. Benny said nothing however and indeed what could he say.And Violet Vivian herself, after shaking the mud from her own coat, and smoothing it out as best as she could looked about to see if much of the raging fire had spent itself for she decided with her wet clothes and those of her followers they could get through if it only had partly burned down.

"I suppose if I were a real Wizard of Oz,I could think of something too"mourned Benny, taking off his boyscout hat, and rubbing his hat reflectively.

"Well we have no such thing as a Wizard of Oz, and if we had he couldn't help us as this situation is beyond the magic of Oz"declared Violet promptly."Everytime something happens you talk of that old Wizard.Why then don't you bring him here.There ought to be among us just as many good Wizards.I am for my part glad I am myself and not magic persons.And this is no time to Think of any thing of the characters in the Books of Oz wherever you may have read them.We got to get out of this fire and will take the chances when it scents itself enough.It's been crazy for us to have ran plump into itwas we did."

"Come on Benny let's look for some wet moss."cried a girlscout called Trot."We can w put that on our hair to prevent that from singing when we go through the in erno."

Put though thirty of them searched up and down the narrow but deep stream not a sign of river grasscor moss could they find.All they found was mulitudes of dead fis hes fishes of every description.The glare of the flames shed a weird red light over the sixty secuters, and soon they began to feel as red as they looked.After searching in vain for moss, they began to leave gradually their watery haven, but had about decided they were prisoners for a whole day in the narrow clearing, when one of the boyscouts gave a loud shout.

"There comes through the fire a calvacade of soldiers or fire fighters." declared one of the soldiers solemly.

"Well,well"began theleader of the soldiers querulously.I'm sorry to see you here."

"Sorry!"gasped violet,and her sisters,as the rest stepped out of the st reem."Why!"

"you'll surely know that soon enough "mumbled the officer."But I'll lead you through the smallest part of the burn strewn.This way please, and mind you don't any one of you get seperated."

Also in the meantime for this morning Colonel Akbader had ridden quickly tward general Purgatorians headquarters intending to see what could have happened as general Philidsor and the other one were missing.But before he had come to the generals headquarters,general Purgatorian and half of his staff officers, came rushing out of the huge tent.

"Colon Colonel.General Philador.Where is general Philadorf"panted Purgatorian seizing the colonel by the arm.

"Yes where is general Philador,demanded general Toddly in the same breath."

Colonel Akbader worn and weary from his longride, fairly blinked with astonishment for naturally he knew nothing of general Philadors disappearance from the encamp ments, but he realized that if the general went out to spy on the christians the whole Glandelinian camp would be severely attacked if he was captured and his coming there found out.He felt that Philador had gone to spy on the child scout camp of the Christians.

"Have no fear about general Philador"he began boldly."Give me the command to do so and I will go on and save the foolish general before it is too late.I didn't know he was missing but I believe he went to spy on the enemy."

"How! where!"general Purgatorian plucked him frantically by the arm.

"Let me go and I'll assure you I'll bring him back safe to our own camps."decla declared the colonel calmly."I believe he did go out to spy on the child sc outs under that dangerous Angelinia Arenburg.I saw some man leave our lines last nig t night, and the way he was dressed if I did believe such things I would have thought he was the "Scarecrow of Oz."

A little murmur of disapproval gr greeted Akbaders statement .

"I have come back from a long distanced trip through the secret tunne tunne l through here to Galverine."continued the wily colonel,,,.I tried to enter the christian lines but could not do so.This morning they ca tu captured three of our followers, and the man disguised as a scarecrow was among them, and a little girlscout.They're prisoners within the christian lines now."

"It was very wrong for you not to try immediately to get help and rescue them."sighed the general letting his arm drop heavily to his side."ut I suppose you had no one and couldn't do it yourself as it would have been sucide.It had to be done for the best I suppose."

"Idiot."Hissed general Toddledly."Why did you not go and ask general Manley or one of his assistants to help us."

"I did."declared Colonel Akbader prompt y promptly."As soon as general Federal returns from a big raiding campaign, he will advance to the rescue of our illustrious positions at Vivian Wick ay,destroy the besiegers and garrison Vivian Wickey to her fullest extent."

Even both generals was silenced by this sur rising news, while all the officers within hearing began to cheer loudly and lustily.On y Only general Purgatorian still seemed disturbed.

"But our girlscout Jane, we must save the girlscout."exclaimed general Toddledly most anxiously."You should have had a squadron with you a and then w you would not have been compelled to let those christian dogs carry her to the encampment of the dangerous christian child scouts.Who will go with me to rescue this poor unfortunate child scout."!!!!!!&

Many of the officers and ol soldiers looked uncomfortably at each other,then as the genera general started off resolutely by himself, a dozen of the boldest soldiers and officers followed.

"We can only perish once."declared one of the officers gallently,"and to be captured by those christian dogs with your Excellency is not only an o honor but a plwasure as well."

Akbader wished to accompany them but general Purgatorian wouldn't allow him to do so,but sent a strong cavarly support to accompany the general.When the last had gone Akbader stepped quietly into the garden of general Purgatorians headquarters.Sinking down under a tree, he mopped his brow with his big handkerchief, and cursed his own stupidity.Why had he not done it sooner as he said,appealed to general Manley in stead of foolishly going tward the christian lines first!Perhaps it was not too late.He would go back on d his swiftest horse, and beg general Manley to hurry and come and drive the besiegers from Vivian Wickey.He therefore mounted his horse and rode out but the christian patrols were so strong that it was impossible just now to get through.There were so many boy and girlscout patrols even looking out for threatened enemeies that it was too risky to proceed far from the Glandelinian camps.Horrified to find so many christian scouting parties roman around, he hid behind a tree.

He had returned to the camps just as general TeTuesady came back.They had succeeded in passing the christian scouts and got as near to the christian lines as it was possible but of course had not found it possible at all to enter t he christian camps by day(put in the hay) As they knew not i nothing of the sec ret entrance e entrances into the camps of the christian child scouts they had sadly turned homeward.The general at least was sad,the others while they said nothing of it were secretly delighted to find themselves not captured.

"It's impossible to approach the christian lines."declared the general gravely. They have captured the three spies alright.There is naught to do n w now but wait for the coming of general Manley.And no douht that general will find a way to drive these christian dogs from Vivian Wickey."

"No douht"muttered Colonel Akbader, and as the general shaking hishead wentbon up to general Purgatorians headquarters.As for general Purgatorian troubled as he was over the disappearance of the three spies he could not help but thin k that t he worst of his misfortunes were over.Almost cheerfully he hustled about giving orders for a grand reception to welcome general Manley.

On the same hour that the three G a Glandelinian "adventures were co tured co tured by the Abyssinkilian s, Mildred Manning though still somewhat disabled by her wound, for she had not yet entirely recovered, sat quietly before her small table in her ten tent, drawingwith the greatest care a map she was designing for Violet, and her sisters,,.From time to time Angela her aidedecamp looked out of the opening to see if the Princesses were returning .

cat which had strayed into the tent purred drowsily in the tent corner on some straw placed there for her by Mildred,and nothing could have b n been cozier than this tent in the encampment of the Child Scouts of the Vivianites.And Mildred Manning was content and too she should be. She had with her as her companion and assistant girlscout, Susan Farrol. D oing too what duties a recovering girlscout could do, and giving all sorts of advise to those who came to her for it,filled her time most pleasantly. So though her wounded shoulder did still pain her at times,and was still wrapped in bandages Mildred was perfectly happy nevertheless.But Susan e her a iable girlscout asistent was not.Susan longed for adventure, and felt that the shooting of h r friend should have been aven ed on all the Glandelinians.Susan though good was her still old self, and was not selfish for herself, but she felt that Mildreds own good time and chanc es of ac adventure was wasted in the tent.She longed to go out and scare out of their wits all the Glandelinians she c ould.No matter how brav the Glandelinians were, they were afraid of all boy and girlscout troops, even of the Vivian Girls, despite the fact the way they did treat them if capturing them. Their fear of them made them treat them that way.But Mildred could not go out on any mission, her shoulder was still too sore for ever to even lift herself hardly out of the char, and when she wanted to go somewhere else Susan had to help her.Mildred would only slightly chide Susan when she complained of the situation, and declare that punishing the Glandelinians would not do no good any o any ow.gusan had seen so much of what Boy and girlscouts do and could do that she had grown fond of them all but wished Mildred and GertfvGertrude were well enough to resume their duties.

At the time that Violet,and her sisters came back to(any section) of Vivian Wickey, since their return from Abbiesan Territory it was greatly strengthened by the besieging armies, and was still then held as you know by the various powerful Gl ndelinian armies under Purgator ian and his various Confederates .General Drot hiss Abbicandi ns had fell upon the enemy sector under general Wizardine, and had been repulsed and later this same Glandelinian general had put out of existance a christian division under general West.General Glinda and Tattypoo of the christian side was were killed in this bloody action, and the christian line of battle had been restored by general Mansion, not before the enemy attack had broken through a portion of the main christianvline however, and forced into existance many transformations of the christian line. Serious ac tions had happened everywhere in th t he territory of Aurandabondia.At first the christian line in this s section had been totally deprived of their strongest position s, but after gener l general Wizardines first attempt to capture general Hinders christian position on the right of Richardsons Creek he too had met with serious reverse elsewhere along his lines when christian generals crowded their divisions and artillery against him, so that finally the Glandelinian attack had been driven back with awful slaughter.The battle had continued on elsewhere however so that general Flanders still held christian positions of any strength and consequences near Aurandabondia.It had been a terrible battle but Violet and her sisters had seen it through. Mildred Manning had not seen the conflict, and as she explained over and over again to Susan, being out of such a bloody battle field was good enough for her, and as long as she and her following scouts did their duties otherwise, she would be perfectly satisfied and happy.But she shuddered at the thought of these tremendous battles.Susan in spite of her peculiar independen t ways, was as good a girlscout as Mildred Manning or the others, and had really earned her title of the amiable girlscout. Though Susan had heard of it the Glandelinians had never yet withinmmer sight destroyed any portion of the christian camps, committed any of the dreadful massacres of children she had heard of or burned down a villiage or created any of those well known and well mention gigant ic volcanic eruption like explosions.But she comps complained nevertheless because the boy and girlscouts were not so active as usual.However she was so good tempered and companionable and friendly, that Mildred put up quit e ci cheerfully with Susans occassional disatisfied spells.This morning Susan was feeling particual particularly disa it isfied. Early that morning the christian artillery had silenced a distant Glandelinian battery.

"If you are sure you cannot manage anything concerning our own position, why don't you do something for yourself!"complained Susan giving the table leg a vicous kick.

"The "The Glandelinians are unusal and uninteresting to me.They are ugly and out of style to me. We re you always a girlscout!Do you always intend to be a girlscout! Were you never a citizen at all!"

Susans question made Mildred pause in e her drawing. She tried to recall the past.had she ever been a citizen!Letting the pencil slide through her fingers she gazed thoughtfully at the map, but as far back as she could remember Mildred could remember nothing else but being a girlscout .She remembered distic distinctly that her parents had been always in the army until her father was wounded in battle in battle and had to go home.She remembered distinctly the battle in which her father fell. The Glandelinians had been carrying Colonel Tompsons position, and her father running forward with his Brigade had put a stop t o it.

His column of troops proved stronger than the enemys at that sector, so it had not been hard for her father to overpower the assailants.Not only that but he had driven the Glandelinians out of the woods and taken possession of the enemy works. But during the action when the enemy was counter attacking he had been wounded and was still home. But the officer who had taken his place had stayed on undoing as much of the enemys mischief as he could, and keeping them from regaining the works.. This mornings question made Mildred vaguely unhappy and she began to feel really annoyed that she could really remember not i nothing of her past.

"I must have always been in the army."murmured Mildred, absently leaning down to stroke the cat who was purring close to her legs."But many of us have parents."

"Of course we have"sniffed Susan impatiently"And if I had your chance es I'd get even with the enemy since one of them so cowardly shot you in the back through an open window."

"It wouldn't be right to take revenge for my own benefit."answered Milsred in a shocked voice."And too its against the law... ::"

"Is there any law against executing Glandelinians by burning at the stake who massacre children?"demanded Susan tartly,for she knew that was the penl penalty to Glandelinians caught in the act of murderin g c hildren---but Mildred kept shaking her head and mutterin g over and over"It wouldn't be right to execute any one who didn't do it to you.If they were caught in the act then it would be all right."

"Well there's the call for you to come to the hospital tent and have your wound treated."said Susanand goin g to the tent slit she answered to the one out side..she t herefore called again to Mildred.

Susan went with her to the hospital.

Just as they were gone in st opped a small boy.It was one of the refugees in the camp and he was looking for the Vivian Girls to help him out of some trouble. He was told by a guard to go to Mildred Manning and she would help him.

"Miss Manning"called the boy softly."Where are you Miss Manning?"

But there was no re ly reply only the rush of the black cat who ran out of the tent somewhat afraid of the stranger.

The small lamp light lit up the interior of the tent quite cheerfully,and after looking all over, the boy curled up in the chair to await the return of Mildred Manning.

"She's probably out scouting"decided the little boy sleepily.The chair was so comfortable,and the little boy so drowsy,the heat made him so and the strange smoky darkness too,he soon fell fast asleep, and dreamed he had found his mother and saved his fther from the Glandelinians.A soft thud awakened him as it hit against his left leg,and starting up in alarm he looked straight into the dark brown eyes of Mildred Manning and Susan Farrol,and several other child scouts, some of t hem boys.

"Well boy friend"said Mildred sitting on the arm of the chair,I heard you were looking for some one, and the guard told me you were there.You were asleep."

"But where's Miss Angelinia Aronburg."c ried the boy, rubbing his eyes, and trying to show his astonishment at the appearance of the daint ily colored uniforms of the scouts, and the heart shaped hats of the girls.

"Why she is in the base hospital yet."announc ed Mildred.

"In the base hospital."jumping to his feet in great dis tress ."Why what is she doin doin g there."

"Why she's been recovering from wounds recieved in battle."muttered the girlscout walking tward her table."Come here and maybe I can help you out."

"put who were the soldiers who wounded her."begged the boy coming distrac tedly after the girlscout leader."

"How in the world could I know."Said the girl."I don't v oven know who had shot m eyme in the shoulder either.I'm a patient too but have been released from the hospital.Just stand here lad and state why you wish to see her."

At the same time Susan Farrol was pouring a saucer full of milk for the cat.Then dropping in a chair she started to do some sewing.The lad himself was afraid Mildred was not able to do anything for him,and he had counted so ent irely on Gertrude Angelines help that without her he felt utterly lost and bewildered. As he stated his troubles the others looked at him curiously from time to time and then Mildred wrote a message on a slate and handed it to one of the boyse outs.

"Angelinia Aronburg will go to Big Girlkncol after she is released from the hospital and will never return to this part of the country ,as she will have lots of duty down there to perform."said Mildred mournfully.Such a report was was worse than none, and the boy stared in c horror as he heard the gloomy announcement .If Angelinia Aronburg was never coming back , oh how could she help him save his father and mother from the enemy, and without Gertrude Angeline to help him,how was he to save them all by himself."Mildred Manning however mus t have been a good wise girl,for while t he boy stood dismally wondering what to do,"Mildred said;

"I will write you a note and direc t you to the one amongst one amongst where you will find the Princesses.Go to Violet,and her sisters, and they will help you."

The little boy whose name was Zeb waited a few minutes untill the note was writ ten, and then she handed it to him.

"ith only two days left before the enemy wouldndiscover the hiding place of his parents and shoot them, the little boy did not see how he was ever to reach the encamp ments of the Princesses , even though she told him in which direc tion it lay and also advised him to keep going straight ahead northward all the time and he'll need no pas s or c ounter sign. He went out of the tent after thanking the girlsc outs most gratefully, and reaching the road mounted his pony and looked about.Deep and extensive the enormous christian positions and encampments loomed up on all sides, and with a long sigh he remained there for a few minutes watching many soldiers pass by."any saluted him thinking no doubt he was a boyscut dressed as a refugee.

But it was not long before his natural courage and cheerfulness began t began to show itself.Surely the girlscout captian Mildred Manning would not write him q a note to the Princesses,and advise him to go to their encampments if the journey t hrough these vast encampments were impossible, and urging his hors o own on he rode to his own tent t o make t he preparations.First he cooked himself some breakfast.He choosed some br bread and coffee, which alone he drank it drank,(bot hand girlscouts and all Abbicannian children det est c offee and tea) and after he had eaten, the little boys spirits rose considerably.Putting a loaf of bread, a square of butter, some cheese and a jar of coffee beans into a basket, he was about to remount his horse, when a really splendid idea occ ured to him. Perhaps there might be some defensive weapons in his tent to help him on his journey in case even within some open part of the very christian camps Glandelinians might try to seize and carry him away.Setting down the basket, the boy searched c arefully through the tent but c ould find nothing.But he then went into a small shed back of the tent n and found it was a sort of work shop belonging to some very thrifty child scouts.A huge work b n benc h was on one side of the room.The walls were lined with shelves and pigionpigeons holes , and the shelves were v c overed with c urious boxes and bottles.With both hands i in his pockets , and th his cap on the bac k of his head,the little boy de tried to decide which to take for he believed something contained weapon of some sort.

The labels and direction were mostly in Abbicannian, a language the little boy had unfortunately never learned to read, though he had learned to speak it.Taking down a round box he started to open it. In the distance suddenly there came a clap like thunder, but no thunder of the loudest kind ever could compare to it a trifle.The concussion scared the boy, and he gave a jump as all the bottles almost jumped from the shelves overhead and fell to the floor with a loud c rash, breaking into thousa thousands of pieces.As the boy looked out of the window in fright and dismay dismay he saw an enormous cloud of smoke rise high int o t he sky into a huf huge rolling thunder head.Goin going out side the little boy watched the rise rising of the cloud from a high hill side, thinking that the hill was a volcano breaking into eruption.Indeed there was sulphurous fumes in the air.It grew more and more larger finally spreading out into a sort of canopy, t hickening through the middle, and then beganvto spread out more thinning as it did so.As the boy wate hed a tall boyscout walked up to him and made him a deep bow.

"Say kid are youns boyscout."he began in a deman ding voice."I have been watching you for some time and he love you are either lost or looking for some one."

"Who---what are you"stuttered Zeb in an unsted unsteady voice. "And how did you come upon me so suddenly without warning.?"

The tall boyscout sighed deeply at the childs question, and seating himself on a low bench motioned for the little boy to sit beside him.Rather nervously S Zeb seated himself on the other end of the bench.

I had I am a boyscout, and a Calverinian."began the boyscout solemnly.

"Of cours e"thought Zeb with a kn wing look"Who but a boyse out would wear a tricolored uniform like that."

"I spent my whole life spying on the Glandelinians, studying the ways of their own boy and girlscouts which are few in number, and though I did my best I did not make much success"said the boyscout sadly."But this was not s trun e strange, when you stop to consider no one who has no experience on s uch work can spy on the enemy and discover his ways with success.However it was very dull and dangerous for me. On y the Givian Girls and Gertrude Angeline can spy on the enemy most succ cessfully. I prentended to even desert the cause, and pretene pretended to go back on the Vivian Girls and apparently gain their disfavor.I wrote to them to day I'm back but that even my slickest ways have not fooled the enemy.They have a whole brigade of sluet hs and so forth looking for me.Violet Vivian wrote to me I should not leave camp for weeks unt ill the enemy getscooled down."

The little refugee boy nodded amy sympathically, and gave a slight start,for he noticed for the first time that the lit boyscout had tears in his eyes.

"So if possible I decide to get even with the enemy"the boyse out was now hurrying on to explain."I have discov ered that the enemy fortunately cannot massacre children so often as they would to because of the watchfulness of the boy and girlscout patrols. For as was quite I use an the wrong to learn something new that I must the wick o k Major Phalinder Hanson.He was coming here to spy on the boy and girlsc out s and he's disguised as a se arrerow."

"General Philador."gasped Zeb, edging c loser,and thinking how much mischief this old Glan delinian chieftian was res ponsible for since the great war began.

"Yes,general Philador(don't snore) sighed the boyscout mournfully."He saw me and tried every porsible way to canture me.At the time I was unarmed and could do nothing.I escaped him in the dark by throwing myself d own into a steep ravine."

Zeb shuddered.He could far fairly see the furious Glandelinian general trying to canture the boyscout.

"Didn't you fight in other ways ? "he asked as th e boyscout stared sadly at his boots.

"Oh yes the boyscout assured him most earnestly ."It was fortunately that the general did not have any fo llowers or he would have captured me sure.I remember quite distinc tly of the generalcriding t past the ravine.I got myself and uniform awfully dirty in my flight.How do I look !" he asked.

"You look allll right to me."answered Zeb kindly.

"Yes I believe I might look all right if I was cleaner.But this dust is dreadful."

"How do you feel?"ak asked the little boy.

"Well" answered the boyscout, clearing his throat a little,"I feel a little hoarse from the heat and du st dust , but I sup ose thatIs because I haven't been drinking drinking any water since yes terday, not being able to obtain any."

Ju mping up briskly to his feet he strode over to a large looking glass that hun on the bark of a tree and leaning forward stared long and earnestly at his ref lection.

"Well!"asked Zeb as the boyscout continued to gaze in the mirrow"are you the same?"

"No,I'm dreadfully dirty from head to foot.It must have been my herd riding down dusty roads"mu mused the boyscout in a depressed voice. "My eyes are red as if inflamed and there's a rent in my uniform cont.Never mind though"piped the boy scout at last.I' m out of the enemys lines and that is one thing." a

Throwing out his chest he put both hands in his pockets and hummed upon the little refugee boy.

Suddenly the little boy gave a fright cned sc ream, and pointing down the road bade hi look.No wonder Zeb had screamed.A column of strangely marked boy and girlscouts Zeb had never seen before were coming down the Company street at a great rate .

"Don't be afraid they're the Burroughs Rangers."the boyscout explained excitedly."Th y They're all right and won't hurt you."

Zeb however had been so interested he had forgotten his own troubles for a few moments, but n w he rapidly told the boyscout the mischief the Glandelin ians had done to his own father and mother, and of the threat of general Purgatorian to ge get " Manley to c ome and hel him launc h a fierce attack upon the whole christian line. The boyscout listened with the greatest interest and conc rn, and when the little boy told how he had managed to wither the christian lines by means of the pass and ccuntt ign count ersign, and of the strange reason of Gertrude Angeline goin going away when she gets better, he ruffled up his wonderful hair, and declared him s lf ready to lead the little boy to the encampment of the Vivianites.

"Two heads are better than one."he asserted stoutly."You are a g ood boy I can see that and I'll do what I can for you."

"Thank you boyscout."The little boy smiled grat fully at his new strangely uniformed head.

"Oh call me Jack Perkin s."chuckled the boyscout, now winking his eyes merrily" and I'll call you Zeb for short."Now will that be?"

"All right Jack."laughed the little boy, deciding it would be quite jolly to have this gay boyscout ace ompany him to the camp of the Vivianites where he could s eethe."Vivian Girls.Jack heartily approed approved of his p plan for taking some weapons l along, but the boy scout had two guns of his own and therefore gave one to the refugee child.Then Zeb, with the basket on his arm declared himself ready to start.The boyscout had a big milita y hat on his head.The boyscout knew in which direction the encampment of the Vivianites lay, and t he boy mounted his own o horse again and both slowly rode tward the north.

Dee per and deeper the two boy travelers pent penet rated int o the grim christian posit ions.Because of the noic of continual battle now near and now far, moving here and there and seeming to be great local. terms from their sounds, and from the smoke of great fires and burs ting shells , there could not be heard the twitter of a single bird.Almost holding his breath, Zeb trotted after the boyse out peering nervously to the right and left, and half expecting some skulking disguised Glandelinian spy or agent or detective to s pring out from behind some tree, or from an unc unoccupied hunt or trees.But as time passed and nothing els e was seen but too many christian soldiers to be count ed anywhere, he began to breathe easier, and to look around with real interest and delight.The huge c one shaped tents were at striped red yellow yellow and blue. Soldiers moved back and forth in rait ous profusion up and down company st reets .The regiments of boy and girlsc outs passing by who were of the Flamingoes looked as like so many c olored flowers with the different hues of their uniforms, and even a column of boyscout s passed by wearing lavender uniforms and green hats.The boyscout Herbert bein g a boyse out since he was 375 very young let was always accustomed to the grandeur of the christian camps and the soldiery,and muttered along in a business like manner, giving no attent ion to any one except when he knew, but he did salut e the brilliant flags every time he either passed, or passed under one.....

"So exten sive is this camp that I've heard that the encampments of the Vivianit es, is but a days journey from here."he called over his shoulder, and "and if nothing happ ns we can get there in time for s upper to morrow.Then if we c an s ee the Princesses they will do what they can for you."

"But why is the girlscout chief leader Angelinia Aronburg goin g away to Big Girlknoel for?"mused Zeb, st opping to wat c h some espec ially brightly uniformed girl and boy scouts passing by.(They were some of the Vivianites on the return from a long hike) "Do you suppose any one can ever find out.?".

"Of cours e of course.They don't need to find out ."She learns of the enemy threatening that town and she intends to go there as soon as she c an with the Princesses to aid them in t heir plans of stopping Manley from his designs.The Vivian Girls,and she can disc over almost anythin g."waving his arms heavily Herby quickened his steps .And as for Zeb the more he thought about the encampments c ampments where violet,and her sisters are situated, the more impatient he became to reach his journeys end.As the weather combin ed by summer and distant forest fire heat was unusally warm Herby hadtaken off his soldier cal t o mop his brow with a handkerc hief, and yet was marching along briskly, his whispy dark hair snappin g in the hot morning breeze. The camp tents were further apart now, the c ompany street s having widened and trees were even seen ore here and t here.But here they were st opp ed by a sentry.

"'ow what!"mused the boyscout gloomily, and while Zeb gazed hurriedly u and down the broad Company street, the boy scout hurriedly opened his jacket.

"what are you going to do?"asked the little boy c uriously,as Herby produced a folded sheet of paper.

"I must show the guard my pass."puffed the boyscout .

The guard looked at the pass and then asking and rec ieving the count or sign asked;

"And where do you two wish to go?"

"This lit tle boy"said the boyscout "wishes to see the Vivian Girls!"

"You sure will need a grand audience o to see them!"chi chuckled the guard in spite of himself.

"but I don't see how we are to do it sir.?"

Mournfully the boyscout returned the pass to his jac ket pocket,and he and his companion were permitted to pass on.

"Surely there is some way the Princesses could help me."

Sitting down on a small log,Zeb st ared thoughtfully at the ground..Both had forgotten that the Vivian Girls can do almost anything.As it was they wasted nearly ten minutes wondering what they could do,and probably would have been sitting there yet had not another column of troopers comi ng come rushing by, and attracted their attention.Watching closely to see who were the leaders of these soldiers , Zeb was s urpris ed to see that one of them was general Kindernine.

"Hurrah"shouted the boyscout."We can get some guides to help us through the danger territory."Let's go on ahead Zeb."

Rather uncertaintly, Zeb and his companion contin ued on their way.

"I'm glad we have a good supply of weapons,are you not ?"

Beaming with satisfaction and pleasure, Zeb looked at the weapon given him and put them back into their holsters.

"The way li es over those roads t hrough the main c hristian camps ."the boy scout observed.A quick trot brought them to the edge of one of t he cent rail portions of the christian positions, and they rode through.After a long ride onward the two adventurers through a camp stopped to res t their two horses .

"Whew"puffed Zeb taking off his hat and looking ruefully at the distant darkened skies."I hope t here are not many more forest fires like that one in southeastern Calverinia.....G""

"There are four of them."

The answer was so loud and emphatic that Zeb jumped nearly a foot ,and the boyscout Herby after one astonished glanc e at the speaker almost roared with laughter.

"what are you two doin g here?"then asked the st ranger, as Herby stood up.

"Taking a journey through the christian lines.It's just a habit we have."answered Zeb ca eyeing the new c omer somewhat suspiciously.

"We are taking a journey to the Vivianite camp if you must know."announced the boyscout Herby.

"The camp of the Vivianites."cried the n ew c omer."What for.

"This little boy here wishes to see the Vivian Girl Princesses ."

"That's funny.T hey're very busy thes e days."t he st ranger mused uneasily."Are you sure they'll have time to interview him."

"why the little lad is in some trouble of some sort."

"but how did you happen to be goin g through the c amp on here bac k"he inquired politely to the little boy.

"Because it's t oo far to go on foot."

"ll explain yourselves."said the stranger who happened to be a t all good looking girlscout."I'm on a furlough but s till remain in c amp. That are you on."?

"e rlough"exclaimed the little boy, taking a look at the huge brac e of pistols and other weapon s a at her sides, and at the huge rifle she carried at attent ion over the right shoulder, and she quite evidently might have as well looked like a prettily armed child brigand."Furlough at this time.You're joking."

"Jokin g! Not at all Regarding the little boy with twinkling eyes she continued; "My furlough is up to night."y nam is Jane Melfert .That's my name you s ee and that---"she waved toward the northeast sec tion of the camp"That is my camp up there-t he Mascot Rangers, branch of the Vivianit es.I am t he captain of one large band of them.This rifle I have belonged to a Glandelinian soldier.He tried to capture me singled handed.I repaid him well.I took his gun, and hes ides his t wo brac e of pistols and his sheath n knife and bayonet .I thought I would have a lit tle fun fighting with him before I took his weapons."

"Do you think fighting a Glandelinian soldier is fun!"asked Herby seriously.

"Well it has to be called fun whether he likes it or not."admit ted the child se out l ader frankly."Takes some of the bullheaded nes s out of those devils.You ought to be a boyscout yttttlf see you are big enough to be one."

"He says he can't be one because he's a foriegner."confied Herby mysteriously,"and unless we reach the camp of the Vivian Girl Princ esses to nig t night, his father and mother may be captured by the Glandelinians.They're besieged in a house in the coun e untry near the camp."

"Then I c an take him to me as a brother."offered Jane Melfort promptly.

Zeb could not hel smiling at t his generous offer.

"If you would or could just show us th quickest way twrd their camp."he began eagerly."You see it would help us a lot."Hr father is besieged in a log cabin, and he is more important than I am.Th n,there is my mot her."

"Tell me all."commanded the girlsc out, sitting down on a tree stump, and drawin g Zebttttthir sidrawing Zeb to her side.So Zeb relat ed the whole of his strange s tory and even told how Hervy had off ered to help him.When he had finis hed the girlscout slapped her thigh, and sprang briskly to her feet.

"I'll help you myself as far as possible till you get there."she dec lared promptly, and then blew so loudly on a whistle, that Zeb had to put both hands to his ears. In a minute came two boyscouts followed by a number of girls.

"Whom were you c alling."?faltered the little refugee boy, removing one hand from his ear.

"Some of my followers"panted the girlsc out."

And presently there was a clash, a clatter and the noise of hors es hoofs, and, down the Company street c ame a whole squadron, of the most brilliant boy and girlscout s Zeb had ever seen.It was to be perfec tly frank with you s column of the dreaded "ascot Rangers of Angelinis Aronburgs troop.They seemed quite militant in bearing and halted right where Jane stood.

"What's up captian"said the leading one looking from the boy to t he other lad.

"The small lad"said she" says his father and mot her is besieged by some Glandelinians in a log cabin near the enc ampment of the Prin c esses.The parents can he said hold out three days but not longer.I wish you to go and see if you can drive off the Glandelinians.It's easy to find as the lad says it's the only farm house in the locality."

"We'll go at once, and give the Glandelinians a quarter"said the lead r."

and off they rode in the direction as indicated by the little boy.

"Maybe they cannot do it all but they'll be able to delay the enemy unt ill Violet,and her sisters c an help you"said Jane. But hop ont o your horse and I'll direc t you to my camp so you c an be properly rec ieved.You're in the camp of the Vivianit es already but the Princ esses are out theme elves on a scout ing tour and no n one knows when they'll return."

They were soon on their horses, Jane on her horse and then Jane gave the sign al to st art, and the next instant they were galloping over the road as fast as their horses can over gallop.And riding good horses has the adventages too let me tell you.The little boy was a good rider.

As he looked at the huge strong encampments he said to Herly;

"If the enemy were to attack here,t hey'd be scrubbed to bit s."o you hear lots of shooting somewhere?"

Harry Herby an t e certainly did,but was so excited and interes ted in t his strange and beautiful t own your old girlscout he could not be properly in formed about battles just then.

"Look"he cried breathlessly."W are almost within sight of our camps now, and there's a c ity of purple tents, and a flag flying on the top of a high flagpole."

"That's the camp of the Vivianites'cried Jane Melfort pridefully."And a tip top place to be too."

She then signaled a halt for they were right in the encampments.The camp appeared to be deserted for no one came to greet them, so Jane melfort cried forth;

"Come forth comrades.I Jane Melfort and two st-angers are here ."

At Janes loud call, two of the boyscout officers of the guard in purple coats and yellow trousers came running to greet them.They were as tall and as dignif ied as their girlscout leader, and bowed deeply as she dismounted from her horse.

One of the boyscouts was to hasty to greet her that he did not watch himself sufficiently, and ran plump into her.

"I'm no spirit, look where you're goin g"spluttered the girlscout almost crossly, as she returned the sa utesalutes of the guard, and waved for two smaller girlsc outs to approach//c.

"Pray announce us to our chief l ader here."she commanded grandly."Here are the right brave and puissant little foriegn boy, and his friend and companion, one of the boyscouts of the Burroughs."

The two smaller girlscouts immediately raised their bugler buglas , and blew on them the bugle call of announcement, and while the little boy sec retly wondered what puissant might mean, called loudly;

"Her excellency, captian Jane Melfort.Her brave and puisant boy friend, and the Burr ugh boyscout."

The boy and girlscouts who had run to doors and windows of their barra k barracks, and from their tents into the compant st reet , at the loud c ries of the two little girlscout announcers, c lapped and c heered,first for Jane, and nexy next for the visitors,t ll till the noise and c on fusion was simply, t remendous. Wherever the little boyscouts companion saw one of his friends leaning from an upper window he would call out.

"Hello Mary "he would cry,"no nudging the lit tle girlscout or whoever it would chanc e to be passing him at the time.The little refugee boy saw a lot of the camp of the Vivianites.The streets of this huge city of encampments were wide and well kept and clean, the tent s and also the barracks tall and shaped like cones.There were glimpses of open ground and so forth at the backs, and in one open space between grew the tallest trees the little boy had ever seen ihn in his life.A strange purple haze hung in the air, and the headquarters of some high leader rising magestically from the center of the huge c amp, seemed to rest in a sort of pungent smoky fog.In almost no time they were at the gates of t his headquarters building itself, the two girl announcers bugling away for dear life. A dozen of the highest leaders retainers rushed out, and the little boy gazing upward saw a lovely little girlscout in a purple dress uniform coat leaning over the balcony.She wore a different hat than the others, it was rounded and had a petal shaped decorated something on one side, and he guessed at once that she must be the c hief leader .

"Hi.Hi.Angelinia Ric hee."cried out Jane Melfort, as she shook the beautiful girl scout affec tionaltely by the hand."did you miss me?"

"Ofcours - of scurse."smile d the girlscout, nodding pleasantly the two strange boys.Jane now told the two boys to follow her.On closer inspec tion Zeb found Angelina Ric hee even lovelier than she had seemed from the yards.She was so gay and pretty and looked so much more bea beautiful in er her princely uniform that the little refugee mo boy wished she were his own darlin g sister, and did not mind at all when she kissed him on both cheeks .The ot other boy Herby blushed with pleasure as Angelina Richee shook his hand.While two boyscouts drew out high stools for the vine visitors, and fetch d tall glasses of grape juice,Jane Melfort told Angeline, the strange story of the little refugee boys edventures.When Angelina heard how the Glandelinians had tried to c apture his mot Her and father on the c harge charge of their being spies, she kissed him again, then hurrying into her headqur quarters ordered the Head cook to prepare breakfast for the travelers///

Herby resting his c hin in his hand had listened with c lose attent ion t o the whole recital.Jane Mel ort led the visitors into the headquarters by the front and main entrance, and left them in a sumptuous dressing room, wit h great big mirrors and brushes andgorgious silk hangings, showing that the christian side was so sure of the succ ess of the seige of Vivian Wickay that everybody who c ould lived as good here in their barracks and places as if they owned their own c houses . Zeb was glad enough to wash offthe dust, c lean clean i his clothes, and hu brush his hair,but Hervy spent most of his time selecting what uniform he should change to.

Then as the two boys stepped through the doorway, they were met by a tremendously sized Abyssinkilian soldier, who introduc ed himself as Ot to Jin k.He was one of the offic ers of the Abyssinkilian c ovarly escort of the scouts , and immediately conduct ed t hem to the din ing hall, where he seated them bet ween Angeline's Jennings and Richee the two highest girlscouts next to Gertrude Angeline.

Almost veryo e made a speech complimenting the little boy on his bravery and his duty to his brave parents, and wishing him sucess on the venture of saving them, and that James ecc column could hold the enemy at bay long enough untilll Violet,and her sisters helped him save them.As for the lunc heon it might have better been a birty day party at least or a Christmas Feast, for the number of h h goddddddddddddr goodies. served. What with the c hicken, hot waffles, sweet potatoes, and hot buscuits, ice cream, not to mention the delicous fruit cake, apple pie and lavendar ices , little Zeb decided he could never be hungry again.and he did not believe such things c ould be seen in a ~~beseeging~~ besiegin g army.

Angeline had ordered a lunch packed up for little Zeb, and when z Zeb and Herby both declared they could could not eat another bite,Jane Melfort went off to collect a special squadron to ecc ompany them on their way.

"If you follow with them you will reach the ecc tion of the Princ esses camp in no timethe girlscout captian assured them earnes tly, and when you have saved your parents and home, you must come back and pay us a real visit."

Thin Zeb readily promised to do; a/s also to find out from Violet,and her sis ters if possible, why Gertrude Angeline was not going to s tay at Vivian Wickey, for he believed wit hout t heir chief leader and guardian the boy and girlscout regiments would be at a lost.While they were waiting for the c column of es c orts to appear,Zeb and Herby decided or expressed a des ire to ride about the camp for a little distance.Angeline giving them a small body of troopers, in c ase an assault"storm"came up against any sec tion of the christian lines, as she put it , hurried offt o p collect the escort in general.

Greatly encouraged by the happy change in th i their fortunes, Zeb and Herby rode briskly along Central Company St reet, stopping now and then to gaze at long lines of boys and girlscouts at drill, or to wave to the friendly boy and girls off duty, and playing wherever they c ould play.They didn't seem as dangerous to the enemy as it was sqi said they were.But Zeb knew they were, and 'HOW'..They were careful to keep within c lose s ight of the main headquarte ers, and were about to turn back(put in the slack), when Herby cried loc "Look yonder Zeb" Zeb did so, and saw Jar in the distance a great wave of gray uniformed soldiers, and t hey came tearing across a long and wide u open ground, and struck against a portion of the christian line in that direc tion.They watched the sc ene in surprise and dismay, and saw that the christian troops had just time to t hrow them selves into their respec tive position, when the "S orm "broke with such suddeness and fury, that it seemed as if the christian wo lins would be hurled from his works. And help they most c ertainly needed, and yet Zeb saw it was c oming for a new purple line was hastily rushing to their assistance.The boy and girlscout s who were playing their games stopped short at the sudden distant sound of battle, and threw themselves into line with unusal precision that surpris ed Zeb still more, ,and then Zeb had a glimpse, a confused glimpse of a man come c m c oming forth on horseback followed by anot her c hristian column, before the attack up came upon another sec tion of the c hristian line, and hurled it before it like a reed.

Confused and disconc erted they were being driven from their works.Fortunately the assault was stopped in the nick of time in that locality by a sudden s evere artillery fire whose thunder shook the ground like a slight earthquake, and the rest of the c hristian line was strong and sturdy, so that when more troops c ame up with artillery the enemy began to give way.The attac k seemed to be left behind at another sector and finally died out, but ot her points were s till hidden by the battle c louds.Everything bec ame submerged in smoke and though he looked,and looked not one glimpse any more of the distant battlefield c ould he catch.The smoke now hid the battle from sight, though he could hear it plainly enough.

"Well spluttered Herby"What do you think of that?"

"Not much"con fessed Zeb ruefully."A section of the christian troops lost their post position, and they won't have time to regain it back, and ---"

"Oh never mind, it's only one of his customary fits the en emy is taking every now and then."declared the bc boyscout , clapping his hand to his head."I wish the attack would have come to our camp.We girls and boys would show the enemy some thing.But it'll have to be some victory against the christ ian lines out there to come up here,and and t hen it would be so spent as to make it an e s easy show for us."

When Zeb who had been looking about, called t hat he was ready to start , Herby came most c heerfully .

"They're at ill holding their own"reminded Herby cheerfully."The C hristians still have t heir original position,I can see that now as the smoke is clearing somewhat . There they're going over their works to me e t c country h charge.Hurrah."

Zeb nodded soberly, and wondered what make the boyscout so cheerful.For his part he could not help thinking that the sc ene of battle so c suddenly coming on had been most unfortunate.If the enemy were to have those"fit s"every now and then how were they ever to reach the Vivianite camp in time?A battle like that would hinder their journey a great deal.Ahead but further off by the walls of s moke roared a still bigger but more separate attack.Sighing deeply he rode along near the edge of the Company street, his head down and the lunch basket trailin g listlessly from his hand.Suddenly behind them c ame t he sound of many hors es at the trop trot .It was Jane Melfort coming with the escort.

"Why didn't you stop when I called to you!"cried Jane cheerfully.

"I was watching the battle and heard nothing.I watched the enemy strike to c arry the c hristian position, but the storm turned and "Blew" the enemy away."explained X Zeb.

"Did the enemy atd attack extend further down!"asked Jane nodding amiably to Herby.

"Why should the enemy attack extend further down,"questioned Herby puc kering up his forehead."It was bad enough as far as we c ould observe it."

"Of c ourse it was bad enough.Wasn't I there too, and wato hed the attac k at a closer position than you two were, but you must know a that along the whole christian seige lines, any such storm of attacks may strike anywhere here and there.But don't always stop and wato h a battle when one comes if you're too close."she finished."Enemy h sharp sh shooter snipers may shoot at you."

Zeb was too surprised to make any remarks, but Herby delighted to see the girlscout again, asked ;

"Do you know the way to the Princ esses headquarters.?"

"Two miles and a half northeast from here."answered she."On wit h you my boys we need not lose time.I'll sc t ne guide all the way."

To this Zeb could agree most readily.

"I always did want to see the Prin cesses"do con fessed Zeb as they were trotting smat smartly down the c ompany street ."I hear t hat t hey're the best girlscouts of every one else, and I want to s ee too whether they're as prett y and as great as many say they are."

"There is nothing c ould compare to them."sighed Jane."They're even better than any of us girlscouts, dreaded as we are by the enemy.Why if we all were like them it would be "Pity the enemy".They're even braver than one one I've ever seen.You'll be bashful when you are presented before them, they're so pretty.But they'e they are the friends of every good person they s ee for life.As dignified as they are they're the same to us as if they were ordinary children."

And so on up the Company Street , pounded the fourty horses at a good swift canter.

The same morning that Zeb was having his experience in the christian c amps, Violet,and her sisters were havin g s ome some curious adventures after getting through that forest fire territory which had almost trapped them .

"Where are we going now! "asked Violet, followin g the c avarly soldier cautiously and once almost getting hit by a burning branc h when it fell.

"To the Christian lines of course."answered the officer sadly.

"Do you call this a safe territ ory for any one to go scouting in, when fores t fires break out as if started from under ground!"sniffed Joice Vivian looking scorn fully back at the big fire which theybhad just left, and the muddy st ream of water apparently chocked with the numbers of dead hakf half c ooked fishes of all kinds that floated in it.

"No indeed I don't c all it a n a safe territory,"wheezed t heir guide, res ting his and the rest of their horses for a few moments after the hard ride through the burning territory."but you had better keep your eyes open and not let even a tree hear you say anything as to put it.It will go hard enough wit h us all as it is.shell fire made t his blaze this morning.It has been unusally severe since lately and I think the enemy is up to some devilry." Sighing t o himself the old colonelv urged his horse on but more slowly this t ime."He mus t not let any of the Glandelinian patrols see us ."he mumbled mournfully.

"What Glandelinian patrols!"inquired Angeline, hurling a stone which she had found in her coat pocket into the c enter of the stream.

"There's many under the supervision of General King,"replied the colonel without turning around."And the greatest danger is because of the uniforms we all have On, we are also in danger from our own side.Just to prevent future child massacres many of the boys and girlscouts roam around in perfec t platoons armed like bandits and if they think we're Glandelinians carrying you and your sisters off Heaven Help us if we can't identify ours elves."

"Humph"chuckled Angeline Vivian, winking at Violet "Isn't our word law.Wouldn't we save you by tellin g t hem your're our escort. "

"No.Not if they don't know who you are."

"Why I and my sisters know many boy and girlscout leaders of the highes t type .Do you mean to say they wouldn't believe us."?

"They would I'll admit that,but s uppose we're not brought there."answered the colonel soberly."Maybe you don't know it "he added stopping again."Your boy and girlscout troopers are very fierce nine o they disc overed these massacres.It 'll go hard with us if we're discovered with you children in our midst.I fear not the enemy but the boy and girlscout patrols.If they only see us good night." he predicted gloomily.

"You mean they can s top massacres those mere boys and girls!"gasped the seven Vivian Girls together."Why what do you mean!I never heard of it before."

"Well they c ertainly did."Your famous girlscout leader Lucillie Jean Saunders went out scout ing two weeks ago when you were discovering the mys t ery of Abbiann, and came upon a bunc h of Glandelinians doing the same to c hildren you have seen them do. The Glandelinian offic er who only survived the massacre of Glandelinian soldiers that occ ured, and was captured, was hung by the t humbs from the branch of a tree, stripped stark naked.Then a hot c oal fire was made under his very feet and he was left to hang and die there in the most frightful tortures. Glandelinians they say have been afraid to start a nother massacre since."

"Such a fate for the brute."gasped Jennie putting one hand to her face, and look ing around uneasily."Why do you mean Jean Saunders, Jack ganders little girlscout friend companion and so forth did that to the scoundrel."?

"Certainly."

"Are you a good guide!"demanded Angeline urging her horse around, and planting herself in front of the C olonel."If the you are get us out of these woods.Our Our situation may be funny, but In t my sisters do not desire it, and we don't want any disaster to come upon you or us in c ase they make a mistake.The Abyssinkilians we know won't givequarter to Glandelinians persuading c hildren, and yet the child scouts are more dangerous."

"There's no way out to avoid a blunder exc ept through these woods ."quavered their guide."I've been scouting through this territory for mon ths, ever since the enemy drove the christian attackers from Evangelinia Cranier Heights, and sent so many cavarlypatrols to plague the christians."

"Evangelinia Crania."Why Evangelin ia C rania was fought nearly over one year ago."e xclaimed Catherine."Do you mean to say the enemy has driven the seige back from the territory of Sunbeam C reek before then!And was that an other attack upon the Auraddehondia works we saw so far distant this morning!"

"Was the attack south of here!"inquired the colonel eggerly"And did you hear and see a curtain fire of Glandelinian artillery an swair answering a christian artillery storm of the same int ensity."I"!!!%(!

Catherineshook her head quickly, and the colonel covering his face bothwit hbot h hands began to rock to and fro from grief.

"If I could only see the beautiful c ity of Vivian Wic key out of the hands of t he enemy once more, and the blue waters of the Mic-Mirthian Sea."he mumbled miserably."My mot her and father, and also my wife and children are there."

"Then they're prisoners too!"asked t he seven Vivian Girls in one breath/ leaning forward sympathically.

"Who are you for real!"demanded Angeline again."And how is it you have been such an unusal guide and leader of scouting patrols."

"Because I know so much of this c ection of the country like I know my own name."said the colonel proudly, and sitting up straighter in the saddle he told them a strange story.

"My name is Colonel Ot to"he announced sadly,"and I was then living in the city of Vivian Wic key and was then only an[illegible]can Abbiannian citizen..every morning I heard of the rumors of the enemy who were then then in possession planning t o c reateon reign of terror in the sec tion called Norma Catherije.All the citizen people who were christians an d not glandelinians were driven into the prisons and jails and packed in them like sardines.For many months I feared the worse would happen, and it did.I believe you Princ esses must know for I heard you were there at the time of the disaster and saw and heard everything."

"We did. Were all the c hristian inhabitants of Vivian Wickey massacred like which we saw or did it happen on y in Norma Catherine!" inuterupted Jennie "Or did the other sections like Mic-Mirther Janet, Aronburg Federal and Julio Callio escape.!"

"The inhabitants of Julio Callio are the only survivors out of a population of million s.I never saw or heard of the others ever afterwards.My wife and children escaped for though they were loyal to me they're Glandelinians"exc laimed Otto regarding the Princesses sadly."My wife divorced me bec ause I went and fought on the c hristian side.I thought when the christian armies came wit h the purpose to retake Vivian Wic key everything would go well.Then Manley suddenly appeared with his Turmoranpians, conte had victory from the christian armies at Delights Junction, and flew off to Evangelinia Crania heights and fought that long bloody battle of Sunbeam Creek.The same day other Glandelinian armies c ame roaring upon the advancing christian armies.One by one Manley literally "devoured"the c hristian armies.When now ones came up and tried to defend the positions, he pained the positions and t hrust the c hristian armies far back as you know well.It was only when general Mansion c ame that the enemy couldn't progress any further.But the christian inhabitants of Vivian Wickey have been wiped out, and for fear of the christians the Glandelinian inhabitants fled before their armies came up.Only those too tardily Glandelinian armies are without and within now."

"Just wait untill papa hears this."cried Violet indignantly."That monst er of a Manley tried to break up our armies at Aurandehondia but have not succ eeded yet . But the Glandelinian armies are caught there themselves now who dared to venture out that far, and never will get away if "we" can help it."

"Do you really mean it!"Otto looked looked joyfully from one to anot another. Violet hastily told him how they had witnessed the battle of Aurandehondia, and how one of the Glandelinian column s rushing after a retreating c hristian division had been annihilated by the christian artil ery fire.

"I wish general Mansion know about this .If general Mansion knew he'd start a general action against the besieged."cried Colonel Otto excitedly.

"We'll tell him as soon as we're out of this territory."proposed Jennie cheer fully,"and we'll help the others hold the fortifications of Aurandehondia besides."

"But how are we to get out of this territory."groaned the Colonel dismally. "We c an dare go out into the open untill dark."

"I will fight these Glandelinian patrols."declared Lieutenant Benny dr w drawing his sabre and glancing belligerently from left to right.

"Hush "warn warned Daisy in a low voice."I'm afraid we are being shadowed."

"What's that"answered Hattie, as a hot wind went whistling past her ears, and a long series of words from some one in c onstant conversation came e choeing through the smoke filled woods .

"They sound like boy and girlscouts."whispered the Colonel, quickening his pace.

"I heard boy and girlscouts are looking everywhere for you thinking you have been captured."

"Maybe they're Glandelinians coming to get us."said one of the soldiers.

"They won't get us " blustered Benny, brandishing his sabre.

"Why they're the Burrough boy and girlsc outs."cried Jennie, seizing Violets arm.

"They are Burroughs."

"No they're Vivianites"correc ted the colonel.

"Coming at a gallop down a c ertain open road and tward the clearing came the squadron of c hild scout s , shouting and yelling at the sight of the supposed Glandelinians.

"Pooh don't be afraid"stuttered Hattie, as the threatening squadron swept along each s ide of the squa party."I and my sisters can prove you're our escort despite your disguise.

"Surrender"you dirty Glandelinianedevils , with those c hildren"called one ofhe t he girlscouts , armed with a long sabre."surrender or we'll give you no quarter."

"Nonsense we're not Glandelinians"puffed one of the men.They were immediately surrounded by the children soldiers, who forced them t o come forward with them, having their c arbines at th e the ready.In fact they were as armed as a band of brigands and looked as fierc e.

"Well I'll be a lost soul"panted the leading child scout who was a boy."These Glandelininns have the Vivian Girls in their possession."

"Never mind that"said another."Well we'll bring them before Angelinia Richse, on the charges of trying to make away with the Princ esses"announced the girlsc out official in a high thin voice.

Colonel Otto tried to explain that he and his followers were not of the enemy but as circumstai circumstantial evidence was against them it was in vain.He was only ordered to keep his "trap"shut, and they were forced to come along with the child scout regiment.There was too much exc itement that even Violet and her sisters couldn't get a word in edgewise, and for the men t here was little they could say in the presenc e of t his dangerous little company of child scouts.When at last they reac hed the edge of the woods near a large cl reem, even Otto felt dismayed.Outside was another column of child scouts so immense in numbers t hat they stood in a long horse colum down a great distanc e of the road.The leader of t hese in fac t was the superior of all.He was sitting sidesideways on i his horse, but he renewed his proper position while the girlscout leader said;

"We found the Prin c esses.They were prisoners of these Glandelinians. "

"But we're not ;;---"

"Shut up."commanded the girl."You c an state your exc use to Emperor Vivian."

The main leaders eyes rolled angrily around at the supposed Glandelinians and he said;

"How dare you seize upon the Vivian Girl Princesses, our best and loving friends."

"There's a mistake friend leader"faltered Violet , eyeing the boys cout ."They're our escort dressed in gray uniforms.They saved us from the forest fire."

The boyscout looked surprised.He didn't know what to say for the Princesses would never tell lies.

"Well I'm sorry we made the mistake"said the girl leader hers elf."Since you are all here you might as well be our es c ort too.We need a number of men companions.I sorry I treated you men so but you know we don't like Glandelinians for what they do.Pray be wise though now you're out here and remove those rotten rotten uniforms."

"They're purple on the in side"cried the man in the lead."

"Turn them inside out then. It's a good thing though you're not real Glandelinians.I won't have them doing harm to any c hildren."

"You would all have made an excellent target for us had you been real Glandelinians at that"muttered the boyscout, resting his chin upon i his arm."We'd have shot you sure as eat ng pie for having abducted the Vivian Girls.But we're glad it is only a mistake.But the Princesses are the most important friends of ours, and when they failed to return on the time they said they'd be back we came out searching for them.But you're uniforms deceived us ."

"We surely would not have gone t his way had we been Glandelinians"said the colu c colonel.

"Well let's be on the way."said the leader."They're all worried back at t he camp."

They soon were again in rank formation.Then as they started worth forth a strange weird bluee light seemed to be reflec ted through the trees, and all over the land. Violet seized her two nearest sisters by the hand.

"Let's every one run"she panted frantically.

"We we can't do anything desperate now"advised the boyscout leader."We don't run from Glandelinians if any are c oming.They're run from us or we'll know why.

"But suppose they come in overwhelming numbers"groaned the colonel glancing about desperately.

"Will the forest fire also overwhelm us again too!"moaned Joice putting both hands before h er face and lookin g at a big e ea of fire moving in a unknown and uncertain way.

"Never mind"comforted Jennie."We have been in many tighter spots than this.Our boyscout escorts we have with us too are not worrying a bit and we can----"--Jennie got no further, for at this juncture, there was a sparkle and a flash, and then such a roar and grind, that those on horseback toppled over like ten pins, and Violet,and her sisters clapped both hands to her their ears .

The last thing that Violet,and her sisters remembered was an ear splitting explosions, a terrible tumble as if through something like a dark tunnel, and the sudden shock of finding themselves under cold water,choking and sputtering, the little girls struck out bravely and bore themselves swiftly upward.Next instant they were above water, andopening their eyes found themselves on the surface of the river..They then swam toward the shore of the river, seeing as they did so nearly every one else doing so too, horses and all, and the strangest part ot of it is the same had happened to them.Blinking and gasping, for Violet,and her sisters had drank a dr eadful dose of water, the little girls tried to look for their first but small,boyscout escort .But there was no sign of them nor the c avalry soldier es cort she had they had seen.Too exhausted to ask questions, they sat on the high roc ks above the water. The colon colonel himself had helped Joice to the roc ky shore.

"Now I must go back and lod lead the o thers here."he whis x ed hoarsely." ut we are free from the burning woods my dear princesses and all our troubles for to day I believe concerning the enemy are over ."

Joice,and her sisters smiled faint ly,do wet and shaken and surprised at the odd occurance o to any a word, and the colonel disappeared through the pungent smoke haze tht that was suddenly enshrouding everything.But the hot winds t hen blowing soon brought violet,and her sisters to themselves.Wringing out their cont s and dresses as best as they c ould, and pouring the water out of their riding boots and hats, they began to look eagerly for the return of the colonel while the child acouts regaining their horses c rowded about to s,s also wait but never saying a word.Violet,and her sisters equally wondered how t hey had rese had so suddenly the bottom of the stream, and how it c ame every one else with them had been blown th re there with them simultaneously.And before they could answer this strange question to their own satisfaction, the rest of the soldiers appeared through the smoke murk which was now beginning to thin out.The colonel waved gaily to the Vivian Girlsand the rest.when everybody had return ed they gave a feeble cheer.

The colonel had lost his high hat and his sabre and two pistols, and was covered with clin ing river weeds, a but at the sight of violet,and her sisters, safe and sound upon the shore, his p lips again parted in a broad smile.

"Well"reaped the c olonel jovialy"This is c ertainly an odd incident, but lets go in where its dryer.

"By all means"coughed one of the other officers ."I feel like a sponge.I wonder what in the world that explosion did to us,and where did it c ome from?"

An lieutenant Benny came opposite violet,and her sisters, he advised them if they felt like it to return to their horses.Jennie claimed she had sprained her ankle a little and therefore she put her arms around his n eck, and striding easily over the jagged rocks, the lieutenant c arried her for up to where the hors es were standing.

"I'm sure glad we're not blown to bits."mut tered the lieutenant, as he c arefully plac ed Jennie on she would sit on her horse."It was a miraculous situation that made that shock of the explosion drive us through some underground opening into the bottom of the river and yet be still alive.

"Yes but what the mean of Heaven saved us!"asked one of the soldiers , as the Princesses were all now remounted.

"A freak of the explosions force a and conc ussion"said the lieutenant . Leading his horse up up beside t he others,the Colonel said;

"I belier believe it was a high explosive shell, and the force of the c oncussion must have all simultaneously thrown us through the water to the bottom of the river.!."

"But where are the Aurandebondia positions!"questioned the Vivian Girls in one breath, the seven standing up simulta eously and shading their eyes with one hand.

"Back there,tward the southeast."explained colonel Otto, waving t ward that par ticular direction. "The conc ussion of the explosion drove us clear ac ross the bittte bottom of the river."

"I never shall be the same"one of the boyscouts assured them sorrowfully."Indeed I feel like an aquarium, and I feel as if my very fac e was washed off, so swift was mu my r e rush through the bot tom of the river.And see what has got ten inside my uniform coat near my chest will you."

Jennie Vivian e herself thrust her hand into the mans shirt, and with a lit tle grin, brought forth a wriggling fish.There were three crabs and fishes of all sizes in the boyse out s pockets , but after they had shaken i him well and restored the wriggling creatures to the river she said it-;

"You'll be all right soon"and she gave him a little hug""and when we reac h the c hristian lines everything will be all right,and we c an all see are clean uniforms."

"ut what are we going to do now!"asked Joice, surveying her sisters expectantly.

"Well"answered Jennie shaking back her wet hair,"I thin k we ought to hurry and get back to the christian lines as soon as we can, so that we can plan for the generals what to do to keep the enemy off from Aurandebondia in the future, and also keep the enemy from doing any more mischief.Don't you thin k so c olonel?"

"That is the best thing I've heard since I've escaped from Vivian Wickey a year ago."smiled the soldier,"and if you can spare us, since now you got an strong child scout escort,we'll go back to the lines firs t right now and tell the rest the good news."

"Don't be sure it will be good"sighed one of the boy scouts, raisin g his head wit h a great effort. He still felt damp and depressed,but violet,and her sist ers shook the colonel by the hand, and promished to do all in their power to help Mansion rec apture Vivian Wickey.

"I'd like to see Vivian Wic key res tored to her former self."finis hed Violet.

"If the enemy leaves Vivian Wickey,and Violet and her sisters goes t here,I'll c ome too"promished the colonel"ut you may not know me then, for I might be a general or something by then."

"You ought to be a general now"chu c huckled the boy scout leader, lightly slapp ing the colonel on the arm with his head"and Emperor Vivian will reward you well for your serive es. "

"I hope they won't hang a hero wreathe around my nec k."worried the Colonel as he prepared to go forth."I hate wreaths."and he rode off to give the command to his followers.

"When do we start Princesses"a,leaked the boy scout leader whose name was George Jingur.

"as soon as we eat a little to regain our pep."answered Violet." Oh we're hun gry.We haven't eaten since yester yest erday noon ."

"what's that inquired the boyscout, in surprise.

"It's the way we have to do."explained Angeline patiently"and one of the in conviences of being out too long on scouting tours, a and forgetting all else in our exsitemen t.We all should eat three t imes a day at least for the work we do and yet sometimes we've gone three days without anything at all.There's so much in convience of eating that some times I and my sisters e have wished we were living c reatures stuffed with straw, or made of living stone."

Seeing that Violet,and her sisters wished to stop to eat their lunc h, t he others dec ided to do the same.The warm winds dried t he clothes or uniforms of all as they ate, and feelin feeling rested and refreshed, and n w they were anxious t o be off.

"I know this country well"said the boyscout leader Jingur with a knowing wink. "We have but to ride east untill we come to the outskirts of general Kin dermines enc ampments, then proceed in a southwesterly direc tion, till we reach our own encampments itself."

"Who is general Kindermine!"inquired the boyscout Benny dricing his horse through the tall grass.

"One of our superior christian generals, who stood his own so desperately at the battle of Delight'e Jun ction last November. 2"answered Violet, with a knowning glanc e at her sisters.

"How unusual"mused the boyscout."Are you not afraid the enemy will some day revenge it and conquor him for real."

"Dear me no."laughed Joice Vivian."I don't belieg believe any of our own with their armies could lick him"she finished carelessly."It's fun to see him drive at the enemy."

"Will all us boy and girlsc out regiments be ourselves if we ever change d!"asked the boy scout leader soberly."I'm beginning to feel happy the way we are."

"That's because you're helping us n and everybody."exclaimed Jennie, giving him a little pet or pat.

"Is it!"stroking his chin thoughtfully, the boy scout stopped his hors e."I don't even mind losing my hat and sabre."he finished in surprise.

"We'll s oon give you new ones."promised Angoline. "As soon as we reach the xhristian lines, and when we've helped restore Aurandehandia to its proper garrisons , you can have everything you want."

Her sisters nodded sympathically, and talkin g of this and that, but es pec ially of the famous Abbisannian discovery, the travelers crossed several large open meadows, and finally came to a narrow highway.It was so narrow they had to ride single file but as Violet,and her sisters even declared, any road is better t han none(got the hun) t hey proc eeded along the highway, untilll the boy scout who was in t he lead, came t o a full stop.

"What's the matter!"demanded Violet,a nd her sisters all together, and who came next.The boyscout moved aside, so Violet, and her sisters could see, and peering anxiously ahead they saw the road had a curious depression in it .

"Shall we go on!"asked the boy scout uncertaintly"or shall we go bac k,and try anot her direc tion.

St anding in thetttbipp stirrups violet,and her sisters tried to see where t he road beyond the queer depression went to.

"Let's go on."decided Violet, who could not help feeling c urious.So they started forward again.

"Maybe this was a sort of a road position extending tward the christian lines." observed one of the boyscouts boyscouts"and now that,,, we are on it, we may as well discover where this road leads to."

But it was impossible to see far.High bushy trees and weeds grew on each side of the high way, and it c urved so that they could see only a few feet ahead.

"This is enough to make me dizzy. "confessed Daisy after they had gone around dozens and dozens of curves."Do you suppose it leads any where at all, or is it a sort of trick trench."

"Where or there is a large round tent."exc laimed one of the others."It appears des erted.Shall we go in!"

Coming around the curve, t hose in the lead saw an enormous tent in the same of a dozen larger than twenty ors us tents rolled into one.Before the others had dec ided what to do, the leading boyscout rode through the opening an and disappeared.

"No we will have to go in"decided Hettie anxiously, and waiting t heir chance she and her sisters dashed after the boy sdout c boyscout leader, and a dozen of the boys couts followed by the girls nearest rode into the section of the tent afterwards .

Stepping into the house was one thing, and ste ppin g out another.There was a strange loud noise outside, and something whirled and spun Violet and her sisters so rapidly,that the poor Vivian Girls grew giddy and breathless, and then there was a sudden shock which threatened the house with des truction, and they were thrown headlong.(go to hong kong) Many of the others did not suffer from giddiness,but they too lost their balance, and layoface down on the floor.The boyscout Benny was the first up, also first down again, for no sooner did they rise and try to walk forward before there c ame anot her loud "BANG" and a sudden concussion, and they were violently flun upon their noses .

"Let's got out here before the ceiling falls on us."said Jennie, after he r sixth tumble."I can't stand this."

"I can't evand at all."c m c omplained the boyscout Benny, rolling over and look ing appealingly at the Vivian Girls/.

"Neither can we"they confessed in one breath, trying to wriggle backwards wit hout g etting up.But this proved impossible, and finding that they could not move back wards or forward,they sat up and looked blankly at each ot her.

"Why not remain as you are untilll the do concussion s tops."suggos ted a voice in violet's ear, and turning with a start,t he little Prince one saw a perfec tly tall young man in a purple coat smiling amiably down at her.He had the big purple round hat of the Dondobians."

"See"xried the soldier, stopping to one side"t he concussion is stopping."

For the first time however Violet,and her sisters ,indeedall those with her became aware of a great clamor and c onfusion outside but apparently at some distanc e away. They didn't know it, it was the noise of the battle Zob and his c ompanions had wit nessed, but at a much greater distanc e than this.The loud noises even at that distance made their ears ring, and while she was c onsidering the situation thatis violet, something crashed through the wall and went through on the opposite.side wit h a loud noise leaving a hole on either side.

"Oh look, see that"wailed Violet, seizing her sist ers arm."Whatever shall we do! We're under shell fire.Everything will be smashed to bit s, even everyone of us ."

"We'll easily get out of this if you'll do as I s ay."promised the stranger leaning down to take Violets hand in i his own."Come around this way please."

In a panic Violet pulled her sist er Jennie with her, and she in turn advised her sisters to do the same.Stepping rapidly to the right and left they moved tward the lower walls of the s truc ture.

"Did you say you wanted to have some thrilling experienc es."chuc kled Jennie looking mischeviously at the boyscout Benny."Well now is your chance, but incase of excitement don't step on my foot."

And thrilling experienc e they certainly did have, shots goin g through the tent or house whatever it was till violet and her sist ers themselves reallly began t o think that every moment would be their last.

"Don't those cannons firing this way over at op."panted the little girls to gether, raising t heir voice above the shouts and shells of their boy and girls cout companions, who seemed to be "en o enjoying themselves t remendously.

"It don't seem so."

Puffing out his cheeks the soldier leaned upon Violet and her sist ers ."They don don't seem to stop.Isn't it terrible.!"

Violet and her sisters shook their heads violently, and made for the opening but there was n o rush close enough to s tun them and t hey were hit by flying dirt and rocks coming through the opening from outside followed by a strong smelling cloud of smoke.Then came a strange uproarious noise in the distan ce, and as each sound coming simult aneously mingled with the noise of louder and n earer firing, and a dreadful rattling roar of terrific explosions , you c an imagine the awful din ords.Violet,and her sist ers groaned, and would have put their fingers in their ears,but that did not keep out the awful sounds.After discovering that the dreadful noise was inc reasing instead of slackening up, Violet and her sisters closed their eyes for a few moments .

"If anybody ever asks me to play a battle game with thes"reflec ted Violet grimly-"

"I'll hit them---you indeed I will."

All the boy and girlsc outs getting used to the noise did not mind it so much as nothing was hitting the pla c now,but even they grew tired of the c ontinuous shak shaking of the big hous e.

"If we could get outside and hold ourselves low down in the ravine like road"called Benny the boyscout leader"maybe something will happen that 'll help us .I wouldn't mind giving the en emy a shot or two."

"Well"reaped one of the boyscouts, skipping stiffly outside as he spoke."I've never been in suc h a situation before, but if it is nec essary for us to fight our way through we'll have to.There's a big Regiment of Hobbon ite Glandelinians heading this way. And more and more are coming."

"Whoops .whoops"came from the Glandelinians.

"Hurry .Hurry before those savages sees us."cired Violet.

At any other time she might have enjoyed a short c onflic t with the enemy, but as she and her sisters wen t rushing bac k to where they had left their horses ,she and her sist ers too wished themselves safely outside, or any place, where things would be still and quiet.Everybody had left the building and had mounted their hors es. Helped onto her horse by one of the boys , Jennie found the Glandelinians had seen them and were c oming their way or at least about half of them were.They opened a sudden rifle fire on the c hild scout band before she could say a word.Some of their horses were shot down but no one was hit.Benny was already mounted on a horse.

The Glandelinian column advancing was so immense that it seemed impossible for the child soldiers to m eet with them, but at the sight of their preparing to make a stand the Glandelinians realising they were the dan gerous christian child scouts hesit ated to advance o n w but contin ued a desult ory fire, but were falling bac k.

"Shall we answer their fire!"Princessse"asked Benny."

"Yes.They had no right to fire on us.Ready.Aim.Fire."

A fierce flush of rifles and pistols roared from the ranks of child scouts and a large number of the Glandelinian fell.This threw the survivors in to panic for n o matter how many they were they feared the c hild scout s .Seeing they were only a regiment of them Violet said-

"Charge the scoundrels.We'll take the lead."

"But Prince esses---"

"We'll t ake the lead.Forward."

The Glandelinians seeing them coming fled panic stric ken breakin g away, and being careful to run tward the west.The Glandelinians seizing the opportunity, plun ed plun ed through a abandoned wheat field.Almost instan tly there was a t hundering roar of hors es hoofs behind them/ and the leader turning about, saw that Violet, and her sisters and the whole squadron were right at their heels.Men on foot must be fast runners if they could out run fast horses.They then s cattered at his command not daring to look bac k and growing more breathless at every st ep.

They could hear the sc reams and shouts of the boy and girls c outs, and the noise of their horses.Anot her crash and uproar of firing broke out and more Glandelinians went to the earth by the sc ore, and the child soldiers even u hurled powerful grenades, shouting "surrender or no quarter".Frightened an the leader was and deter ormined as he was to escape t he leader's breath failed him. He halted drawing his sword, and struck at Jennie. Jennie Vivian who galloped up close to her.his sabre took off her hat, and a curl of hair, but she with one swing of her own disarmed him and brought him down seriously wounded.The other Glandelinians still c ont inued t he retreat in panic .About thirty of the Glandelinians c ame to an abandoned round house of some sort, and plun ed up the spiral stair c as e c urling aloft.Almos t instan tly there was a thump, thump behind t heir lieutenantvand turning about he saw about a dozen more of his comrades following.Round, and round, up, and up tore these Glandelinians.Inside of the very plac e came the yells and shouts of scores of boy and girlscouts down below, and the t hud of their shoes on the stair.Butting a trap door in the c enter of the t ower open with his musket butt the lieutenant ran up the last three flight of steps, leaned down and draggin g the res t of his c ourades through the opening, slammed down the trap door and sat on it / just as the first girlscout in the lead of the rest of the persuers reac hed the t op.

"That"declared the lieutenant solemnly"Was the most dangerous experienc eI ever was in.These christian soldier brats are dangerous.And now that we're up here, how shall we get away.They have the house surrounded."!

The trap door was bumping up and down from the furious thumps of the boy and girlsc outs down below, and even the lit lieutenants great weight and those now help ing him could not hold it down indefinitely.

"We'll have to slide to earth and take the risk.'muttered the lieutenant , after an earnest glance all around."Do you follow think you c ould at and stand sliding!I tell you,as his fellows looked unco t unc ertaintly down the c urving surface of the huge slate roof."Ac h one of you sit in each ot hers legs, then altogether we'll slide.There'll be no splint ers I 'm sure.But better t hose than be capt ured by these little savages."

"Bet ter hurry up"advis ed one of the sergeants blinking his eyes furiously as the t humps on the trap door grew more and more determined."Hurry up."

"Hurry down don't you mean!""smiled one of the c aptians.Next instant they were tobagg tobagganing down the round house roof, fast er and faster, and faster.When they reached the edge they gained such speed and momentum that they slide over the ent ire h number of small besiegers before they landed into the field beyond.Stunned by t he terrific force of their landing, but thanks to the softness of the earth, quite unhurt the,Glandelinians regained t heir feet and fleed into the deep rec esses of the woods and managed to esc ape though a withering fire was poured at t hem.

"Well the Glandelinians won't forget us in a hurry."P anted Violet as she brought her horse to a s top, and pointing to a blue house not farm not far away from which other Glandelinians were fleeing though fired on by the child sc outs rac in after t hem over t here.

"And those c owardly scoundrels certainly covered a lot of ground."said Joice."This is a c urious thing though to s ee them run from us for the firs t time" she observed turning to her sisters."It usually is we are the runnanys.""

"A fault you will find with either aind when one or the ot her is at attac ked by overchelming numbers"puffed Angelino.

"Well they got away and our comrades are coming backk so we'll make a s traight straight road to the christian lines this time."interrupted C ar C atherine, who disliked to renew the fight in c ase the Glandelinians got help and come bac k.

"I'm afraid we have los t our way!"asked Benny.

Violet and her sisters lokk looked long and earnestly in every direc tion.

"There's the yalooo yellow Bric k Road"Viol et c alled finally, wavin g toward the east ,"and I'll wager it leads right toward Angelinos compo."

"Come on then "said Hottie impation tly."I should like to get back before the enemy launc h a general attack upon the christian lines in this direc tion.There's a battle raging somewhere for I hear unusally lots of firing and its growing wors e."

"well we are still far from the christian lines."declared Joice, pointing to give offi evidenc e that she was not making a mistake.

"And we certainly covered a lot of ground, in the opposite direction chasing those gray coated devils."said one of the boyscouts."Since the excitement is over now I feel as flat as a Corn Fritter.None of you were he hurt I hope comrades."

Everybody reported themselves on dut y showing that ev ry one came out of the squabble wit hout a scratch.

"My cent is a bit torn"answered Angeline Vivian calmly"But that is a small price to pay for the encounter.This is a curious situation comrax comrades"she observed turning to the nearest of the boy and girlscouts."Every one of the Glandelinians runs at the sight of you boy and girlscouts every time you encounter them n o matter how their numbers be.If we seven are out they c hase after us like hutning dogs after t he foxx or rabbit."

"A fault which we our selves cannot underst and, even when ten will run away from six of u s."declared the boyscout leader."Maybe they are afraid of us bec ause we roam in so many strong bands.They call us christian bandit s of the Hollish . Imps."

"I hope we can get across to the c hristian lines again wit hout any more unusual adventure"interrupted Angelinedie disliked to us lose so much time."

"Come on then."Rumbled the boyscout leader impatiently."I should like to meet the Ranger girlscout leader who conquered so many Glandelinians while she an d her followers went down the flood on a raft(do bu?t)".

"Conquering Glandelinians while fighting them from shore or on a raft isn't so much."observed Violet, as they started across an open field."Angelina Richee and her followers conquered a whole regiment of Glandelinians, and has a whole book of history written about her adventures t here ."

"Did she reqlly do that!" Staring down at Violet with wonder and admiration the boyscout leader begged her to tell the story.So as they hurried on toward the christian lines,Violet, told how Angelina Richee and her followers , surprised many companies of Glandelinians at one c, and how she and her com rades though even b ing being almost surrounded by superior numbers fought their way through them, attacked t hem then from another point and drove them off.Violet was trying to explain to the boyscout leader, how it came that Angelina Richee put it over on the enemy, when Joice gave a sharp c ry of alarm and ordered everyone to retreat out of the road. Thunderous hoof beats came loud pounding along the highway as if from a whole troop of cavarly, and as every one got out of the way but prepared to fight in case it was the enemy, a most astonis hing size of christian cavarly mostly the Winkie Abyssinkilians galloppod pell mell by t he m.There must have been over a thousand of them.

"Hey "yelled the boyscout leader, torn between surprise and curiousity.

"Hello.Whom.who's there and what's up."c ried the leader of the Abyssinkilians stopping short, and commanding his men to halt."Oh they're the Vivian Girl Princ esses and boy and girlscouts."he repeated gently as the column wheeled.

"Stop and come along with us."commanded Violet sharply."We need a strong escort and already had had a brush with a regiment of the enemy."

"Oh all then"said the officer in charge, looking at violet and her sisters."I never expec ted to meet any body out here in such a dangerous territory you know."

"Where did you come from!"asked Violet.

"I don't know myself"answered the cavarly leader"but tered he stuttered."It seems we are lost.We came all the way here after having been out scouting all night.As you say the enemy recently attacked you, we might as well go on again as quickly as possible."

""No wait." directed Jennie, greatnyl greatly interested in the Abyssinkilian soldiers.The offic er she recognised at once from a picture she had had of him at home."Sisters and comra e s comra comrades , this offic er and gentleman is one of our highest esteemed officers and perhaps he c an ac t as a powerful escort as we go toward the christian lines.

"We are trying to find our way to the c hristian lines ourselves."he exclaimed in surprise.

"Well"said Hottie you're going t in the opposite direction.It's east and not southwest.

""And we were hunting for you n and your sisters."one leaned the offic er dec iding it was time he got into the c onversation.

"Why so were we2"aried the boyscout leader."We came upon them this morning on the edge of a local forest fire.Thes e Princesses led y their ass ort out safe and sound."

"This is captian Benny Philadore of the Burrough Rangers, " and did succeed in finding us.I and my sisters"---

"Almost fo oled me and my followers into arresting them as Glandelinians"said the boyscout leader.

All of these announcement s as you c an well imagine filled the Abyssinkilian leader and his followers within hoarin g with astonishment.

"Why we've just left the christian lines half an hou hour ago."burst out Benny breathlessly."As we said before,we went out looking for you Prin cesses;and let us everything that you may have happened."

"Let's all take it on sy."beamed Violet"and talk this over comfortably.Tell

"Why didn't you bring Angelina Richee with you!"Jennie muttered impatiently.

"She couldn't be found "said the boyscout leader.But dear Princesses you travel in strange and dangerous territory.but trust out your comrade Princ ess,"and Violet began at once to recount her amazing experiences.

"Why it surely is unusal"exclaimed the Abyssinkilian leader excitedly."We ourselves l a learned that the enemy discovered some plan of one of our generals whic h was said that in three days time the general intends to destroy the enemy works before Aurandshoudin.Some one came tward our lines dis guised as the "Sc arec row of Oz" and we c aptured three others, two men and a Glandelinian girlscout.I cannot imagine how the "scarecrow however got away ."

"What is your name sir!"asked Violet.

"My name is Colonel James Bathole."

Violet,and her sisters t hen went on with their further adventures ,their meeting with the forest fire, their final strange escape from it by a mys terious and miraculous explosion,and their successful en e engagement with the Glandelinian regiment."

"We ourselves learned of the intentions of the Glandelinians."finished Violet,in an anxious voice"and we ourselves were scouring the territory with our first boy and girlscout escort on the look out for those spies, when we ran into the fores t fire, and bumped into the Glandelinians."

"nAnd if you sir and your followers have not been able to find your way tward t he christian lines I and my sisters willlead you there."Fronie had Jennie with a little smile of pleasure."A soldier like you can ride with our company any day."

"Do you reallly care for our company Princesses."

Violet,and her sisters nodded, enthusiastically, and smiled at the colonel and his nearest t comrades.....Then Benny the chief leader of the child scouts told every thing that had happened to him since he started out.Violet,and her sist ers were astonished as well as the soldiers and also alarmed to learn of Gertrudes almost rash intention of going to Big Girl Knool, and an interested in the growing situation there as ever.Every one within hearing listened gravely to the whole recital, and t he colonel at the conc lusion of the recital began rubbing his chin in deep per plexity.

"If the enemy has been threatenning an advance on Big Girl Knool since last month"he muttered in a puzzled voice"and there are strong christian armies under Vivinnanna c oncentrated there since that time,and has been growing stronger how is it he doesn't counter advance against the Glandelinian armies!"

They looked surprised at the colonels question.

"Bec ause he doesn't advance without being told to do so."answered Violet gaily.

"Strange but unusual."acknowledged the colonel looking at Violet,and her sist ers keenly .

"Everything in strange in this situation if not somethnng horrible"admitted the Princesses togother."Look at what happened at Evangeline and St C laire, too and also at C edarnine."

"General Francis Vivinnanna would make a fine match for general Isaac Mylette." observed the colonel.

"Don't you think we had better start on"asked Violet."Even though t hese three spies are captured , captured, and the "Scarecrow spy is still at large,Angeline Richee and others mus t be worried about the situation, and we must do something to prevent Gertrude from c arrying out her dangerous plan right away."

"Right you are."

"Do you consider the journey to the christian lines safe in this direction!" whispered the boyscout Benny observing the landscapes with a worried frown."Had we not better go another direction."

"Far better. "Quavered one of the others.

"Oh come on we can't reverse our direction now, and I couldn't ask any one to go where I'm afraid to go myself."C ried Violet most nervily."So long as we are here you c an trust us .The c enemy cannot capture even me or my sist ers if we don't Will it.We're like the people themselves.Come on."

"Better go on while the going is good."advised Jesse waiting ready to c ommand attent ion."

"We're stron enough to cope with a good size body of the enemy."added Bessie smiling at Violet and her sisters.

"And will save you breath, steps and time."declared Catherine."On wit h your brave savors of our Holy Cause."

Realising that they would reach the christian lines muc h faster this way the command command was given and off the whole column s tarted started and all went at the full gallop."

"How do that!""Inquired Violet, looking proudly around at the rest.

"Fin e but is it necessary for us to go so fas t."Su stuttered one of the boyscouts."

"We want to reach the christian lines as soon as pos sible."confided Violet in a loud voice.

Violet and her sisters nodded enthusiastically for she and her sisters were used t o the swift gait and only found it strangely exhilarating.

Imagine being with these aventurers and on the same experience.Every one in a while either Violet, or any one of her sisters would glanc e this way or that to see whether any Glandelinian cavarly or the like were c oki coming.While every one were jogging along at this gat gait, a member of christian patrol scouts turned into the road.They signalled Violet and her sisters as they passed by.

They all declared that trav t raveling through this refion in such numbers was the most interesting experience they ever had yet.The colonel was still uneasy about the Glandelinians, not the soldiery, but that h harrery b might open upon them, but even he was annoying the ride.

"I'm sure I cannot understand how you and your sisters ran into the path of that forest fire.Are you sure it didn't come at you!"questioned Benny.

"No we ran into it ourselves"insisted Violet, positively"and it must have been advancing awfully fast to have come upon us too so suddenly."

As Benny s till pus l s still puzzled over the strange fire,Jennie called out suddenly:

"Why we must have gone right beyond Angeline Ric hees camp."

"So we have"Muttered Angeline, looking back regretfully."

"Never mind"declared Daisy."We'll be within the christian lines in time for dinner, and there's an encampment just ahead.Maybe o it is a portion of the c hristian lines."

As they approached nearer they saw that the camp seemed entirely des erted.They had just reached the edge of the camp when two guards suddenly appeared in the road.

"Halt and give the counter sign."

"Violet and her sisters did so, but them the guard in the lead said;

"That is not the counter sign. Can't you understand.You c an't pass untill you give the count er sign."

"Can't let us pass."bellowed the colonel."Why the Princesses are leading us and we i are in a hurry, and have to go through this camp.Let us pass do you hear!"

"I hear "shouted the sen tinel defiantly."But I'll not let you pass.Offic er of the Guard Sentry Number Twenty five"he shouted at the top of his voice.

"Hah."Hah."Roared the colonel."Come forth sentinel and let us have a look at you."

Almost instantly a great number of men appeared on o horse back.

"Help"gasped Jesse, clutching her sist er Jennie.And no wonder.

They were facing an entire squadron of the "Wheelers or Glandelinian Gargoylian Kurds.The faces of every one were behind their customary hodious masks, and they had the design of wheels on the breasts of their long uniform coats .

The shapes of their well to call them "Head Gears" appeared a like something sprouting out from behind their ears on each side of their heads and fastened securely in front with two bolts, making them look very fierce indeed.

"I suppose they're the ghosts of the Infernal Regions."said Benny Philadora, leaning bac k to whisper this observation to Jesse .

" Perfec tly"answered the Princess with a scowl."Bu But they'll not either make us retreat or stop us either."

"Do they see see us yet!"asked the boyscout Johns , quite interested in the singular appearance of the Glandelinian c horsemen .

"I don't c are if they do."snapped Jennie Vivian c rously."but let them stop us if they desire!Those kind of Glandelinians are Canarians, and the worse child assassins and murderers t here are.They're not worth lookin g at.I don't believe t hey dare to attack, for fear of our n umbers and yet I suppose want to hold the camp.But in a moment I shall give the order to charge"she finished triumphantly.

"But they're powerful fighters.declared the Abyssinkilian leader."and may give us preternatural resistance.Better let my troops attack in the van."

"Right .I will."and she c gave the c ommand to charge.

The whole column suddenly forming a long wave wit h the child scout s at the right and left moved forward suddenly like a storm c cloud.At the sight of suc h a column, s and especially at the bandit appearance of the child scouts the Glandelinians were terrified and without giving any resistance started t o withdraw and the retreat soon bec ame a route, as the column almost closed with them opening a withering fire.

"That's the way to handle child brats here. "said kered Violet .

"They're not child but chora they're child assassins."shrieked the boyscout leader sprn s springing forward furiously at a Glandelin ian who tried to resist his onrush.He was speedily disarmed, captured, and three of the child sc outs pulled the mask from his face.The face revealed was pale, flat and disagreeable.The rest of the Glandelinians urged their horses at break neck speed t hrough various parts of the camp.

"The C hristian brat demons.The Christian brat demons.Raiders, assassins , bandits and thieves.Their leaders c ried shrilly."Here they come.Get out before they massacre every one.Retreat.Retreat.Fighting is useless.Those c hild scout s are evil spirits.Retreat.not rest."

"Come back and fight you dirty cowards."yelled the boyscout leader gleefully.

The whole column cantered mischieviously after the frightened Glandelinian cavalry.The tents too were set on fire by the es cre, and at the commott ion the Glandelinians still in the camp at first tried to offer resistance and t hen fled with the rest.

"What's the matter Colonel Tightist"called a gruff voice from one of the bigger tent s .

Looking in surprise in the direction of the voice, Violet and her sisters saw a Glandelinian gen eral mount his horse.

"Christian dogs attacking the c amp your Exc ellency."P Panting with exhaus tion of his hard riding, the colonel trying to rally some of his men looked imploringly at the general.

"How did they get in so quickly and without resistance"asked the general sternly drawing his sabre.

"Pushed us in overwhelmin g numbers before we could resist ."shou ked colonel tighty looking apprehensively at t he oncoming c hristiens.

"Ridiculous and impossible."sniffed the general."I neit her saw nor heard of suc h a thing before.It's your fault that this happened.Rally them and resist good and hard or you'll pay for this."

"Fall in line.Fall in line.Stop those c hristian dogs ."quavered the colonel dashing in front of the curren oncoming retreatin g soldiers .The general himself tried to do it too, but though half the number were rallied, and though they fought desperately, and strove most determinedly to stop the christian troopers,tthe boy and girlscouts were too much a of an irresistible terror, t heir attack c ouldn't be st opped, and the whole gray column were soon giving way again and abandoning the camp entirely to them and the flames.

"Shall I shoot their c razy general down!"whispered Benny to Violet.

"N o "laughed the princess,"they've really done us no harm as fierce as they have fought us, their s hots went wild, so why should we do it nowlLook every t hin g is going up in flames and that's enough--"

It was true and even there was now not a Glandelin n glandelinian soldier in sight, and the burning tents made so much smoke as to make it gloomy and dark despite t he flic ker of the flames.

"Those foolish Glandelinians must have been short of provisions, for they look half starved."exclaimed Angoline, glancing back at the burning encampment, as the christian troopers without once slackening the pace raced briskly down t he road after the last remnant of the retreating Glandelinians.

"Uh They should be starved.They're worse t han any of the Glandelinians . "dec ided her sist ers in one's chorus.

"and I suppose"said one of the boyscout s"If we could be made prisoners they would do the same thing to us if it was necessary, and would inside t upon us being physiology. for them."

"Not a bad idea, when you c ome to think of it."p observed another of the boyse out s."When they study on us , they never are bored or shoc k ed.But the way they have made P " physiologies "of so many children they should know by this time what every one of us have inside of u s by this time."

"Well that is the only sort of physiology that is ever becoming to thos e rebels " chuckled Joice, with a vigorious shake of her pretty golden head.

"Well maybe they don't know yet what we have bee cause they do not s top the bloody work"dec lared Jennie.

"You mean do not stop Physiology work I suppose."dec lared Benny."But remember they'll have t o come t o make a physiology out of either one of us .We'd easily study physiology on them and don't mean maybe."

"That's so"giggled Hettie."If any ne of them tries it on us , they'll find we know Physiology more than they do.I'm going to try to bring a whole army down upon t hose Glandelinians some day, and o ruc ify them all if caught in the ac t of such awful murders."

"Here's a turn of the Norma Run River"announced Benny Philardore, who was looking anxiously for the first signs of t he c hristian lines."And I have a plans of the enemys in my possession."

"I have never failed in capturing plans from the enemy."declared Joice"Nor have my sisters."Ilvme going to enter the en emys lines this afternoon with my sisters ; but as we have hear heard the unpleasant news about Gert u Gertrudes leavin g I'm not going to begin it now.Besides it is not nec essary.Let's ride ac ross the river as our horses are all good swimmers.Everybody keep tight and hold.Watch for the river current .Everyone urged t heir horses for the water, and finally th ey were ac ross but every body were half soaked in the water but they did not mind that.

"As long as we have good hors es we no do not need any bridges."exc laimed Benny Philador."But I wish I had some sisters like you Prin c esses are."You are the bravest I've ever heard of."

"Maybe we are, and maybe not."announc ed Joic e, self con sc iously"But every one of us are equal of bravery,Phil, and we may have a chanc e to prove that yet."

"This is the t hird time I've have crossed this river to day."coughed Benny. It was late in the afternoon now, but they couldn't tell where the sun was for the sky was very dark, yet everybody began to feel tired and also hungry.

"I'v i I would give my gold teeth for a good round steak"Confessed Violet , as she urged her horse up a slight hill."I'm hungry enoughto eat a"-- she did not finish her sent ence,but glanced longlingly at her canteen basket.

"Have you nothing in your knapsack"asked Benny.

"No we ate all we had for breakfast.

"How about a sandwitch."suggested one of the boyscout s, pulling loose his canteen basket.

"But you need t hose yourself. We can' wait untill we reac h the c hris tian lines."

For a t ime the whole company progressed in silence, but nobody ate a thing yet. As it grew darker, they decided to halt and eat before going on.The boyscouts too had began to feel the pangs of hunger, and were deciding to m dismount when a shock of some distant explosion nearly threw the riders out of their saddles .

"If those gunners do that again we'll fall off."quavered Benny.

"Do you think so.!"puffed Benny breathlessly."Are we almost near the c hris tian lines ."

It was hard to see,for it was getting dark as night, but presently Violrt gave a little shout of relief and satisfaction.

"See those camp fires."cried the little girl with an excited wave."They're in the christian lines .We're almost there."

At her command the whole column fairly flew over hills and across fields so that in less than an o hour they reached the outskirts of the child scout portions of the christian lines .It was still fairly early, n and the encampments looked up on as only an encampment can.They had been goin g forward so fast that the hair of the Vivian Girls had blown straight out behind, and their cloaks had snapped in t he wind.

"This is the c amp of our famous Angeline Bio hee."Violet explained proudly.

W"Whee"gasped Philador.

"Everyone was glad enough t o halt their horses, and some inquired for the reason of their stop.

"We c annot dash on into the camp like mad"said violet."If they would mistake us for making a surprise attack upon the camp we'd find ours elves lying dead or wounded on the ground.We got to announce our approach by sign als which only that know."

"You sure y are wise Princ ess"admit ted the Abyssinkilian colonel"No wonder you make a great hit with everybody you know."

On the same late afternoon that Violet,and her sisters were arriving at the christian lines, General Talismann and his staff sat holding a council in his own headquarters.All day the general had watched for the coming of Violet,and her sisters and the return of the boy and girlsc outs, and as the hours dragged on and the enemy in the distance bec ame more and more menacing, and he had heard of an at tack als ewher of frightful violenc e, he had become more and more restless and uneasy. Shortly after dinner, as he was pacing anxiously up and down, one of the Company S treet s in front of his headquarters, he was amazed to see an o horseman riding at breakneck speed down the road.It was nearly two weeks since he had sent some of the Gemini to find out what the enemy intended to do and as they had not returned he never expec ted to s ee them again.Rubbing his eyes to make sure he was not dreaming, the astonished general rushed forward to great the rider.The man happened to be his own son.After a hearty embrace, they sat down on a log, and the general begged his son to tell him what had happened.But Brushing over his long weary journeyout within the Glandelinian encampment a George Talismann hurried on to the scening of Violet,and her sisters,and their boyse out s one ovh within the foe lines. His lively descript ionvof their detecting the enemys intent ions, their going out t heir encounter with the forest fire, the way t hey had rout ed and drove bac k a horde of Glandelinians twic e, and burning one of their t heir camps , filled the general with wonder and relief.And when the c olonel went on to tell him of the explosion within the forest fire, that had shot hthe Vivian Girls under water and so ross the stream, the general looked still more surprised.

"Now"declared the general, clapping his knee happily"Outside of the threatening attac k we have nothing to worry about.We have three Glandelinians prisoners within our own lines, and one of them is a Glandelinian gr girls cout, the Vivian Girls and their escort have escaped injury, and the Gemini as you say are at illwit him the enemy lines still working for more clues, and I'm glad you have managed to bring Violet,and her sisters to come here.A boyscout who is a s t ranger here told me t hat he had persuaded Violet and her sisters to come here to me."

Here he stopped to tell his son , how the boyscout had gone to violet and her sisters invoking their aid in preventin a dista disaster in c ase the en emy did storm the works.

"I expec t Violet and her sist ers any moment now."puffed the general, shading his eyes and looking over the wide river.At these words, the boyscout thowan standing behind the log went away to see if they were c oming.He hoped that Violet and her sisters would not fail to appear.Again and again e he peered in the direc tion w from which they should come but they did not. When the general then summoned all his officers , the boyscout came to the conference. His son sat on his right, and the counsellor thumbing anxiously over an old book of maps, sat on the generals left .

General Umt illio, nearby stood atthe window.Ranged around the conferenc e t able were the officers of the Abbiscannian National Guard, and members too of ht the generals household, and they all listened attentively as the great general in c harge of the works of Aurandehondis began i his address.

"There is any time coming now when the enemy may deliver a general attack upon out works ."began the general gravely"and as t heir generals, may have planned it now, it were best to have all our troops in readiness for defense."

They all nodded approvingly at these words but said not ing not hing.

"Has any one any suggestion to make?"asked the general, folding his hands over a map and looking inquiringly over his spectac les .

"I sugge sugges t that we all launc h a desperate attack ourselves before the enemy c ome at us ."declared t he Brig dier general of the Guard."Then we'll out the enemy up if a battle there is to be."

"Why bother to plan an attac k, when general Quiberon of the enemy along our front will only stick so fast in i his works that a whole nation cannot drive him out !"asked general Akbad impatiently."He punished us plenty alr ready for attacking him.Let the enemy do the at tac king this time."

"That's so mused lieutenant general Toddledy."At least we should not do any thin g desperate before Violet,and her sisters arrive.When did violet,and her sis ters say sh t hey would come?"he asked squint ing up at the boyscout .

"Just as soon as they returned from their scoutin g expec it expec tion."answered the boyscout."I don't know what is the matter.They should have been here before this."

"When Angeline Ric hae sees them, she will persuade t hem to come right away."put in the generals son,"ans she promised to come wit h them.You will be astonished at t heir adventure."finished the colonel solemnly.

At Colonel valismann remark, the boyscout could not restrain a groan. He was apprehensive. He rose from his c hair and said;

"I will go and see if they're coming.If not I'll t ell my leader Penrod and see what he can do.I'm afraid they didn't see spe the enemy."

As he put his hand to turn the knob, the door flew violently open and t he girlscout matron Jewlia burst into the room.

"A boat has landed on the shore."panted the little girl."A boat had landed near Opal Landing."

"It's Violet,and her sisters ."exclaimed the general, thumping the t able with both fists ."Where are my spec tacles, bring me my horse, and c all out t he Guard of Honor."

Without waiting for any of these commands to be carie c arried out ,the general plunged from g his headquarters , through the c ourtyard, and down to the shore of t he river. His son reached the shore almost as s oon as the general, followed c,os c losely by the generals staff. A little murmur of disappointment went up from the c rowd, as they s tared in the direction indicated by the girls coute A long rowboat had rounded the landing, but it looked like a fishermans dcry.Opposite t he solder at the oars, sat a c losely purple wrapped figure of girls size, and as she got out of the boat Jelwlia panted;

"It's Angelinia Aronburg.It's Angelinia Aronburg.Discharged from the hos pital." and she began to jump up and down.

"Gertrude Angeline.Lon g live Gertrude Angeline,"roared everybody present , run ning over to where she s t ood.Standing on the sand, as lovely and radiant as on the day she was wounded at that Santa Fe Battle, was Angelinia Aronburg, t he highest of girl leaders next to violet,and her sist ers..The designs on her large heart shaped hat glittered and flashed in the glare of one of the c amp fires , her long bobbed golden hair tuf tumbled in a bright shower of ringlets to her gold girdled coat shoulder epaulettes.Her sin sik s ilken yellow uniform dress floated out like a yellow cloud in the late afternoon warm wind.Never had she appeared so young,and beautiful. Head over heels g the generals son drove into the river.

"It's Angelinia Aronburg.Gertrude.Gertrude where have you been!"cried the general in a tremulous voice.Gertrude raised her voice to answer, when everybody shouted lo "look there My heavens." Everybody had heard at some dist ance s a t hunderous roar, and within their view a long wave of Glandelinians hurled forth by general Quiberon had rushed pell mell upon the front of general Talismanns c hristian left wing and just in the territory where she stood.The Glandelinians were pouding across the shallow part of the st ream like a s ea of birds ..So sudden and unexpec t ed was the appearanc e of the monster col m c olumn of Omarians,t hat most of the soldiers at that point were discov discon c erted an d fell back in dismay. The Glandelinians c ame on with t heir famous and dreadful"Devil Yell".

"Save her.Save her.Groaned the general, struggling to free himself from the Guards, and everyone within view began firin g on the enemy nearest to her. General Akbad stiff with fright and terror at this sight , sa saw the the Glandelinians c rossing the river, and in that moment the spirit and courage that always had distinguis hed him came..With a hoarse so roar, he ordered his cavarly squadron squadron forward, and they hurled themselves forward at the full gallop, and rushin g straight for the Glan delinians, drove them back at that point and general Akbad hims elf snatched Gertrude Angeline from the very jaws of death. He took c on advantage of the confusion of the c avarly at tack, and wheeling his horse and headed for the christian lines.With s houts and cheers the ret t foll owed, covering the retreat by pouring a witherin g fire upon the advancing foe. Twenty minut es passed, and the gigantic body of the enemy c rashed through t he territory, and hurled its elf upon the christian works.

"Good gosh we are lost ."wailed the Glandelinian general, as the christian fire threaten ed his Glandelinian wave attac k with annihilation and the whole landscape rocked and trembled before the tremendous cannon and shell fire opened upon his lines .Two generals of his side went down mortally wounded and ten were shot dead and two whole lines des t royed.

Wq Watching the whole dreadful sc ene, general Talismann, and his offic ers pushing their commands into position, waited for the blow that would thrust on to crush his left.But strangely enough the noise, and c onfusion of battle grew less and finally stopped altogether.

"The Glandelinians have recoiled but it s on y a lull."said one of t he commanders.

"Never mind"sighed Angelinia Aronburg. "We'll win as we have a strong position." At her words there was a tremendous detonation as a great explosion sounded so loud as if the world had burs t asunder.Then all was quiet.

Bowser, a little dog belonging to Dolores Mic-Hollaster, began to bark,in a muffled high pit ched squeak.His ink black whiskers t wite hed viol nt violent ly and too his le legs jerked in unrelated running motions.Dolores wate hed him, she believed her little dog was dreaming of chasing after Glandelinian soldiers , maybe.

"Poor little dog"she said to hers l herself"There wasn't even any luck here in the territories of Vivian Wickey----t here wasn't anything but many severe desult ory battles, big fires, smoke and darkness and great explosions, and heat and Heaven kn ws not what.If only general Mansion, would or could do something, anything against t he enemy in general---except keep up a monot on ous bloody seige.But after all what was there to do.He was the besieger, the enemy was the attac ker.

She looked at the long c hris tian ent renchments, as if something long and sinister, relaxed under a terrific volcanic disaster of the past.On y two days before a terrific battle had raged backwards an d forwards .She believed general Mansion was always forming positions in untenable places , and the besiegers were alway s falling back inst ead of advancing in t his location.The en emy annoyed Dolores, when they did things like t hat---the situation annoyed her more and more lately. Some Sometimes she really felt rather tired of being a girlscout, an d yet she would stick on .She shifted herself on the log, and looked down the wide Company S treet of her enormous camp,but there wasn't anything to s ee--only the daily rout ene of the boy an d girlscout troop in t his war Subdivision that ran all around Vivian Wic key's shore line for an exten t of a hundred miles.

How hot the day was, and how s till.So s till that the slightest whisper could be heard distinc tly for t hree feet .So he lis tened suspic iously.Slowly, underneath that strange stillness she became aware of a strange dull t hrob pounding, like the heard of the world pulsing in low c adenc e.The enemy lines t oo occassionally hade a t range scurmi t o day and far to the southwest there was a big dangerous fire burning.The smoke cloud was as big as a thundercloud, when a thunder storm is about to break,and was full of rolls and other fant astic shapes ..The strange smell of it hung in the air.She couldn't remember suc h heat and closen ess in all the years of her life.Everybody she sai saw said the seige of vivian Wic key was the worst and most ter rible thing ever known.If any one could live through the horrors of the seige and its adventures and battles and other ac tivities, they s aid the remainder of the "Vivian Wic key"war was easy.

"THE AURANDEHON DIA STORM" FRIGHTFUL CARNAGE."

Her mind went bac k to the strange throbbing sound--s ubc onscious ly she was keeping time to the beat, of it,and it sounded like the beat of the lon g roc roll of the sea against a low sandy shore. The sound was so strange,and indeed so uncanny t hat it pressed against her.It seemed as if she lived in a "Devil Poss essed World." The sound filled her ears, and yet it was so low any one not list ening for its rhythm would not have notic ed it at all.It was the sound of the battle, Zob and his t wo friends had witnessed far off from their point of observation.The sound drummed against the afternoon like the slow beat of a giant tom-tom in the distanc e.It drummed against her untill s he found herself tense with waiting.Vicious s he thought it was, and pitiless.She s tuc k her fingers in o her ears,but she could s till hear it,or was it the blood c oursing through her head!She stood up suddenly, as Joe Green.e came riding tward her with Penrod. The two leading boyse outs halted t heir horses close to her.

"Hot to nig t e day isn't he!"Penrod said and smiled at her."Do you know"he went on that this situation at Vivian Wic key is worse than the "Black Plague" in England.I was wondering what you was doin g here."

And when Dolores for the moment didn't answer, his dark brown eyes looked at her more closely"

"What's the matter Dolores! Feeling low again.?"

She knew ho worried about her or any girlscout he knew well e ometimes when s he sat quiet this way, doing nothing, not even scouting---it wasn't like her.

"Have you noticed"she said,"the strange sound in the distanc e?I've never heard sounds like t hat before.""

"I don't hear anything.Maybe you're a little nervous Darling friend.I'll play you a game of tag."he offered.

She shook her head--he was trying to amuse her she knew. She only yawned and s quanted on the log.Elsewhere in this territory she had been busy.she and her followers had gone to milit ary lec tures together, to the accountin g patrols, t o see the enemys movements .she felt stranded d down here.She had tried hard not ti to let Penrod or her other superiors know how very lonely she was down here, so far from everything.Well she would stick it out a little while longer, through this dreadful War Hall month of August anyway, and then maybe shewould get here elf transferred t o her own part of the encampments.She had thought of that more and more lately--it was a loophole of esc ape---but it wasn't a sportin g thing to do.She had said not hing to Penrod about it.She hated it down here, so hot and so much a moke and enemy attacks.Finally came a swiftly riding soldier down the lane.He stopped before them and said excitedly;

"Bet ter go to your protective parts children.Big glandelinian at tac k is passing over general Talisman s army trenc hes, heading north by due northwes t.Talisman's army is apparently wiped out-and all c ommunit communication s is c ut off. The attack may c ome this way.I heard."))

Dolores had scrambled to her feet as a signal station c lose by started t o announce the same warning.It ended with "We shall repeat the warn ing.From S ignal Station NO.One and---"

"I'm going to go over there"said Dolores .Let's see what Signal Station Number two says.North by northwest of general Talismanns army trenc hes would be t his section you know."

But S ignal Station Number said not i nothing.

"That's funny"doc lared Dolores ."Would you not believe they would signal something if any enemy attac k was headed this way.The at tac k mus t have c hanged its course--you never can tell what any of those c razy Glandelinian generals will do next."

Ten minutes passed and they gave up listening, even the First S ignal S tation said nothing more.

"Well"said Dolores"I hope we haven't missed the warnin g, if the Sec ond S ignal Station did give any, swit ching from around here to the North S ec t ion--but I guess we didn't.We'll have to have all our girl and boyse out s on guard."

This was done.There was a hush so strange and almost so uncanny, that it had awakened everybody in the camp to a realization of something about to happen.It s eemed as if the whole world had c eased to exist , and it was though they had their large encampments in space.All the christian t renches w ere wavy wit h men on t he alert.

"Put out all c amp fires "was the c ries of the child scout leaders.

Two hours later the attack struck the c hristian line immediately in front of t he child scout encampments.Even before Penrod hims elf could get most of his followers under cover hell broke loose in that direc tion.Everybody saw the at tac k and saw its horrors.Glandelinian columns burst through a sec t ion of the christian encampments under general C had with a se reaming yell of their Devil C ries as though the attack was meant tobtear the Heavens to pieces.The smoke of battle was swept within the encampments of the child scouts and it was so t hick it su stuffed t heir eyes and noses an d t hroats, and stifled the breat h in their lungs.The smoke cut their eyes but they paid no attent ion but watched the se en e as the attack r° ripped at the main christian posit ion in front of their own.And then suddenly most of the sc ene was shut out,, as wreaths of smoke over there hid the view.Yet the sound seemed more terrible than before.Everythin g a hook from t he con c ussion of a terrific artillery fire.Something c rached through the c ompany street they felt it rather than heard it.The world was filled with s ound, with the wild thunders of c annon, the sharp roar of bursting shrapnell, with strange whines, with sc reeches , with roars, an d screams an d the noise of c ountless rifles and ot her firearms , and it was all the sound a battle could give.The battle.

C ould this be only the battle, making all this unearthly rac ket , and could those Glandelinian armies be really human beings as their divis ions of attackers , tore at the chris tian lines , and yelled at them like mad demons .

"Penrod"c ried Angeline Richee, as she rode up on er her horse."Oh Penrod"she cut all her strength into that cry, but her voice was swallowed in all the din and confusion of sound.She had a glimpse of Penrod on his horse wat ching the sc ene but the view of him went out again.smoke wreaths swamped them again.The wind was coming from the bat tlefield tward them.She saw him finally ridin g up.

"From the sound I guess the christian line at that sec t ion is giving way"he yelled."All the plans of t he generals I hear won't work."He found her horses bridle and pulled."Come on.Let's go down t he C ompany Street.I'm afraid we'll be under fire if the en emy gunners gets the range ."

But before she could urge her horse forward, something smashed through the t rees near by,and then exploded t wo blocks awayxwith a great t hunderous c rash. Neither dared to move and as they remained there they saw a line of the enemy beat against t he c hristian line.Once more the enemy rushed inside the enc ampments , and drove at the c hristian defenders with great force.This attack was c overed by a fire of stinging s hrapnell, that tore half of the c hris tian line to pieces before they could retreat out of its range.They saw general Chad riding past one of the rein forcing columns.

"Here, repell that attack"he t hey heard him yell" put those devils out of the works--and look out for infilading artillery fire."

Together Angeline Ric hee,and Penrod urged their hors es forward as t hey s aw the new c hris tian line rush tward the "beating Glandelinian wave.Once t hey had seen a Glandelinian wave get between two c hristian c olumns , but it was the iron support of anot her chri tian division that had literally t hrown thes e Glandelinians out of the works with fearful loss, n and drivening them back still further lashed wildly at their rear.General C had had e ought the ent husiasm, and he and general Cyrstal strained their troops to tear the en emy loose from his own works .It was n w now turning out to be a more fearful c onflict than had been expec t ed.

"We'll have to our the enemy u up with our mac hine guns."t hey heard general Chad shout above the uproar, as his troops fought to have on .The enemys fire hit int o them, and the Glandelinians drove in waves against the c hristian lines , and tore throuh again t he broken sec tion of the works.As soon as general Un ice was compelled to let go of his works , general C had too los t his hold, and before he could rally his almost c onfused army of troops, the whole line disappeared in t he smoke of the enemys sudden terrible rifle fire.The two generals tried to send divis ion after divis ion t o go over the works , but the enemys at tack slit t hem like papa paper.They held a terrific c ounter at tac k against the enemy but they couldn't keep that up long and general Unice was wounded.Again Chad gave a signal but no one could stop the enemy.

"My res erves are in the rear"they heard him shout ."Maybe that would hold."

" Penrod decided to go forth to see what was occuring.Angeline Ric hee grabbed his arm.

"Don't go out there."she begged."Shells are e p exploding all around."

"I'll be all right ."he yelled."The south wing of the pos ition is not more t han six hundred yards from the enemys succ essful att ack."

Angeline Richese would not let go of his arm.

"Don't go out there"she se reamed."I'm afraid something will happen to you.Let 's get out of this awful sc ene."

"But general C hads army----Began Penrod;

"Oh never mind that, general Mansion will see and s end him help.Angeline was pulling his hors e away.They urged their hors es down the company street.The battle was inc reasing inensely--t hey could tell by its rising pito h.As the att ac k of gunfire hurled itself against the chris tian position, the concussion of shells and c annon t hunders forc ed t heir cardrums in and out as the noise pressure c hanged.Penrod held on to the bridge of Angelines horse for fear the enemy s yells and the battle would make the hors e runaway in panic, and guided it along beside him.S he found hers elf riding in the saddle with head thrown bac k as blin blind people do, and with eyes s trainin out of their soc kets.

"In t he interior of the camp"said Pen rod"We'll get away from the worse of it there--as lon g as the attack hits the front of the c hristian posit ion s."

They had managed to keep all their boy and girlscout followers on the alert. Everybody were in their own respective positions.It was not quite so n oisy here, they c ould almost talk without yelling.And their ears were growing accustomed to t he tumult of the battle, and the noises of the many tent s as they shook.Inspite of the northwest wind now blowing the awful c hoat still held, and in spite of t he heat Angeline shivered.S o had not not io ed it before---maybe things then had not happened too fast.Especin/ lly when a person is bus y t hey don't get so shaky. But now she found she had to j h keep her teeth tightly c losed to stop their bang- ing together.she had dismounted from her horse and she pulled her knees up under her chin, and wr apped her arms around t hem.Penrod had dismounted.And so they sat and waited.For what? The thought brought Angelines mind up very short.Just what were they were t hey waiting for.?A chill numbness of unreality like a s trong anaes t het ic seeped into her brain.It took her a lon g long way off within o hers elf and she looked at the dreadful situation through windows that were her eyes .Just what were they waiting for.?No one could tell just how this would turn out .Suppose the attack in fury broke all sect ions,and swept the christian line in fearful carnage through the child scout c amps.And suppose they n.ever could get out of it.Suppose-- here something mercifully clicked in her brain, and the sense of unreality passed.But it left her weak and ic y.she surely mus n't think too much--s he should try not t o think at all--at leas t no further than the present .An geline therefore shifted her self over tward Penrod.S e pressed her leg agains t his, and then leaned her arm and shoulder against him, and got as tight to him as she could.It helped to feel him there.It must now be very late.She wondered how long the awful battle was threatening t heir camp.S he had no idea of time any more.Yet a battle couldn't last forever,and not a single at tack either.Maybe the attack would be dying down if general Talis mann could me eet it successfully.

Penrod touched her knee.

"What time does general Vic tor C rowell come up with his army?"he asked.

Angeline s hivered, and brushed bac k her hair.

"Why ?"she wanted to know.

"I jus t thought you might now---his division if summoned cannot be far off."

"After that they didn't speak any more.At least nobody said an ything untili an explosion of some kind even t ou though half a mile away hurl ed something very large and heavy across theri their path--a tree no doubt Penrod explained after t he shock of the crash had passed a little.And so they went and s at in their own sand bag works for protection.That was as far away as they c ould get from the rand random shells and since the e c hristian lines to their immediate front had begun to break away and recoil again, they ought to e tand here under c over Penrod thought.They couldn't allow any one to expos e themselves.Neither of t hem tried to talk--they had nothing to talk about .But they did continue to wait, and Angeline now knew what they were waiting for.They were waiting for the advanc e of general Crowell.How long befor How long they sat there before they heard the wail, above the roar of battle they never knew, 'It c ame through the uproar of artillery, shrapnell bursts, and all other sounds as an unembodied t hing must haunt t he minds of the guilty.whatever it was, it had a sad, hopeless note, a not e of pleading, a note of agonized entreaty.At first neither of them moved--what could be in trouble elsewhere on a battle ground like this, when already it appeared as if the c hris tian line had rallied everywhere and were pushin g the enemy bac k.Penrod and Angeline did not believe their ears .They thought they had imagined it.Surely they must have imagined it .But lis ten.There it was again.The very ghosts so often writ ten about would have fled before that sound.Penrod stirred uneasily, suspiciously.Angeline felt the hair on i his neck stiffen.She slipped her hand through Penrods arm, and squeezed it.

"What's that."she said."Oh what's that."!

For the first time sinc e the awful storm of battle began, t he long line of a retreating enemy showed, but only for a moment and was again hidden in the smoke haze.Then a shroud of smoke fell on them again.By the time the tro c hild s c out leaders rose to their feet, the sc ene was revealed t.o t.hem again.It was indeed t he enemy withx withdrawing.

"My God"c ried Penrod"The christian line is foolishly c los ing with the retreating enemy.They'll be beaten in,.I guess when the enemy ra'llies they'll not have a chanc e."

There was a sob in his voice."Not hing out t here can repell the enemy succ e essfully t his evening unless Violet,and her sisters comes back and can do some thing."

Since they'd seen the withdrawal of the enemy and the christian c ounter charge the strange wail took on a personal tone,and they wondered where it c ame from.It seemed to know that they were standing there and wanted to warn them of somet hing that was not safe for t hem.It was like being tied hand and foot and watching a man of a loved one drown within your very very reach.Tears ran down Angelines face.Twic e she turn ed away

But t he scen e she had witnessed--it couldn't have been over a mile from where and Penrod stood--dragged her bac k eac h time.It didn't last long that horrible sound.The wail c topped short .It began,and then stopped and t hat was all. The sound of battle filled the gap.The sound of shrapnell beat on the sky.The wait ed for the sound, but it never c ame again.They went bac k and sat on a log.When the rally of the en emy so badly came, there was very little pause in the battles din, a suggestion of melting sound, so faint that it was diffic ult to believe.New lines of battlestook shape in the smoke fog.As the enemy c ouldn't advance any more hope rose in the hearts of all the boy and girlscout s ----now they would know--now they could tell who would soon win the frightful conflict .

But as they looked tward the left of the c hristian positions gray walls of men carrying various standards and the Glandelinian National Flag clos ed in on two of the chris tian positions , but there was muc h more than t his n e on e out t here.Neit her smoke for a full minute.Somet hing like a gray smudge was moving tward their own position, even though there was so much smoke from battle made b fires that it threatened to smother the earth.The frontal section t raveled so low, that at first they couldn't tell what it was .And above that moving s ea of gray--

"What's that over yon der?"Excitement and suspense tightened Angelines voice.she shook Penrods arm with frantic fin e fingers."That big Glan delinian column---Pen rod what's that big Glandelinian wave doing---breaking agains t the position neares t to us."!

Penrod looked at her.His face was grim.

"The enemy must be advancing wit h success and it looks like we'll have t o fight too to retain out camps.She said "he said.

Victorious Glandelinian soldiers racing onward covered four fifths of the christian works already in t heir immediat e front .

It raged against that sec tor of t he c hris t ian lines in wave after wave and it seemed as if not ing c ould s top them.But it seemed wit hin anot her an other twen ty minut es to bounce back.The Glandelinian wave along the right made the christian line waver, and hurl them back t ward the works that ran along a small un known st ream.If the Glandelinians were able to c ap ture on t they would soon be in position of the other works soon .And t hen t hey would drive the christian soldiers into and probably t hrough the child scout ncamps and attack them.The noise of the bat t le was as bad as ever.Penrod rode t o a small line of tall trees .He stayedthere on ly about a minute.

"General Lean ders rear"he shouted as he rode tward her."Jus t look at general Leanders army."

In the direction he indicated, Glandelin ians of the Hobbonite Sect ion was moving forward like a lon g surging mob.One sec t ion of this had fallen upon the rear of Leanders c hristian works, and was also overlapping the right fron t .The enemy was comin g at such c lose quarter an d there were so many of the en emy soldiers that little of the n umbers of the defenders showed themselves but the sound of battle in that locality was simply wild. Penrods fac e was sc rowed up.

He really hoped to see Leanders own division c hold out.Angeline knew and as they both knew as they bot h dismounted and s he put her arms around his nec k.

"Never mind"she tried to c omfort him."He may be able to hold at that and if his army ever gets out of the mess, he'll find a way to drive the Glandelinians back..."

They went back and sat on the log.Penrod put his head down on his folded arms.

Suddenly without even slackening, the roar of battle s topped and it appeared as if everything was c louded in s moke.An geline Richee threw her hands up over her ears and waited for something to happen.There wasn't even a breath of air nd and t he battle smoked coming tward her c amp grew t hicker and t hicker. It was though there had never been a battle, as though t he firin g on both sides had only been a wild dream, if you didn't see t he smoke and smell the gunpowder.S he was afraid to move.The slightest st ir s he felt might s tart the battle off again.She took one an hand down from her ears,and then the other.An d still there was that s ilence.It was s afe then to move after all, but she could not shake off that dreadful f eel ing of great suspension.The stillness was like a t oo large a ball balanced on a tightly strot ched rope or wire.It was one of the camp mast ot dogs who broke the ten sion for her.He began barking at some stranger who was passing by.vAn geline jumped to her feet .

"The battle's over.The battle's over"she sang, and began to dance Penrod around.

"I gues s it is Angeline"he said"But don't you allow any of our followers t o l a leave camp just yet.Don't try to go out there yet will you?"He kissed her and petted her shoulder.Then he started up t he company st root on foot leading his horse.

Angeline felt a little embras sed now sinc e since the battle had st opped.

"I guess sometimes I'm an af awful s cardy cat"she said"Fearing that the enemy would win the battle."You were n ot sc ared at all, were you Penrod!"

"Nobody likes to see the enemy make a succ essful as sault like that ."

Penrod said.

"I don't like it either."she said, a feelin g of grattidue sweeping over her.It was like Penrod ,she thought to pretend pretend that he didn't notice how panic stricken she had been d at times.If he had not been with her, s he would have been afraid of the enemys attack s till more.How awful just to think of it.She had n ot realized t'ill now how much s he depended on all the boy scout leaders .And most of the child sc out troop were far away somewhere else.

Well the boy and girlscout troop this time were certainly lucky to get out of it, and how good a cup of hot milk and some buns would taste. She ran in to the Mess hall. The dog nipped at her flying heels, and caught her dress in his teeth and played at being madat her. No cook was on duty--of course, so she would have to do some of it herself. She hurried into the upstairs section of the barracks, and for some reason or other it was firmly wedged in the doorway. Here stopped trying to force it with his shoulder, and turned to look at her. His face seemed very serious.

"Hy Have you your full supply of cartridge belt and weapons." he said. "where's ine, do you remember. And get your sabre, and that saddle gun we always use in case of an assault."

Angeline Richee was puzzled.

"The cartridge belt and special weapons are in my bedroom, but what do you ant the saddle gun for."

"We may all have to abandon the camp in flames after a while." he said, and we'll eed the full speed of our horses. The enemys attack before has been too strong or the christian line along our own front to withstand long--it'll be asier for us to abandon our camp before the enemy cause us any loss. From a goodly elected position we could easily give the enemy the hottest reception."

"But why make so sudden a retreat from the camp without taking all our ent along!" argued Angeline. "We can leave everything here as we always do and take them afterwards but that's too much bot her."

"Well" said Penrod "get everything in readiness anyway. Come on let's get into ur fightin g suit." Penrod was getting a little impatoo impatient.

"But I'm going to make some hot milk now." she protested. "It will make us eel grand after the awful hours of suspen se."

"All right" he said," Put on your uniform first though please."

"O.K. She humored him. "What's the matt er with the door."

"Because of the con cussion s of the bat tle the foundations of the barracks have apparently sunk on this side, and the house has settled a little." He heaved imself again st the door again. Angeline watched him while she gothint o her suit.

"Open the back and front doors wide." Penrod called after her, as she went ownst airs." Will you please. We don't want those to get stuck." And he began o put on his ot her uniform. Fifteen minutes of grace, and then --- out of the st illness rushed a sound as if the world was breakin g in to volcanic eruptions nd comin g to and end at the same time. A shock from a terrific explosion close by truck the barracks as a buddering blow, and the concussion was from the rear. The o dog scurried out of the kitchen, and Angelin e ran out after him. she was terribly xcited, but showas not afraid for herself. But she had been so sure that the enmy had been repulsed. How the bat tle roared louder than ever. She tried to shut he back door to keep the sound out of the house.

"Leave the doors open please, please, please." Penrod shouted. He pulled her after im to the frount of the house. The christian troops hurled from their works were illing through the child scout camps, and a gray wave was following hot haste. fter them.

"See that tall tree over there" he yelled and pointed to a sin gle "Caraley" looking ine that stood a one dist ance beyond the camp where a n ew and strong line of attle was forming. Most of its bran ches had been ripped off by the shots of some ec ent battle, but it was still firmly root ed to the ground. There were a number f great christian guns near it, and they were in action with a thunderous rear nd the trees swayed before their concussion.

"If anything happens to me" Penrod yelled "And you hear a bat tle sound different rom an y you are hearing now, you make for that positi on with your following and and han g on."

"what do you mean if!"----Angeline throat closed.

"Just that." Penrod roared. "You get your following out of here, out of anger------don't bother about me --I want you to understan d---you are to go even f I can " nt." A great crash filled their ears at the last words and the arracks shook like there was an earthquake and a black cloud swept past the barrqe barracks.

"If anything happened to Penrod---oh God, what should she do. Angeline was so on fused and bewildered she could not speak. Another crash came a little further way but it was louder. The camp was being shelled by those christian guns to prevent the enemy was coming in. The situation was worse, much worse than before. How ong would it last ---oh how long would it last. And she had been so sure the enemys ttack was over, and for good.

"Penrod" she screamed above the roar of the bat tle "What made the enemy come at hem so suddenly. Is this going to go on forever."

Penrod was busy puttin g on his automatic pistols.

The enemy must have been preparin g to do this ---that hat lull was the sign of it. hat is why I told you not to go out. I was afraid that this would happen. Where's piece of a lot healing. Angeline got it out of a du cupboard. she moved now in a sort of su st upification, as though every nerve in her body had been numbed. Her one thought was was to stay close to Penrod, to do exactly as he old her to do.

had told her. She felt she could no longer think for herself. she had been so sure the fury of the battle had passed, that now she had lost faith even in herself. Penrod fastened one end of the line round her waist, and ti's tied it through the little dogs shoulder strap.

"Why are you doing that!" she wanted to know. "Why are you tying us to get her!"

Her mouth shook a little as she asked, and she wrenched her fingers hard. "On account of our little pooch." Penrod said, "I want to be sure that he stays with us."

"You bare afraid to let it out ---you think somet hing awful is going to happen." Her eyes begged him more than her words. "Do you think we're going to lose our camp, and for good!"

He was fastening the last knot at his own waist. She got close to him nd looked up in his face. Her heart banged in side her body, and knocked the breath breath out of her body but her voice was calmer now."

"Do you think" she said "We're going to lose out camp!"

"No of course not" he said" of course not." He smiled at her and pinched her cheek. "You just stick to your following, and if not as sorry the whole of us will fight for our camp. We'll get through all right, with the help of Our Blessed Lord."

"Get through all right, get through all right," beat in her brain. Get through the danger zone all right. All right. Before he said, if anything happened to him---how could they get through the danger zone all right if anything happened ro him. she forgot to think about herself. If anything happened to him, Penrod, her boyscout friend. The boyscout friend she had gone to school with, the boys cout friend who had brought her through thick and thin---the boys cout who had always taken care of her and all her following---ash as he was taking care of her now now. Oh God if anyt hing ever happened to him now---it would not matter then. It would not matter then if they did get through alright because there would not be any" they. It would just be she. she Angeline Richee alone. No Penrod. No she did not want to get through that way. They went and stood in the little wooden entrance, and wate had the enemy advance up to the main line of christians works. Angeline had her hand in his. When the first regiment of the christians began to give way, Angeline stood on her tiptoes and backed against the wall to see what the enemy did without here elf being seen by the assailants. A shell screamed overhead. She tried to dodge the sound, to get away. It was more than a shell explosion, it seemed to her that it was death itself that so roared so close overhead. Penrod threw his arm around her, and held her tight against his side untill her first wild fear of the danger of the enemy becoming victorious ---s ettled down a little. Angeline watched the enemy press over the works. There was apparently a victorious Glandelinian battleline all along the works as far as the view could be observed before her. A Glandelin ian column tried to rush over the works, to cut their way toward the rear of the christian lines and cut up their front. But grape and canister drove through this column from christian batteries like rain driven by a gale. Their little dog terrified by the noise begged miserably to be held. He lifted up one foot and then snot her. He clawed her legs and her long uniform dress. She started to pick him up. Penrod shook his head.

"Let him be" he said. "He's all right for a while."

An geline had wanted to go upstairs, when the enemy first began to carry the ner by christian position, but Penrod said, no. For soft you make they must stay where they were. When the enemy were recoiling again, Angeline suddenly stuck her head out of the window and looked out. she looked at Penrod and then again out of thew the window out.

"Penrod" she said. "Those Glandelinians are not winning now,---they are retreating."

He nodded" Yes" he said." I know."

There was a sliterin g, and strange rumbling sound. Penrod put his head gingerly out of the door. A high explosive shell crashed about a hundred feet away, and flying debris of all sorts made it a risky thing to do. Dust almost flow into his eyes, and rimmed his lips in the few seconds that he looked around.... !

"The back of the christian line by a rear attack of the enemy seems to have folded over against it s front." he shouted. I wish to heaven the whole earth would open up under those dastard y Glandelin ians and swallow them up."

"He didn't tell her that the Glandelinian armies were like a giant guillotine cutting its way through through the christian lines.

"Let 's sit on something" shouted Angeline. "I'm get ting tired standing."

The steady sc ene of the en emy about t o win a most important section of the christian posit ion had become like hands feeling t heir way to her t hroat.They broughttwo small c hairs out to the door, and hitched their feet up on the run ge.She held the small dog on her lap.A larg e large bird was hurled in by t he concussion of a shell ex plosion through the door.It fell on the floor."Penrod pic ked it upan d her held the bird----it was too exhaus ted to s truggle.After a while it tried again and disappeared in the smoke murk.Time seemed to stay s t ill.Only the shells shrieked overh ad, and the enemy moved forward some more--but t hat so slowly now you c ould hardly tell exc ept when the assailants pas s ed some saffinite mark like the top of the works now.Then they knew the Glandelinians had gained another inch,t hat the enemy was gaining s teadily.The Glandelinians if they sent imse lves to be successful will s oon be reaching the edge of the c hild scout encampment s .There c ame a rumblin g and a tearing s oun d.A c rac k appeared in the hall wall, a c rac k that widen ed rapidly."Penrods feet fairly went to t he floor wit h a bang.He grabbed Angelin e by t he hand.

"Come on." he yelled.

He sn atched the little dog by the shawl strap)(t he flap) and hurried out the door.The lit tle dog clawed the air as an aeroplittin g c rash came pretty c lose.

PEnrod glanced hastily in the direc tion of the stubborn enemy.They'd have t o ris k t he danger should they come tearing through the room like a mob.The house it elf itself before the c onc ussions wouldn't last much longer.The concuss ion of an ot her explosion near by struck them withall its might asthey start ed down the steps .They couldn 't see a sin gle portion of the battle lines n w now.The world s eemed to be a slaughter hell.Even the neares t of the chris tian position had disappeared in a wedge of gray uniforms .On ly on e lon g thin line lf of purple to the left stood betw reen their path.They had no artillery to support t hem,and they appeared to have a small show fighting off g the onc omin g gray waves who were yellin g madly now.Angeline c ould hardly keep her feet against the fury of the cannon and explosion concussion s.If ever she and Penrod got c ought in t he midst of that surging gray wave of wild men---she shut her eyes and shook t he thought off.Now she knew why Penrod had tied them all together.

The battle sce n seemed now to roar to her left.she believed the noise gave a sort of shock to her heart.It vibrated her body, and goosefles h seemed about to pimple her arms.Her teet h banged toget her as if she was cold, though the weather was very hot.Greater and greater,and louder bec ame the uproar.A great lon g lin e of Glandelinian soldiers seemed to army forward n earest to them.Now it c rashed again again st the onggin g c hristian line.Now a portion appeared swinging to the christian rear.She stumbled watching it."Penrod c aught her arm. "Please look whdre you're going"he pleaded."Never mind the en emy now."

He had shout ed but his voic e seemed hardly more than a whisper.The noise of bat tle an heard within the barrac ks, was not hing to this. A cloud of rolling smoke swept round them.It was beginning to be windy and it swept away the sk smoke fog, and that made her grateful for the wind.But how slowly t hey moved.Eac h step was a fight t o keep the ground so severe was the con cussions at times.Would they ever get to the pos ition by that tree.she again glanc ed over her shoulder heard the advancin g victorious en emy.They were rushing forward now wildly hurlin g themselves against the remaining portions of the christian lines t hat still held ground.But they were n early all goin g way now.Slowly slowly t hey felt their way.

"Pull in your rope."yelled Pen rod.

They were c omin g to an ope mpment treme h.She brace d herself on Penrods arm, and made a high long step.It got so smoky again, she couldn't see a thing.That leg got over,an d then the sec ond.She turned and held out her hands to Penrod, and halped him over too.The stron g odor of bur burned powder here was somewhat s t ronger, and there was also the small of blood in t he air.

"We got to wate h out now for Glandelin ian s nipers ."warned Penrod.

The strength of the smoke fumes took their breat h.It almos t blinded t heir eyes.Slowly s lowly,they made their way.They were now half way to the position t hey were headin g for.There was a so reaching sound behind them."Penrod twisted round suddenly an d looked bac k.

"Look out"he yelled."and pushed her head down.Angeline had a glimps e of a huge shell sailing through the air.It traveled so fast , that when it hit the t ree it broke it off from the root s neatly without exploding and went far to t he rear of the pos ition and then burst with a thunderous roar.The shell had been fired by a Gin Glandelinian gunners.They stood where they were and looked at t he tree.

"What will we do now"s ried Angeline."W'll get hit by one of those yet."

The whole world seemed to have turned against t them.

"Let's go to some other barrac ks."she said.

Penrod put his mouth close to her ear.

"No indeed"he shout ed."The en emy will be soon in possess ion of the c amp an d it won't last long now if it gets under fire of the batteries of our own side.We'll try to get over to the christian lines yonder by the fallen tree at any cost.It's more dangerous in side and than out in the open."

There was too mu h much noise to talk very muc h.

"The christian position over yonder"thought Angeline Richee."Why that's a mile an d a half from here.It's way over by the St Peters C reek."

It was nevertheless a a very s trong position, they had wate had it form--and some portion were steal and san d bag construc ted.If the c hristian army behind that couldn 't s tand against an assault of the foe, nothing would, and they might as well give up..They looked bac k once more as they stumbled along through t he Company B treet.The barr c barrac ks t hey had left was only half t here--the res t had been s truc k by a shell, an d the remaining part was bursting into flames .The wind it self was driving from the south, and they were headed north eas t away from the direc tion of the raging battle-scene.Here the noise would s lac ken c on siderably, it would t hen rend even ew with redoubled fury and t hey would here to cling to eac h other to fight the st rength of the c on cussions.

On c e when the c annon e boo ks were very severe, they c rawled on their hands and knees with the little dog squeezed bet ween them.If it ever happen ed t o be thundering toward them they had no protec tion from the shell fire--and the c onc ussion litorally drove their feet from under them, and kn ocked them on t he ground.They passed house es with open faces like doll houses that c hildren had forgot ten to c lose when they finis hed their play--you could even see the furniture standing there.But mostly there were great fires where houses should be s tanding at all.Angeline was getting very tired.She couldn't breat he right in all this smoke, bright spot s dan c ed before her eyes , and even her heart began tohurt d her.The strain of watchin g for flying thingshurl ed forth by shell explosions , added to the physical strain, and wave n ten sion bot ween brain and body that burdened her s t rength to its limit .S he wondered how lon g s he could last .On c e they found a large wagon out in the middle of not ing n ot hing.They rested in the wagon."Penrod put the dog down.What light there was began to fade bec ause of the smoke of so many terrible fires.It was as if night was coming.pintant explosions took on like great volcanic eruptions .One explosion occured five hundred yards away and yet even at that great dist ance s howered them thickly wit h all sorts of debris, and fallin g mud an d c ussed them hastily to put out all the remaining s trength they had to reac h t he strong c hristian pos ition them.A mile Angeline thought, could never be so long again.When they could they stopped behind trees.Angeline onc e fell and cut her knee.Lon g red welts stripped Penrods n eck and shoulders from debris hurled by explosions hitting him there."Penrod touched her arm an d pointed.Through t he dimness of the thic k batt le smoke and growing darkness, the dull long almos t endless like hulk of a c hristian posit ion took shape.It was teeming with men.Angeline felt suddenly strongler.If only not hing hit them now when they were almos t there. But luc k was with them.Theworks appeared to be peopled with soldiers and a number ran out to bring them into the position.Pen rod and Angeline was brought before one of the offic ers .At some distan c e from the works a countless soldiers sat on the ground, or else stood under and about trees and ole others talkin g excitedly about the fight.A man in a white un uniform and a purple hat was putting out a c amp fire.

Penrod walked up to the leader in charge.

"We'd like that you could sent a reinforc ing troop to the aid of those divis ions over there, please"he s aid.

The general looked at him and shookhis head.

"We have so few divisions defen ding these works, that we're using them for here.I'm sorry"he said in a kind voice."But I c an give them a bat tery of artillery which would be useless a here.Your c amps in dan ger I suppose."

"Yes.We'd be grateful for the battery."

The general smiled."I'll send the batte y bat tery.They'll probably need it before this fight is over.But you're s cout followers are over in position Number Ten an d so if the en emy is in possession we'll in filade them with out big guns.Go over my boy and you too my little brave girlsc out and res t your selves.There are lot s of girl an d boyscouts here too wit h whom you can get ac quanited with."

They to k the hint and turn ed to go.A lit tle old woman touc hed Penrods arm.She had on a black satin dress, and a hat with two big feathers in it.

"Where do you c ome from?"she said and without waiting for an answer"Did you see my son in the battle over there?"

"N o"said Penrod I didn't.I'm sorry.But I was not near the battle."

"Are you sure you did not see him."she said."He's in that army!"

Penrod shook his head.He couldn't speak now---the woman looked like his mother who long ago had died.She turned away and went back to the refugee c amp.she was wringing her han ds together.

They went and s at on a lon g log.The dog crawled up in Penrods lap.
Then Angeline Riches laid her cheek on Penrods han d.
"I love you as if you were my brother."she said."What would I, Gertrude Angeline, the Vivian Girls, or other girls o out s and boys too do wit hout you."

As the squadron of hors es wit h boy and girlscouts , neighing joyously t rot t ed down the Compan y Street of t he main encampment s, window in t he fortified barracks were t hrown up, and doors flun g u open,and the soldiers rushed out to s ee who was pas sin gAnd when t hey saw Violet , and her s isters, and t he boy scout an d also girlscout troop moun ted on t heir s t eeds and followed by a cavarly esc ort ,they promptly fell in , so that by the time t hat Violet an d her sisters reached their headquarters , a regular proc es sion of soldiers had formed behind them Then as they ent ered their headquarters t he procession broke up, but s omet hing els e happened before lon g.The new at ran gers had been int roduc ed to the gen eralsof the army, and t he wild shouts of everyone soon brought the occupant s of the Vivian Girls barracks run ning t o the windows , and doors to s ee what was the mat t er..
"Why An geline Ric hes,an d Pen rod"s ried Violet , das hing down t he st eps."We have been hunt ing for you all day, and were just going to s end to your e camps t o see if you were t here.
"Well here we are my dear Prin c esses "laughed Penrod, and we bring s trange but bad n ews .J Hello Jen e. Hello Jac k.Hi there An geline Jen nin gs.Howdy Dolores.Hello everybody."
Wavin g t o the girl and boys cou t officials who c rowdedthe open doorway,Penrod an d Angeline en tered.Mountin ting the s teps c arefully, and being c areful n ot t o slip, t hey m t epped proudly int o the headquarters of Violet,and her s ist r s in tera ,Angeline Ric hes dancin g nheed to an noun ce their arival t o t he rest of the Prin cesses .Jen nie Turner, the ot her Prin c esses, and some boyscouts ain ce t heir ret urn were playin g Gypsys chos e , but hos t ily pus hed bac k the board, as t he two high ranked child scouts came c an t ering in.
"Whythere's the c whole pack."cried on e of the officers jumping up and waving his hat ,Penrods packhorse too."finis hed Capt ain Nic ker, eyeing Penrods s teed in s ome great surprise for it was so black.
"Tac k hors e"n snorted Penrod stoppin g the steed short, and rollin g his eyes almost an grily."He's the bes t horse a pers on c an ever ride, you odd lookin g Dagman, and I'll have you kn ow he is very popular wit h me and all the res t , for all the perils he has brought me,and the Prin c esses through.
Everyone en tering made a deep bow to Violet,and her sist ers , and the boy nd and girlscouts outside lost no time in getting off their hors es .
"This is my boyscout frien d George Givney, Prin c ess"puffed one of the girlscouts, as t he Vivian Girls gave every on e a bewildered smile..and my friend Fran c is Wilson from Boston."
"Is he a foriegn er"whispered Betsy, putting out her hand to touch the boyscout , who was ban ding stiffly before the Vivian Girls.
"Yes, a foriegn boy but a very good boy."said an ot her girlscout ..
"He's much bet ter than most of them are."dec lared Francis George."Just w it ait untill you hear how he on c e c aptured sixteen Glandelinians s ingle han ded."
"Tell us tell us."begged most of the child scout s pres en t / and Bet sy c lasped her han ds.
"Have you had any bad adventures, Angeline Ric hes!" Pushin g his way twards her George Rade liffe took An geline eagerly by the arm.
"Too many advan tures an d all in one day"panted An gelin e, sinking down on t he floor n ear the c hairs occupied by Violet,and her sixtttth v ous sisters . So many I hardly know where to begin.The enemy is c ertainl y very ac t ive."
However Violet,an d her s ist ers n ticing the worried expression of An geline Ric hes, bade her come nearer, and t ell what was t roubling her.Angeline dropping,, on on e knee before Violet,and her sisters, thought she had n ever seen better and gen tler friends than Violet,and her sisters , and though s he had often had adven tures with them she somet imes would s t ill feel a bit shy in the presence of so great and grand a company, and therefore s he arose and told t he whole s tory of the wild enemy assault upon gen eral Talisman ns army, and of her flight from her en dangered encampme nts , and of the fac t that all her boy and girlscouts had been c ompelled to ret reat to safer quart ers . Violet,an d her sisters , and their ddtrttttradvisers cwere not on y as ton is hed astonis hed at the troubles of the general, and t he apparentl loss of ch the child sc out encampments , but alarmed and dist ressed by the un explain able disappearance of t he good lin e of works on general Talismanns right . Violet,and her sisters had not known that an at tack was goin on goin g on.
"As soon as Angeline t olls us the res t of the facts, we will go out scout in g qn and look for those positions if it is possible to approach saft ly within t he zon e of the battle lin e."murmured Violet,and her sisters"and also find 404 means to rat rac t ors the on e mpments of ourchild s cout regiments."

"I'd like a c hance a t gen eral Quiherons divisions of Glandelinians."blustered onsof the c hristian gen erals, who was a famous fighter, and had been in many batt les And my sword and myself are at your ser vice Miss Riches."
The girlscout leader smiled gratefully at the general, and helped out by Penrod and s ome of his followers t old how they had released a portion of t he child scout regiment from their works before they were trapped--of t heir visit to the n earest portion of the battlefield--their meeting with the beginning of the batt e battle--and t heir advent ures in t he C ompany St reet .Then An geline gave forth the most exciting of her story, about her and Pen rods frightful suspense in t he c amp.During g the telling g of the story Colonel Orange made hurried not es in his little black book, and as Angeline Ric hes finished, h es bounced out of his seat like a rubber ball .
"Your little Highnesses"began the official-looking over his spec s at the Vivian Girl Princesses"I have jotted down for your convien ces the problems to be solved about the battle line as Miss Richees tates, and the mys teries to be exc oun t ed for.First we must find a means to get around the rear of the Glandelinian as sailant s assailant s, and restore the en campment s to the boy and girlscout regiment s .
Secondly we mus t undo as much of general Ho bis Quiherons mis chief as we c an -- des troy his Glan delinian army if possible f before gen eral Purgatorian s en ds him aid, punish the one who allowed the Glan delin ians to c ome upon general Talismann so sudden ly, and res tore the c hristian possit ions to him."
At this general Herby c hook his head violent ly.
"I'm afraid it 'll take plen ty of hot savage fightin g t o recover the works" dec lared general Herby stout ly."I prefer to open up on them with our long range cava c annon wit h high explosives and blow them off the face of the earths."
Violet, an d her sisters s miled at the gen erals earn es ss, and therefore the colonel drew his pencil through that en try.
"We must then strike the en emy was c rossing over through Tat typeof C reek." contin ued the colonel serious ly"and change the si situation to the way we wis h it even at the cost of fierce fighting."
H"How about flanking the en emy at every point."wheezed general Stan ck, who was sittin g on a high chair withhis feet on the lowar rungs .
"Why you're a fellow after my own heart."declared Major General Pinkham."Let's all order our various corps for the readiness "he propos ed.
"You may tell general Fren cis Handan don to prepar for the advans e at once."
Nodding laughingly at the Major general, the little fut i future sovereigns aros e almost simultaneously, and Violet, s t epping up to Angeline Riches, took her by the arm.
"Come"said Violet ."We will go out s c outing, and s ee what her gen eral Quiherons main army is still c aught in gen eral Dis hands cross fire, and at what sections his army is attac ing attacking elsewhere."
As you may well imagine, Angeline Ric hes needed no urging whatever.Even Violet,and her sist ers forgot their dignity, in the interes t and excit ement of the moment .Followed by a column of cavarly in a few minutes aft er t hey rode swf swiftly down the company s treet , followed by Gertrude Angeline and all the ot her boy and girlscout leaders and many of the child scout s too.
Hanging over the dis tan t battle scene however was an ominous fog of smoke. But they rode on untill they were wit hin easy hearin g dist anc e of it .
"We had bet ter get a look in at the en emys left wing first ."said one of th the gen erals, settlin g t he field glass to his eyes, and s tarin g nervously in the direc tion of the bloody battlefield"We got s to see general Quiheron s main attack and see where we'll have the means to stop it ."he added before the little Princesses, or Angeline Riches had a c han c e t o speak.
They rode forward much closer and t hen still c loser, getting about as near to the sc ene as Penrod and Angeline Ric hes had been but in a different location and then waited.Instantly the fog of smoke before a wind rising in that locality melted away, and there flashed into view a terrible long column of victorious Glandelinians advanc ing, where at anot her portion of the christian works still held by the defen ders the Glandelinians were or had been t hrowing themselves forward again and again upon the position, an d were now rushin g forward to make a fiercer attac k t han ever.
"Have at those dirty Glandelinian devils."roared one of the colonels, plung ing forward and a, almost forgt forgetting that he did not even have aregiment of soldiers at his back.Angeline Ric hes an d Gertrude c lut c hed one anot er another in o horror, and only Violet, and her sisters remained calm.
"Quic k"general Handon."threathed Violet."Send one of your men to rouse the army and have the whole move forward to the support of general Talisman.Everybody else with us , got ready."commanded Violey Viol t Violet, as the soldier thus sent rode off pel haat e.everybody were soon ready in c olumn.They all rode clos er than before, and Jen nie Vivian said to Angeline Ric hes!
"You as a girlscout guide know the territories of c o our country well.Lead us at onc e to the battle field as close as we dare to go.We willgive the enemy a rec ie recept ion of our own untill the troops arive."

.N ow many of the boyscouts in this column of Vivianit es were new rec ruits and had never been clos close or within the range of a battle field in their whole lives .Gre gritting their teet h andclosin t heir eyes as theri their horses raced forward, they wait ed tensely for the next command, and wonderfu wonderin g fearfully if they would be in time to at leas t give the enemy a temporary check.Fifteen minutes of very hard and swift ridin g followed, and then they were in position themselves behind a lon g line of trees and rocks, having s ent their hors as to the rear . The Glandelinians under Colonel Nash had broken forward t hrough the Tribune glen and had carried a christian position in the immediate vin icit y of this pos itions.But they were terrified and dismayed to find a large regiment of boy and girlscouts in the rear and front of the captured position.They ran like mad before these boy and girlscout s without so muc h as firing a single shot . A han half hour passed and the main body of the Glandelinian assailants under Quiberon were now rec oiling but only bec ause the reinforcing c hristian troops had arived.The enemy along the main line had not been aware of,the new force of troops comin g against t hem untill it had been almost too late.T e battle had been so severe that Gertrude Angeline hid her fac e on An geline Rochess shoulder, and Angeline Ric hee with a shudder, saw more of the christians rushing forward.The Glandelin ians t hough so fiercly attacked t ried now to rally, but before they could country count er strike the Abbiesannians called Ozites came up with a long line of artillery, and wit h three great broadsides either dest royed a large portion of the line or even sent the survivors flying like frightened s heep.Wit h a terrible bellow the whole christian line surged forward in a billowing wave.The enemy recoiled to their own advanc ed position, and then defended that trench wit h such pugnacious ferocity as if they and the position had been petrified int o statues an d ground but even t hen despite all this dogged courage, the enemy were soon out, and the christian in posit ion and opening a long wave of artillery fire upon the main position.

"We'll progress on lat er wi when more support c omes up."pbserved general Wizard calmly."We have saved general Talis mann and that's a comfort .Axshame t o let the Glandelinians try to push us like that and get away with it.But now let us go and support general Talismanns left wing."

So arcely able to believe their eyes , and with man y bac kward glanc es , Violet,and her sisters rode back to the other sc en e of battle still raging in favor of the enemy.The c hristian troops in the meantime hadalso arived here and had counter attac ked t wice but had not been able to oust the enemy from the works, an d general Wen t hworth of the c hristians who led one of the attacks, lost so many men he was loathe to try it again wit hout t he support of artillery.The enemy had poured upon i his at tackers an annihilating fire.General Sir Hokus o omo up wit h a division of the Abyssinkilian N inth Corps ijust when the center of the en emys line had been cut to pieces and he charged against the enemy with as much energy as a man would strike anot her with his mailed fist , and general High Boy, moving aroundewit h his C olumn of Dondobians and a divis ion of Angolinian troops, moved to the attack, while his artillery played a lively tat oo upon the posit ion wit h shell shrap nell and even high explosives and gas bombs .

But the resistanc e of the enemy was tan acious, and drove back t he attack with immeasurable immeasureable loss.Everything had been tried here t hatcould and the enemy still won.

"The reason they won't give way is bec ause general Quiberon commands here in person."an orted general High boy at last. to his generals."You deploy your fresh column of Tripongolians here and I'll go and see whether I c annot get general Henry Gale to c rush the enemy o in t he C ornfields .That's their stron ger position it seems."

The line of battle was formed by signal and as extensive as the column was it was in battle line in a very short time, and it moved forward so rapidly that the en emy were as t on ish aston ished.every make of cannon was open upon them as well as a gen eral rifle fire, but the attack was muc ess ful t his time at e nearly all quarters ,as ires irrestible as a blow from a hammer t hrough a window pane, and the christian troops moved on wit h great violence and soon had the works in their possession.

Butbthe c orn field was a problem.General C hooriobed had led the attack here, but the enemys line of fire tore his attack all to pieces and the general was born e to the rear mortally wounded.During the confus ion that followed t he survovirs survivors expec ted to t see the terrible Glandelinians under Quiberon c ome forth in a t errific count er charge, but stared in perfect amazement he when they saw the enemy running in panic before a flan k attac k of general Wizards own divis ion. It was not you mus t admit a mos t reassuring sight to s ee the christian troops come through t he cornfields from an unexpec ted direction, and for a few moments the surprised Glandelinians had been t oo stunned to fight or move.

But as the C hristians continued to move on wit h fixed bayonet s in count less numbers, an d yelled like Indians , they ran before them like sheep, the greater number who were too near t he attackers sit her throwing themselves down flat or holding their arms up in tokenof surrender.It took untill nearly evening then elsewhere before the whole entire works of Talismans army was again in his possession, and my how savage the fighting had been .And you c an well imagine the generals relief an d ast onis ment , when he saw his works even in possession of the vast number of c hris tian reinforc ements to be put at an d under his c ommand.

"Father,father"cried the generals son"clasping him roun d the waist ."Here's Violet,and her sisters, An e N Angelinia Aronburg, and all the boy and girlscouts and it was they who saved us , and I hope general Quiberons army cannot ever attack us again."

At the son of the childs voice, the generals wife ran out of the tent t o embrace h r her son, and after a heat y introduct ion, and great ing all around, the regiment of child scouts filed into the generals headquarters.Some body was seen to slink silently out of sight, as general Talismann led Violet and her sisters to his own room.Seat ing Violet and her sisters, and c alling for the orderlies to bring seats andchairs an d the like for the res t, the excited general ran to and fro, untill every one was seated .

"Just thin k"puffed general Talismann, sinkin g down at last beside his son and wife"We didn't even know that Violet and her sisters returned to c amp so s oon.My my what a lot to be t alked over."

"ighting, fighting, and fighting and still no end of it."groaned his wife."Listen t o it still rage even though your victorious Hubby."

"Never mind"s omforted her husband, more reinforcement s are comin g and t hen I'm going to revenge revenge this blow, by takin g the enemys pos ition."

"If we just know where general Tattypoo was."sighed Violet softly,"there would be not hing more to worry us.And I'm wonderf wondering where Mildred Manning is.

They said she was out of the hospital but she is no where around.She would ge a great help to us right now."

"Worry no lon gerv "Your Little Highnesses ."

Turning to see where the whispers had c ome from, Violet ,and her sisters s aw Mildred Manning arix arise from her chair.

"I am Mildred Manning who was wounded by the treacherous Glandelinian s niper." Announc ed Mildred c learly.

"But I thought you were safe even then."said Susan Farrol s aizin g her hand imploringly.At on ce the whole room was t hrown into a st at e of utmost ut most c onfusion, some saying this,and some saying that , and all wondering aloud,, so that it sounded like a great session of many c on gressmen.

"What bec ame of the Glandelinians who shot you through the open window in t he back"shouted one of the boyse out s.

"You'll have to admit she's a bewitchin g girlscout "said one of the others."Why n ot let the girlscout officer speak for herself."he added shrilly.

"It sounds like good sens e."dec lared Jack Saunders, nodding approvingly, and Violet,and her sisters who were even more an tous to hol them; any one els e at Mildreds announ c ement , to looked at eac h o her,and t hen Violet raised her small scepter for silence.

"Let Miodred Manning tell her story of how she happened to have helped us."commanded Violet in her gentle voice.There was an instant silence, and almost as one t he whole company turned to the lovely little figure in purple and wait ed expec tant ly for her to speak .

"About two days ago"began the girlscout, tossin g in back her golden air hair "i after being released from the Base Hospital as cured, I went out on a scout ing tour to the north.To the hill position of general Fat hers , came one of the boyscout leaders, to ask for my assistance in his work.His army he said was that of the Munchkin Abyssinkilians, and hold a position of great st rength an s size, but was in dan ger nevertheless from t he enemys most heavies t artillery and at tack by combined infantry and c avarly.As Angelin ia Aronburg made no objec tion to his wish, and as I myself was quite willing---preparations were at once made for the scout ing party,and he was to ace ompany me.At that time as you all kn ow the Mombi pos itions to the n orth of the Lucillie Fortifications and Ric kson fort resses, were in t heir fullest strength and their many cannons had for man y days of the past untill n ow made many vic itors far off thick all that section was in fierce volcan ic erupt ion. Passin g Gilken ny Sailent the later afternoon before yesterday, and a ocing man y patrols all over the territory watchin g the movements of the christian t roops,I bein bein g disguis ed as a vagabound stopped to ask for the reas on of the many patrols being out,and asked them if they were not afraid of an attack by the Nationalists .On e of the leaders of the patrols quickly explo explain ed that t hey were watching for some means for an attac k upon general Talisman n, and for the reinforc ing of the Mi Mombi peact pos ition s.Afterwards as I watched un easily from a hidden arbor,I saw the movements of the enemy in the direction of the Mombi Works.The works were a dead to me and extended along the Gilliken C reek, and the Munchkin C rossroads all the way down tward the South Bend of the great Norma l."

General Talismann pursed up his lips, and shook his head sadly at this part of the story, for he well remembered Mombis terrible artillery storms upon the works of Aurandahondia and other positions, and of the plan of the enemy to dest roy his own position and attack him all all along the line, and which had been so fiercely attempted.

"Of cours e "Proceeded Mildred demurely,I saw early this morning the enemy rush upon the christian works furiously.That very minute too word came by messenger that a portion of the christian line under general Turner had disappeared, and that caused me to become scared."And "continued the girlscout somberly"That christian Nation C orps has never been heard of since distressed and unhappy unhappy though we were,I and that boyscout, returned to our own camp at once to warn all our followers to move so as to be away from the danger zone should the enemy be victorious in the battle.We all moved at once and returned to our own main sector at Sunbeam Creek, where we hoped to escape the horrible scenes of the battle, and the dangerous Glandelinians.For three hours we were safe, and thought the enemy was not making any success .But toward ten thirty this morning, we saw a great Glandelinian column passing far too our left.Two of their leading regiments were carrying flags with a huge black eagle engraved on them, and we saw them strike general Talisman that terrible blow that Angelina Ann gelina and Pemrod witnessed--before I had time to ride off for help---and that "sighed Mildred, was the last I saw of general Talismanns battle line untill now."

"But what happened!"Gasped Mildred Maxwell leaning so far forward, she nearly turnin tumbled from her chair."How far did the Glandelinians progress ."

"They drove as far as the edge of the boy and girlscout camps "answered Mildred Manning sadly."They crushing against the christian line,the enemy then began the worst attack I have ever witnessed."

"I know what happened.I know what happened"Cried Jennie Turner springing entirely out of her chair chair, and spinning round three times in sheer excitement. "General Talismanns left wing alone was too strikingly entranched to be carried, and the worst the enemy could do isx attack again and again."

Mildred blushed at the girlscout Recruiting officers little speech.

"I don't know about that"she went on"But I do know that the enemy couldn't carry that position, though he was victorious elsewhere.General Talismanns left was able to again and again drive the enemy clear out of the small forest, and took possession of the enemys works themselves."

"General Talisman stood his ground wisely and well"added Violet, giving the general an affectionate pat on the shoulder.

"But did you know then that the powerful Mombi works could have shelled the christian position ?"demanded Angelinia Aronburg looking up at Mildred with round eyes "And how how did it all happen that you escape the enemy when the attack began ?"

Mildred with a rueful little laugh shook her head at the chief girlscout leader.

"I didn't realize then that the Mombi works was secure"she admitted frankly, and went on to relate the scenes which Angelina Richeson and Pemrod too had witnessed.

"What became of the Glandelinian forces after we defeatrd them!"asked Jennie Vivian."

"Why they turned back to their own main position at Mombi Works .I myself started at once for this part of the position when I saw the disaster to the enemy began .By vi first glance from Munchkin C rossroad she wed me the enemy retreating before a tide of christian soldiers in panic.Realizing at once what was happening,I rode to a high rise of ground and saw your troops break up the enemys lines and drive the whole back."

"I wish you had met us before we returned to camp this morning."said Violet who with her sisters had taken a great fancy to the girlscout who had been so treacherously shot and wounded."Did you have to ride the horse and swim the river, Mildred?"

"My horse carried me nearly all the way."explained Mildred."The rest of the distance I walked beside my horse, and then I was rowed across the river."

"The boatman who ever he was shall be well regarded."puffed the general.

"Did the fellow know not if not hing of the enemys attack attack?"

"I guess not."sighed Mildred"Inddidn't think however it would ext end so far, for that matter, or become so severe, but here I am, and now tell me my dear Princesses how you and all your brave followers here, happened to be here just in time to save general Talismann from a disasterous defeat!"

"It was one of my soldiers who is a Foriegner so they say."The general informed Violet and her sisters joyfully.

"What is his name!"inquired Jennie Vivian .

"Private George or Jimmie Scanlin."He himself picked the proper time as he said, carried a message to general Munchion, and begged YYou and your sisters to come to our assistance early this morning.There is the fellow anyway.Jim Scanlin, jim Scanlin.Fetch the soldier some of you please."

"Jim Scanlin."murmured Jennie Vivian loudly, and looking from one to the other in amazement.He came to see I and my sisters early this morning.Why we were out ha having a thrilling if not dangerous adventure early this morning,vand never heard of Jim Scanlin."

"Jim Scanlin didn't carry no message"cried one of the boyscouts jumping up indignantly."I was with Violet and her sisters all morning, and we were in peril from forest fires, shell fire,and had an encounter with a Glandelinian cavarly squadron and routed them.But we had no one with us by the name of Jim Scanlin."

General Talismann and even Violet and her sisters were so stunned by this news ,that they looked at each other in bewilderment,and the general sank back on hy his shair in perfect astonishment, and at Angelinia Aronburgs earnest solicitation ,the boy scout told of the adventures in the flaming forest .

"Th t Foriegn fool shall be punished well for this."promis had the general.He was shocked at the dreadful dangers Violet,and her sisters had encountered, and the desistfulness of the soldier who got into the army through a pull, and really came to see the war more than anyt any other reason .While a dozen of the soldiers ran to fetch Jim Scanlin, Gertrude Angeline put her hand gently on the generals arm.

"That's what we got for trusting too many Foriegners in the army whom we know nothing about."she reminded him softly."Perhaps he cáttt&xplian he can explain."

Perhaps he can explain."

But the general kept muttering under his breath, and when the soldiers returned, dragging the soldier by the arms, his feelings overcame him and rushing forward he began to shake the Foriegner violently to and fro.

"Let Jim Scanlin speak if he has anything to say"suggested Violet, as the general paused for breath.At once the Foriegner flung himself on his knees and begged the good generals forgiveness.

"If I lose my rank as a soldier here it will be punishment enough."Groaned the soldier."I couldn't find them, and was afraid to go out of the lines so I told the lie."

"Cowardly Foriegners are of no use in this country."said Violet leaning forward gravely"But if the general pardons you so will we.But you don't deserve it."

Most of the child scouts present however did not believe the mans offense was a serious one and therefore all pleaded,(except Violet and her sisters, who needed not to) and finally the general though he was angry, finally consented not to make the soldier pay a serious penalty, but he issued the order nevertheless that after a months time he would receive a disgraceful discharge from the army, and also would not be allowed to remain in the country but would be deported."

"There "sighed Violet"That settles everything, and now we can all hope to see the enemy quiet again."

"I'm sure I cannot be able to fight good again till I eat."moaned one of the boyscouts ina weak voice."Is there no fóótt food in this part of the camp, or has the enemy carried everything away."

Violet,and her sisterstoo felt hungry as they had not eaten a bite nearly all day, and therefore they requested the general to seevto it that all had a good hearty supper, and therefore though it was past ten oclock at night, everybody presently sat down to such a military feast , as had not been held in that part of the besieging christian lines ever since the seige started..And when at least the feast was over, and the general led Violet and her sisters and the special ranked girl and boyscout officers to splendid apartments, the other celebrites sat talking in their own room for the rest of the night spending the hours in planning,and not untill the bugle call was heard did any of the sleepers stir from their cots.

After a merry breakfast in the barracks of the encampments,General Talismann conducted the Vivian Girl Princesses over the entire line of vfortified works along his section of the seige, and they all agreed that it was quite as strong position ion,and that the enemy the day before must have made an assault of the most unusual and record breaking violence to have even progressed as far as yhey did.There was hardly any sunshine this morning.:From the waters of the Norma Run seemed muddier, and was filled with all sorts of floating debris , and floes of half burned wood.Yet everywhere the cheers and shouts of the troops over the splendid victory, greeted the visitors and the lovely Vivian Girl children.

"If we just had an enormous cavarly squadron."mused general Talismann, putting one arm around his wife, and the other around his youngest son"Everything would be much better and I could then dare to try and oust the enemy out of the Mombi Works."

His lieutenant general who stood close by, looked so unhappy at this remark ,that Jennie Vivian(she's the leader of her sis ters, always were) bade the cavacade to stop, and dismounting from her horse, hurried over to Penrod, and a minut e he was seen rac ing away on his swiftest horse..After a whispered con ferenc e wit h Angeline Aronburg, which nobody happened t o notic e,J ennie and the great girlscout Matron and Organi zer rode off by themselves.About half an hour later, general Talismann recieved a report that a great cavarly squadron which had been irnac tive since they arived to the besieged army had come t o cover andsupport him.

"I wish my brother could see this ."said the general riding forth to meet t he c ommander of the cavarly squadron,and greet ing him as any general would.
Colonel Orpha we was already up with them too.

"How did you do it!"begged general Talismann t urning back to Jen nie Vivian, who stood smiling at him from her perch on the horses back, for which of the Vivian Girls couldn't ride a horse standin g up!"

"Ask Sc hfield Penrod."replied the little princess mysteriously,but when they alll crowded around the chief of boy scouts , he merely shook his head, and mut tered that to send a signal to a c avrly leader----was quite easy-if you just knew how.And with this ans wer they were forc ed to be satisfied.

"The enemys great attack must have broken through the left of general Talismanns right wing, and enabled the Glandelininns to carry the position ."
Explained Penrod, who hadbeen puzzlin g over this particular problem ever sinc e the battle had started.As t his c leared up the last of the mys teries, Violet,and her sisters and he their followers now made ready to depart for their own part of the besieging lines .Rado llife was so loa loathe so say good bye to Angelinia Aronburg, that Violet and her sist ers persuaded them to return wit h them to the main christian works to the north.So again everybody formed int o column, the boy and girlscouts bringing up the rear, and away t hey they went to their own part of the christian position..It was about eight oclock in the morning when they arived in their own part of the christian lines.

"Let's danc e over the victory Rattttt that has been won."proposed the c hristian boyscout leader Benny, blinking at the smoky at mosphere, flaming Vivian Wickey fortific ations in the distanc e, and strange Glajdelin ian signals that were flashed like Fourt of July sparklers and firworks.

"Why Benny dear"exclaimed Jean Saunders,"do you really feel like dancing at such times as these ."""QQAAZ

"Don't you "!Questioned the boy scout,, smiling down at the little girlscout with whom he had come through so many exciting adventures. Jean nodded delightedly and as one of the army bands grouped in front of the position to welcome them broke into a lively Marc h, the whole company of boy and girlscouts danc ed round and round, many of the soldiers c onverting hilariously in the c enter.
Violet and her sisters at this moment came back, and Jennie c lapped her hands , amand bidding them form in a long line, plac ed herself at the head, and marc hed merrily into their own c amps wit h the playing bands leading and following.
There drawn up to meet them were all the rest of the boy and girlscouts.Benny kept close to Jack and Jean(n t not been), for he wanted to hear about eac h one of the various named regiments of the Vivianites, and Angelinia Aronburg taking her two leading friends in each arm, saw that they were everywhere introduced.Violet,and her sisters themselves, were at the head, and Jennie Vivian with Angelinia Roc hae on one arm, and Mildred Manning on the other led the way to the main encampment s.T,e main Army cook, peering out from the barrac ks kitchen, where he had been anxiously awaiting their return, sprang out joyiously as they entered .

"This party has been ready sinc e early morning,"he roared acc ousingly.Where in the world have you been.At that battlefield! "

While Penrod halted to explain, the whole company seat ed themselves at the long banquet table covered with a red and yellow and blue table cloth. Soon dishes and silver began to clink merrily, military waiters to rush to and fro with delicious trays of breakfast food, while the Princ esses Private orchestra struck up that grand old favorite"Repas Band)march.Theboyscout Benny to his great satisfac tion
,sat next to Penrod, and between c ourses the boyscout leader, explained tht t hat he was not a Canadian as many thought he was, but that he was a native of Abbieannia, and has gone with his foster Father general Greatheart to Canada on touring trips before the great war broke out .When e he returned to Abbieannia a little after the war came on, Violet and her sisters had him put into the troop of boyscouts, and now the little Princ esses had made him Royal Boyscout leader of all boyse outs, plac ing him as high in rank as Angelinia Aronburg is over the girlscouts, and by hard study and c onstant practice he had become the most famous of all child sc outs in any c ountry of the world .

"So you think you c an give me a far higher rank and help me rec ruit anot her powerful regiment of boy and girls couts?"queried Benny, looking admiringly at the famous boyscout and military wonder worker .

"Certainly"replied the boy scout leader c arelessly, tossing off a glass of Lemonade."When ever you wish."

"Before you refuse the c ommission think it over carefully."c autioned Jean Saunders, who sat on the other side."Penrod dec ides to recruit all rescued child slaves into a new band of child scouts, to have them trained, and to have to be their "Chief C aptian".It h is better for these rescued child slaves to help us win the freedom of all their other unfortunate little comrades.You can by t he Grac e of God make a famous person out of yourself too"he finished flatterin g ly"And we surely need lots of boy and girlsc outs too.The rank isn't so dangerous as it looks,and in fact we are the joke on the enemy.They are afraid of us, and we can get Glandelininns any time we wish to capture them.I was once a private in the army of girlscouts"she confided solemnly"and had good times even then before I and my sister Aggie and Minnie bec ame offic ers.Take my advice and acc ept the c ommission ."

"Please do"Begged Mildred Maxwell from her place ac ross the table. You"You are so s trong and handsome, and you c an dan c e as well as any one of us and you too are a terror to the enemy.I remember onc e when you went out just for a lark with our Princ esses, and how you suddenly rode off from them a little distanc e, c aptured ten Glandelininn soldiers single handed and brought them bac k with h you to their great surprise.You didn't even fail in anything you tried onc e."declared t he little girlscout captian stoutly.

Benny smiled and blushed so happily, that he did not appear like the tough looking boys cout he reallly was.And ni his expression was now so pleasant and jolly, that he appeared good to them all.

"I shall be as you two wish"said the boyscout captian, with a fond glanc e ac ross the t able, and adnid the cheers and claps of very one present, he agreed to do as Penrod suggested .

"And be wit h our big command of Vivianites always"invited Jennie Vivian, from the h ad head of the table."And Rado liffe too."He shall be one of our chief C onfederates."declared Jennie, and coming round to where they sat, she touched them bot h on the shoulder with her scepter, to show that t hey now belonged to her Highest Order of Vivianit es. Benny was too overc ome to say a word, but Radliffe arose, and made a lon t lengthy speech of thanks.

One end of the table had been reserved for the Mascot boy and girlscout leaders, and Penrod had really the seat of honor at gh the g head.Next to him sat Joe Greene Angelinia Aronburgs boyscout retainer, taking in every t hing, and keeping in good low conversation wit h Penrod and some of the others nearest him.Joe Green e acc ratly thought of many of the n ew boy and girlsc out s he hoped to see very soon.The appetite of many of the harder working boy and girlscouts amazed Penrod.After several bowls of hot c orial, two large wh tttt wheat c akes, and a quart of m ilk,Penrod himself could not eat anot her morsel.
But many others kept on cleaning their plates.As soon as t hey were empty they were hastily replenisi replenished with rare roasts, and steak and also mutton, besides the c orial and the wheatcakes.

Just then Penrod arose, and rapped loudly for order.Rado liffe had left the big Mess Hall a few minutes before, and now returning, whispered a few words to Jennie Vivian who had then spoken to her sist ers for a minute .

At once Jen nie stood up, and facing Penrod and Angelin ia Aronburg, began to speak.

"Our chief of boy spies."explained Jennie in her gentle voice"has been trying t o discover the whereabouts of two Glandelinian spies, one of which has neared our lines disguised as a Idiot.But all of his scout ing has brought no discover of any real strangers within our lines in this locality anywhere, showing that evident ly t hose spies Thank God have never succeeded in entering our lines .(whidh was true) As we wish therefore to also recruit many of the rescued child slaves into a extra regiment of boy and girlscouts,I pronounce you Benny, and you Jack Saunders chief leaders of the new band to be formed."

The applause brought forth by this announc ement was simply deafening. When it had subdued somewhat,, Joe Green jumping up, held out his hand to the newly commissioned boyscout leaders.

"May I be the first to c on gratulate you two."cried Joe greene impulsively."I my self am a Calvernian, and hereafter please consider me a loyal helper in all your plans."

The boyscouts both assured him that they would be pleased to do so, and in a short address,Benny and his companion promished to to the best of his ability in taking c harge of the new commands.The girlscout Trot, and her brother Philador, both also captians of the burroughs, who sat side by side, heard Jennie's proclamanation, with great pleasure and satis satisfac tion.

"I hope you'll visit our commands often."whispered Philador."I will when I can get a good one present you with a brand new beautiful riding horse, and get you a new uniform, and I'm going to ask my father to help me get you a good strong command of boys and girls."

At this ge Gertrtttttttttin ian Gertrude Angeline, who had overheard Phildors remark, jumped up and announced, that she would as chief girlscout leader of all, and boys and well she would create as good and strong a band as possible with Jennie Turner's help, and make Jennie Turner their chief matrons ."

"That makes Jennie Turner have two co-missions."c chuckled Penrod to Benny, as Jennie Turner nodded her approval, and slipped the commission ring on o her middlttttin emiddle finger.

"Hi.Hi.Three cheers for Jennie Turner."cried Penrod, above all the noise and t lippin c.lapping..When Jennie Vivian could make herself heard, she c again called for silene e.Woj Wondering what surprising announc ement would c ome next the company turned eagerly to their little ruler and leader .

As the left camp

"As our left comp of the Vivianites have lost their chief leader through continued sickness, and are still without an able bodied leader,I have decided to make Mildred Manning commander of them"declared Jennie imperiously"----And-----"

We "We ac cept with pleasure'"interrupt ed Penrod,"We accept this high honor that has been conferred upon Mildred Manning, and n w if you will just exc use me,I'll dash off an d tell the good n ews to her friends Catherine and n Jane Lee."

He quickly went out side and mount ed his horse, and then urged him off to the great astonis hment and emusement of them a ll.That is all ex except Angelinia Aronburg and Ric hee.Ruching after Penrod, they c alled loudly for him to stop.And when he saw the little girl leaders waving from the middle of the C ompany S treet , he did turn i his horse back, and dismounting let eac h of them embrac e him heartily.

"I'm coming back again to visit you."promished Penrod wit h a slight choke,for he hated to say good bye to so many of his girl and boyscout friends of the Burroughs ."

Then salutin g, he remounted his horse, and rode off.Arm in arm the two chief girlscout leaders returned to the Mess Hall, and after the last speech had been made and they had all drunk the health of the new leaders in a small glass of wine,t he a party broke up after a grand length of Prayers , and t hey all went out into their various camps to assume their proper duties.

A SURPRISINGVAND TERRIBLE LOSS....
ANGELIN IA ARONBURG HAS HER TROUBLES/.
SURPRISES.

THE DEFIANCE OF A GLANDELIN IAN GENERAL.
WHY ANGELINIA ARONBURG WOULDN'T TAKE REVENGE THOUGH SHE EVEN WAS JUSTIFIED..."."."".QQQ

ndsed(you are in need) though it may be surprising to the readers, if this is ever read, there was not even the slightest doubts about the facts,, Violet, and her sisters,the lovely brave and good lit tle Abbiesannian Princesses, were lost .They had completely disappeared on the second day after the past battle which had worried Angeline Richae,and Penrod so much.Not one of the military offic ers or generals of the besieging c hristian armies , not even the regiments of boy an d girlscouts---n or even her closest and most loving friends and relatives--knew what had bec ome of them, and Emperor Vivian so far away did not know of the fact .It was Angeline Ric hee, who first discovered it.Angeline Richee as we all know by this time, was one of the highest of girlscout officials next to or equal in rank to Angelinia Aronburg, but in command of the Vivianites , who however comes from one encampment or army t o anot her, guides patrols of scouts, and does all sorts of things , and whenever Violet and her sisters has a general Headquarters building or tent, either she or Gertrude Angeline are always given a delightful suite of rooms in their Royal Headquarters or tent , just because Violet,and her sisters loved these two the most, espe ially Gertrude, who was like a sis ter t o t hem and wanted her to live as near them as m possible, so the seven or eight brave girl commanders might be much together.

How ver Angelin ia Aronburg was n t t he only highest girlscout leader with Angeline Ric hee.There is also the ot her very familior one Jennie T urner whose adventures had been nearly equal to that of Violet and her sisters, though shewas too dangerous to the enemy to be captured,, and still another very high ranked one Angeline Roonie, c alled Annie for short, who also was a spit fire and as dangerous as Jennie Turner.These girlscout l aders also had rooms in the headquarters of Violet,and her sisters, and were great chums,but Angelinia Aronburg was the dearest friend of their gracious little rulers, and only she at any hour dared to seek Violet,and her sisters in their royal apartments of tent.For An elinia Aronburg had been a girlscout in the Army ever since she was six years old, and had spied on the en emy disguised as a child sh e way before the enemy started the war, and had been a famous girlscout leader much longer than the other girls, and also had been made a Princess of a part of the country.Jennie Turner was a year older than Angelinia Aronburg, and Annie Roonie was a year youn er, and had the same features as "Little Annie Roonie"of the C omics would have in real liv life, but had long black hair in s tead of bobbed and had a sni sinester fighting fac e, yet the t hree were near enough of age with her and Angelinia Ric hee to become great c omrades and playmates and to have stirring adventures and nice times together, and wd were nearly as dreaded by the enemy as Blengiglomenean C reatures are.It was while the four of them were talkin g together that morning in Angelinia Aron urgs own room that Jennie Turner propose t hat they make a good long patrol near the Lucillie Ric kson F r Fortifications , which was on e of the might iest of the many Glandelinian land fortifications and defenses and ruled by general Purgatorian.

"I've never been close to there yet."said Jennie Turner"But Penrod once told me that it is the hardest to approach of all fortifications on the land side of Vivian Wickey ."

"I'd like to go too."added Annie Roonie.

"All"right"Said Angeline Ric hee"I'll go and ask Jennie Vivian.Perhaps too she will let one of us take her own o horse, and her automat ic pistols , which would be much nic er to us.We'll take a st rong calvary force to s upport us in c ase we get attacked.This territ ory of Vivian Wic key is a pretty big place ,when you get to all the edges of it, and gen eral Purgatorian has a mighty strong army,the strongest army in the war so far."

S o she jumped up,vn and went along the halls of the splendid headquarters untill she came to the military suit e, which filled all the front of the t hird floor.In a lit tle waitin g room sat one of Violet Vivians girlscout mascot, Ellie Lambe, who was busily sewing ....." ""QA

"Are not the Princesses up out of bed yet ?"inquired Angeline."It's unusal if they're sleeping late this morning.They never do."

"I don't know my dear"replied Ella."I have not heard a word from either of the Princesses this morning.They have not even called for their bath or their breakfast, and it is far past her usual time for them."

"This is sure strange to me."exclaimed the little girls out.

"Yes indeed"agreed Ellie"But of course no harm could have happened to them within so powerful and strong a christian position.No one among us boy and girl scouts could be or have ever been captured by the enemy, the enemy really fear us,, and therefore for Glandelinians to even come within out lines to kidnap them, would have to pass us first.And Violet,and her sisters are powerful Princesses, and have no enemies within our lines so far as we know.Therefore I am not at all worried about them, though I must admit with their silence seems unusual."

"Perhaps" said Angeline Richee thoughtfully"They have overslept."

"Well if they have it is more unusal for them the latest they ever did get up is five thirty, and the earliest three oclock in the morning."

"Maybe she must be reading, or working out some new sort of plan to help general Mansion carry on the seige to a quicker success....."

"Any of these things may be true."replied Ella Lambe"So I haven't dared to disturb the Princesses. "

"But who's to go and see them!"

"Angelinia Aronburg, and you too"replied Ella are privileged characters and therefore Miss Richee,and therefore I'm sure that Violet, nor her sisters wouldn't mind at alo if you went past the guard of their room and went in to see her.The guard will let you pass."

"You are right"said Angeline Richee, and being permitted by the guard to pass, and the opening the door for her, she went in.All was still here in the outer chamber.S he walked into anot her room, which was the boudoir of the room of the Princesses, andthen pushing back a heavy drapery, the girls coutchieftian and guide entered the sleeping room of the Vivian Girls.The beds they slept in were vacant, the room was vacant, not a trace of Violet and her sisters were found, and though the beds showed they had slept in them they were not mussed in any way to cause suspicion at all.They were in the same position as Violet,and her sisters always left the beds when they arose in the morning.Only a little disturved near the pillows.

Very much surprised, and yet still with no fear that anything had happened to her friends the Vivian Girls,Angeline returned through the boudoir to the other rooms of the suite.She went into other rooms, and even into their council room which adjoined the royal suite, but in none could of these places could she find Violet,and her sisters.

So she slowlyh returned to the antaroom where she had left the girlscout aide de -camp, Ellie Lambe, and said;;;;;

"Violet, and her sisters are not in their rooms now, so they surely must have gone out without letting any of us know."

"I cannot understand how they could have done that, withouy without my being able to see her or the guards announce their going."replied Ellie"Unless she and her sisters made themselves invisible and surely they cannot do that."

"The Princesses are not there any how."declared Angeline Richee.

"Then let us go and find her."suggested the girlscout aide-de-camp, who now appeared to be a little uneasy.

So they went into the corridors , and there Angeline Richee almost stumbled into another girlscout , who was dancing lightly along the passage.

"Stop a minute Helen "she called"Have you seen the Princesses this morning."

"Not I "replied the girlscout, dancing nearer."I had been out scouting with Dolores Mic-Hollaster Jennings this morning and did not return until a few minutes before now .So of course I'm sorry to say I have not seen Violet, and her sisters."

"Very well Helen"said Angeline,.

There were some things about the girlscout Helen that would have seemed curious to one seeing her for the first time.She was common ly called" "The big hat girl" because she always wore such a big Heart shaped milit ary girlscout hat , and which was highly decorated even though she was only a lieutenant.

Her hair was a bob like those of Child slaves an unusual one amongst all the Abbiennnian boy and girlscouts .In spite of her queer military make up, she might as well have been magically alive, for she had been shot at oft en in her own career, and was one of the oldest of the girlscouts in the rank, and had proved herself not the least jolly and agreeable of the many child scouts who as we may as well say were the "Salvation"of the Christian Armies. Helen was a general Favorite, although she was rather flighty and erratic, and did and said many things that surprised her friends and all who became acquainted with her.To Glandelinians she was a "hug regular Rattlesnake in viciousness, and as fat as one. She was seldom still, but loved to dance, go out scouting go out scoutin g, fight the Glandelin ians , lead raids,, to turn hands prings, tumbox, and to summersault, to climb the highest trees, and to indulge in even all active sports that boys indulge in, and was therefore called the "Girlsc out Tomboy."

"I'm going to search for Violet,and her sisters "remarked Angeline Richee,,,, "wor the Princesses are not in their rooms, and I want to ask them a important t question."

"I'll go with you"said Helel."

"All right, Come along if you like."said Angeline .

Together they searched all through the great barracks, and even to the fartest limits of the barracks grounds, which were quite extensive and well fortified, but no where could they find a trace of violet, and her sisters . When Angeline returned to where Jennie Turner and Annie Roonie awaited her,the little girls face was rather solemn and troubled, for never before had Violet,and her sisters ever gone away from camp or done anything, without telling their friends and comrades, where they were going or what they intended to do, and without a strong escort that befitted their royal state, especially in time of peril. Violet, and her sisters were gone however, and not a soul had seen her go,or knew they were gone.Angeline had met and questioned Jack Saunders and many others, and even the powerful boyscout leader Penrod, but not one of them had seen Violet, and her sisters since they parted with them the evening before, and had gone to their own rooms.

"Violet, or her sisters didn't say anything last nig ht about going anywhere." observed Jennie Turner.

"No, and that is the strange part of it too"replied Angeline Richee."Always Violet,and her sisters notifies us of everything they do ,or always where they go, and usally asks us to accompany them, or help them."

"Why not look in the encampment of the Lagorians."suggested Angelinia Roonie. "Any of those boy or girlscouts ought to be able to tell us where they are if Violet,and her sisters passed through there."

"Of course"cried Angeline."How stupid of me.Why didn't I think of that before!" and at once the girlscout leaders hurried away on one their swiftest horses to that encampment.This wonderful organization of boy and girlscouts, was also one of the Vivian Girls greatest organizations .There was a large ca yellow sided and purpled roofed tent in the center of the camp. As soon as they were admitted into the encampment they rode up to the tent .Their main leader Geraldine Gale stared in amazement, when she learned of the trouble Angeline was in, concerning Violet, and her sisters, while her under officers and many others uttered exclamanations of dismay apprehension and what not.

Violet,and her sisters indeed were gone.and no one knew where they were.... q19

That same morning there was the greatest excitement in the headquarters of Angelinia Aronburg, the most powerful of the goilscout leaders .This headquarters situated in the encampment of the Burroughs, far south of the Vivianite camps, where violet,and her sister sisters had been in command, was a splendids structure of wood.Here the girlscout chieftian directed her own following, surrounded by a bevy of most beautiful girlscouts of the whole command(lead a hand end) gathered from many parts of the regiments, as well as from the Vivianites themselves , whose camp stood within easy sight of Aurandebon din. Indeed it was considered a great honor to be allowed to serve the good and greatest of all girlscout leaders , whose arts of putting things over on the most dangerous of the Glandelinians generals were done only to benefit the Christian cause. Angelinia Aronburg, who was known as "Gertrude Angeline also" was the most valued follower of Violet, and her sisters, and was to them as a sister, for her knowledge of the ways and so forth of the country,and of her ways to get the best of the most dangerous Glandelinian generals was as if she lit orally worked Sorcery, and everything she has done already as the reader knows was wonderful and she could accomplish almost anything, that Violet, and her sisters, the Lovely Vivian Girl Princesses wished her to do...."

Of all the best which surrounded Angelinia Aronburg in and outside her hegi headquarters, there was none more marvelous than her big beautifully tri colored uniformed bands of the child scout soldiers than the Vivianites..Though the story does not hardly mentioned it(as it would take too much time paper and words-- no matter what or were they were the various regiments of child scouts were constantly being inspected busy at various tasks-day by day, sometimes night time at various turns, hour by hours--and they were had every time all the important events, that happened anywhere along the enemys various works and lines, and they would detected everything at exactly the moment the events and movements happened . Every adventure within or without the christian lines, and even in places that the reader never seen or heard of, were recorded and watched closely by the boy and girls cout troopers, who seldom made a mistake, and who stated only the exact truth....)"

So clever were t hey and so often they did these things that they might as well have been magi c al in c on st ruction and supernatural in t heir ways, t hough of course they seemed preternatural.For that r eason nothing c ould be concealed from any of the christian generals by the enemy, who had only to rec ieve the informat o information from these children soldiers , to know everything that was going to take plac e or had taken place. That was one r eason Angelinia Aron burg was looked upon as a girlscout as great as the Fabled Glin da the Good of Oz or as her make believe daughter, for her own work, and the aid of her following made her much wiser t han hardly an y other living person despit e her age an d size.

As the reader also may remember these regiment of boy and girlscouts n ever were seen always with the same army, for they were always at one or anot her, wherever they were needed the mos t.

The numbers of these boy and girlsc outs were known as"Great Legion, but those of the Vivianit es were larger in numbers, than those of any ot her regiment, and although many of them were only eight years old at the youn ges t , there were so many of them, that they made out of themselves an enormous column.Time and again t hey had shownthemselves to be far more dreaded than a whole Christian army.

Always they were armed like Persian or Kurd Brigands , and even they were so dashin g that if only sixteen boys or girlscouts went out scout ing, three times that number of Glandelinian soldiers on even the best hors es and equipped t o t he utmost could so are ely have coped with them children though the scouts be.

To pass into their c amps wit hout knowing the C ounter S ign was impossible, to slip past their guards was impossible, and they were as dan gerous to the enemy as Rattlesnakes who could not be killed.Next to the Blen giglomenean C reatures all child scout regiments of the Vivianit es were dreaded mos t .If not stated before this is the uniform they wear ; "coat lavender, dress and waist yellow, with red or purple dots on the lower seam of dress, t wo c olored stoc kings eit her yellow and purple or red an d purple, with red under c olored heart shaped hapt s hats with purple and red on top. Yet t his morning, when Angelinia Aronburg eit hered her own drawing room after breakfas t and he partook of breakfast this morning as early as five ocloc k as she wis hed t o do a whole lot o to c day, the good and brave girls c out leader was amazed to discover that her most important plan she had made of Vivian Wic key the night before had mys teriously disappeared.Advancing to the s afe in which s he had l plac ed it, she found it had been opened, and the interior ransac ked, and this had been don e while all in the building except the guards had slept.Angelinia Aronburg was shoc ked and grieved.Who indeed could have done this wicked bold t hing, and if so w how did they get into the christian lines without being seen.An?And who c ould wixh wish to deprive her of this great plan.She quickly t elegraphed to all the generals t o be on the lookout in c ase the en emy made an y movement for she suspected spies had stolen her map and she wanted all the generals to be on their guard.After this Gertrude Angeline was thoughtful for a time, c on c onsidering the consequences of her loss.Then she wen t to her own Telegraph and Telephone room to warn all the boy andgirls couts not to let any s trangers or any one out of their camps un der any condit ion whatever.Then when she went to her bookcase so one in Her Rec ord book if she had taken in dny new comers lat ely she discovered all t he books no matter what they wi were had been removed from the shelves.Angelinia Aronburg was now bot h very an gry and alarmed.She knew that if any enemy boy and girlsc out s c ould have been in the ranks she could easily detect them at Mass time as they won't make the Sign of the Cross, but again she soon realized at that hour, n o enemies in disguise were wit hin, as every one even devoi devout ly Recieved Holy Communion, and even followed the Mass through more splen didly t han any one would do even who would be following a mos t interes ting Drama to t he end to theen d.After Mass she sat down in her chair, and tried to think how this extraordinary robbery could have taken place, and how the spies had suc c eeded in getting into the lines.It was evident that the thief or Thieves was or were personalt ies or great power and slickness, or the t heft could never have been acc omplished wit hout her knowledge or the knowledge of the guards, for they all testified t ruthdully that no one had pas sed them at night.

But who in all the land and territory of Besieged Vivian Wickey, was powerful slick, and wic ked an d skillful enough to do this awful thing.?And who h v having the power, c ould also have an objec t to defying the wis est , and mos t talented girls cout leader of all, the world has ever known, and enteredthe camps of the Viviantics unseen, to face the dan gers occ asione ed by these t hemost greatest t error of t he en emy of all?

Angelinia Aronburg thought over the perplexing matter for a full hour, at the end of which t ime she was st ill puzzled how to explain it, thought it c an t hough it c an be said, she was growing mightily suspicious of the Professional Intern ationnl Mutt an d Jeff spies,"as they alone were "Would be C atholics ,"and knew and would demonstrate the Counter sign and get themselves in easily enough.

But although her plan, and all her best books were gone, and her room turned topsy t urvy by herself during her searc h, her knowledge of everything s hecdid and c an do, nor her works of art and so forth had not been stolen, by an y means, sinc e no thief no mat ter how skilful skillful, c an rob one of knowledge ,and t hat is why knowledge is the best and safes t treasure to require.An gelinia Aronburg believed that when she had time to secure some more books, and get some more large paper, she would be able to make kn n ew plans, and s he immediately asked some of the Gemini to go out anywhere in disguise an d try to learn who the thieves reallly were, and what had become of her dream se maps books, and the planes.

"Who ever has done this"she said to her following offic ers "Must have been a foolish rash person or persons ,"For in time he or they are sure to be found out and kidnapped even from the Glandelinian armies and brought to our c amp, and will rec ieo e the fate of thievin g s pies.But of course this is the penalty of war.I spy on the enemyand they spy on me, which I su ppose is as muc h right for one or the other as either of us would face the same penalty if c aught."

"She now made a list of the things she n eeded, and dispato had messagers messengers to every section of the christian besieging lines with ins tructions t o obtain them,and bring them to her or her offic ials as soon as poss ible possible.And one of the messengers metvSchofield Penrod, who was mount ed on the back of his famous charger, and was clinging to its n ec k with both of his arms for the steed was speeding for Gertrudes headquarters as if on a frightened Runaway, bearing the n ews t hat Violet, and her sisters, the best of all the girlsc outs, and being Princesses, and the highest rank of all spies and offic ials, had suddenly disappeared, and no one amongs t the various child scout regiments, nor amongst the army within t his territory knew what had bec ome of them.

"Also"said Penrod gloomily, as he stood before the astonis hed and apprehsiensve Child C Scout C h4 C hieftian"Every sort of art the Vivian Girls Possessed plans, m letters, books and other articles are gone, and there is no trac e to discover where Violet,and her sist ers are.So I c ame to you for assist an ce as soon as we realized out loss.Let us look in your new and great map you had made last light, and see if there is any eas y road tvard the fortified pos itions of the enemy."

"Alas"returned Angelinia Aronburg sorrowfully"we cannot do t hat, for everything I p possessed has disappeared."

One more unusal theft was reported in the christian lines that eventful morn ing but it took plac e so far from eit her Angelinia Aronburgs boy and girlscout regiments, or where Violet, and her sisters had disa peared, that none of those saddened persons I have ment ioned learned of the robbery or whatever you may call it unt illl long afterward .In the far scut hwest ern corner of general Peter Kallers divisions of Abyssinkilians was a high broad fortified table land, that could only be reac hed by climbing a high steep(peep peep) hill which ever side one happens to approac h it.On the ext ensive hill sids surrounding this tableland are no roads or paths at all, but there are unusal quanit ies of bramble bushes wit h sharp pric kers and thorns on them, which during battle storms in that locality made it very difficult for assailing Glandelin ian armies from climb ing up to try to get at the defenders on the top, even with ladders.With the christian divis ion of troops on t op were a sec t ion of Tinot hy Grovet ons great division of boy and girlscout s,t he space they occupying bein g great in extent, and every spot was so s tron gly fortified that probably the "In fernal Regions could not have carried it or prevailed against it, and many of the loudest t hundering c hristian seige guns were in posit ion along the edges of t he t ableland.The Glandelinians had never99since the beginning of the seige of Vivian Wickey, up to now ever carried or scaled this pos ition, though they had made great numbers of terrific assaults covered by artillery, and t heir losses for their fut ile attempts had been terrible in the extreme while the losses of the defenders had been almost not hing.

Bein g well fortified as they were an d being on top of this hill, the boyband girlscout troop up here, had their camps sc at tered all over the flat surface but nearest the edge, not like a city grouped together, but t he tents set where ever t heir leaderss fancy dictated, with fortified fields here, fortified trees t here, and odd looking little paths no connecting the t ent s with one anotherIt was here on t he morning, that when Violet, and her sisters so strangely disappeared from the en campments of the Viviantics, that t he girlscout lieutenant Jennie Townsend discovered that her most important military Geogyaphy Geography and some plans, and the picture of her own parents, brother and little sis ter had been s tolen, and she raised such a hue and c ry over her startling loss, and she raised such a hue and cry, and wailed and s hrieked so loudly, that many of the boy an d girlscouts gathered around her tent to inquifre what was the matter .

In deed it was a serious thin g in any part of the encampments of the child sc outs or christian soldiers to be forced to accuse any one of stealing, so when the scouts heard the lieutenant girlscout declare that her property had b en stolen, her books, and the pictures of her relatives and other things they were bot h humilated and disturbed, and forced Jen nie to go wit h t hem to their leader Groveton, to see what could be done about it.I suppose the reader has read some of the accounts rec ently of the boyscout Timot hy Groveton, for like all other boyscout leaders he had been always more busy busy than usual.The boy scout was in truh desc ended from t he common Glandelinians of Glandelinia, and when he was first born he with his parents had lived in Glandelinia C it y, in the Glandelin ian Country and was much like any other Glandelinian boy, on y however he was good in s t ead of bad, and so were his parents. His par ents however were of an adventurous n ature and began to travel, and finally settled in Calverinia and became Abbiesanian Citizens.Now this posit ion on the tableland had been or should have been unknown to any one not acquainted with it , and so powerful was its defenses that the enemy t hought there was Supernatural powers connected with it, and that Ti mothy Groveton and his followers were supernatural themselves. There was only one way up to the hill with com e compatrative ease which the occupant s knoow knew only t hemselves.The boyscout seemed to be unusally wise an d intelligent , so that he appeared to know as much as any great offic ial spy did, and was able t o reason and argue very well indeed. .All the soldiers had been and still were amazed at the boyscout , and greatly impressed by his learnin g.He was dressed in a very fine uniform, and did all t he things that the generals did, so he had soon come to be called the "Wizard boy.all boyand girlscouts came to regard the boy scout leader as their adviser in all matters t hat puzzled them.They brought all their difficulties to him, and when he did not kn ow anything he admitted it, but tried his best to find it out , which was t o as wellll.Indeed all thought and knew Groveton was much wis er than e he really c ared to admit or show, and also he did n ot let pride over his pos it ion of aurthority get the better of him.The boyscouts usual custom of uniform cons ist d of lavendar knee breec hes, with trimmings of gold braid, and knee buckles, an orange satin ves t , with silver buttons, a swallow t ailed coat of violet o color, yellow stockings and red leather shoes, turned up a lit tle at the toes and having gilt buckles.He wore a field uniform of the same color when out riding or adventuring or fighting, and a purple rounded hat , and carried a gold headed boyscout riding cane.Over his eyes he wore great spec tac les, not bec ause his e e eyes were bad, but bec ause it was the way of all boyscoy c boyscout leaders and so dist inguis hed and gorgeous was his appearance, that all the boy and girlscout leaders of all regiments were very pour proud of him. There was no boyscout leader next to Penrod that t hey liked more better than him.He was an unusual boyscout too for he had often wit hout takin g the time and paper t o write it here made a humbug out of the enemy leaders and mortified them serious ly.Every boy or girl and even soldiers listen ed to his words and commands with great respect, and did just as he ad vised them to do.Now when Jen nie Townsend raised a uc h an outcry over the t heft of her geography, maps, ot her books,and the loss of her cherished pictures,t he first thought of the boy and girlscouts who h came at the alarm was to take her t o Timot hy Groveton , and inform him of v the loss , thinking an d hoping he could be able to have the en t ire territ ory c ombed for the t hief an d perhaps recover her lost property.He listened t o the story with his eyes wide open behind his spec tacles, and then said th in an unst eady voice.-

"N o one in t his c m camp c ould have stolen those t hin gs .If they are really stolen s ome spies must have been here an d took them."

"But who?"asked Jen n ie, an xiously."Who is t he t hief."

"Some Glandelinian spy mus t have taken your property of c our- cours e."replied t he boyscout ,"But how about your guards .Why didn't t hey watch your t en t more c arefully.They are respon s ible for it if t hey didn't."

Hearing t his all the boy and girls n odded t heir heads gravely, and said t o one anot her---

"It is absolutely true.

"But I must recover my property."c ried Jennie.

"N o one c an blame you for that wish for it these things got int o t he hands of the enemy it would be bad for everybody."replied thee boyscout leader.

"Then t ell me where I may find it if possible."she urged.

The look the boys cout leader gave her was a very wise look;an d he aros e from his chair and c trut ted up and down the room, wit h his hands under his coat t ails in a very pompous and imposing manner.This was the firs t t ime so difficult a mat ter had been brought to him and he want ed to thin k.It would never do t o let the Glandelinian s get away wit h anyt hing like that if Glandelinians did it ,and so he thought very very hard how t o frust rate t his and cause t he girl t o recover her articles if possible

"I beg to inform you"said he that not hing in any of t he child scout camps t hat I know of has ever been s tolen before."

"We know that already."answered Jennie Townsend, impatient ly.

"Therefore"s on t inued the boyscout leader",his t heft becomes a very important mat ter and is up t o the Gemini to do t he main work.If thos e articles you lost cannot t at less t be found steps must be taken t o frustrate the en emy.Unfort un at ely we have no milit ary det achtives or spies of our own to go forth into the foe lines to unravel t he mys t ery, so we must employ ot her means to regain the lost articles.I will issue a proc lamanation, that no one is to leave c amp un der an y do condit ion, and t o arrest all st rangers who do not know our country Sign and c annot explain themselves ."

"But suppose that does nT't bring any results ."sugg ested Jen ie.
